TRIBUTE OF RESPECT

TO

CHANCELLOR JAMES P. CARROLL AND ATTORNEY-GENERAL JAMES CONNER

In the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina, on Tuesday, November 27th, 1883, the three Justices of the court being in their seats, and a number of lawyers, members of the General Assembly, and others, being present, the Honorable Charles Richardson Miles, Attorney-General of the State, arose and said:

May it please your Honors—It has seldom, I think, fallen to the lot of any one holding the position which I do, to be called upon, officially, to announce, at one time, the death of two men who have borne such relations to the bench and bar of South Carolina as did the two whose names I am about to mention. And not often has the highest court of South Carolina had announced to it the death of two citizens more distinguished, more honored and more loved, than the late James P. Carroll and James Conner.

The Honorable James P. Carroll was the last surviving Chancellor of South Carolina elected under the constitution of 1790, the only surviving ex-chancellors, Chancellor Lesesne and Chancellor Johnson, having been elected under the constitution of 1865, and the venerable and honored members of the judiciary elected under the constitution of 1790, Judges Glover and Munro, having been Law Judges. And a worthy representative he was of the bar and bench of "old South Carolina." With a mind vigorous and acute, well disciplined by study and furnished by reading, thoroughly trained by a large and successful practice, with genial nature and dignified and courteous manners, he illustrated some of the highest qualities of a lawyer. The gifts and acquirements which had earned for him reputation and success at the bar won for him distinction on the bench.

He was peculiarly fitted for the duties of a Chancellor of South Carolina. With intellect and learning which qualified him to deal with the profoundest and subtlest principles and the most difficult and intricate questions, his decrees as Chancellor and opinions in the Equity Court of Appeals and in the highest court of South Carolina, the Court of Errors, rank him high among the judges of a State which was always justly proud of her judiciary. And his diligence and accuracy, his patience and urbanity, made him most successful and acceptable in the discharge of the varied and exacting duties of a Chancellor. As a judge, he was easy to approach and singularly free from all official assumption; but his firmness and dignity effectually prevented any attempt to presume.

When, after the constitution of 1868, Chancellor Carroll was deprived of his commission as Chancellor, which he could never have forfeited, because he held it "dum bene se gesserit," we all remember the spirit, vigor and cheerfulness with which he returned to the bar, and again displayed the characteristics which had made him so successful as a lawyer and distinguished as a judge.

Very early in my professional life, I enjoyed the advantage of a somewhat intimate association with Chancellor Carroll, through his intimacy with my old preceptor, partner and friend, Hon. Isaac W. Hayne, whom Chancellor Carroll valued and loved for the qualities which made him what he was—one of the highest, truest, bravest of men, and one of the noblest types of a South Carolinian—and I was honored by many marks of his confidence and friendship to the end of his life. And I feel it a grateful, though sad, privilege to pay this imperfect, but heartfelt, tribute to his worth.

Around the memory of Chancellor Carroll cluster the associations of those earlier days when the life of the State flowed untroubled in peaceful channels—when judges, without fear and beyond reproach, wore the unsullied ermine on seats upon which "Shame was ashamed to sit."

But at mention of the name of James Conner come crowding the memories of those evil days, from which, "with slow steps, with slow, faint steps and much exceeding pain," we have but just passed—days in which even the seat of justice did not escape pollution; and our hearts swell with gratitude to him to whose self-sacrifice, wisdom and "matchless fortitude" are due, in large measure, the restoration to the safety and purity which we now enjoy, and where once again we have just laws impartially administered by pure and able judges. James Conner was distinguished in many fields of usefulness and duty: but he was pre-eminently a lawyer, and in this place, especially the scene of his labors and his triumphs, it is appropriate to dwell upon his characteristics and career as a lawyer.

From his graduation from the South Carolina College, in 1849, to the day of his death, his life was devoted to the profession, the only interval in which he was not actively and exclusively engaged in it being the four years in which he served the State in the field. It was manifest, from the time he commenced the study of law, that it was not his purpose to use the profession, as many do, only as a means for the attainment of influence and position in other fields—it was the pursuit to which he devoted his life, and this was proved to the end.

With great physical and mental capacity for labor, and always practical, he, soon after his admission to the bar, prepared a Digest of all the law reports of the State from the year 1835 to 1854, which he published in 1855, with the apt motto, "Forsan hæcolim meminisse juvabit." This was followed, in 1857, by a Digest of all the equity reports of the State from the Revolution to 1856, prepared in conjunction with his classmate and life-long friend, Hon. C. H. Simonton; and this by the "History of a Suit at Law," a treatise which supplied a want which had been realized by him and all his contemporaries in the study of law. These constituted his contributions to the debt which it has been said every lawyer owes to his profession.

In 1856 he was appointed United States District Attorney, and in the discharge of the unusual and responsible duties devolved upon him he not only showed marked ability and force, but manifested a persistency and courage in withstanding all attempts to unduly control or influence his action in the prosecutions with which he was charged, which won for him the highest confidence and respect of the profession and the State. In December, 1860, under circumstances which will be ever memorable, he resigned the office of District Attorney of the United States, and became at once conspicuous and influential in the councils of his State. He was elected in 1861 a member of the convention which passed the ordinance of secession, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of his father, Henry W. Conner, Esq.

Upon the formation of the provisional government of the Confederate States, he was appointed District Attorney of the Confederate States, the Hon. A. G. Magrath, who had resigned the office of United States District Judge, being the District Judge of the Confederate States. He went, however, immediately into active service in the field; and I esteem it an honor to have performed the duties of the office by his appointment until 1864, when I was succeeded by Mr. Lord.

Of General Conner's qualities and career as a soldier I will not attempt to speak on this occasion. There are those before whom I speak who know far better than I what he did and what he suffered—who were his comrades, who shared his toils and dangers, and, like him, did their full duty to cause and country, and who have shared with him the just pride and deserved gratitude of their fellow-citizens.

The war over, General Conner returned to the State, maimed in body and weakened in constitution, but with faculties "sinewed with action" and courage unabated, to reknit the broken strands and weave anew the web of his professional life. I need not recall how the people of his City and State "took him into their arms and hearts." There was nothing in their gift which he could not have had for the asking. But, while never shrinking from any duty of citizenship, political or social, he would not be induced to accept any office, but devoted his entire energies to the practice of his profession. With his mind, naturally vigorous, improved by assiduous and conscientious study and steadily matured and developed, elevated and sustained by calm judgment, perfect courage, truthfulness and directness of purpose, and freedom from all pretensions, he quickly took his undisputed place in the foremost rank of the profession, and achieved marked professional success. It was impossible to have loftier aims or higher standards, personal and professional, than he had, and few have more consistently and thoroughly lived up to and realized them.

His nomination as Attorney-General, in 1876, by a convention in which he had been the leader in opposition to the course adopted by the majority, was a most striking evidence of the admiration, respect and confidence which were inspired by his ability, candor, courage and magnanimity. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the value of the services which he rendered the State in the canvass of 1876; yet it is but fitting that I should on this occasion, and in this presence, dwell with emphasis upon his labors in securing the fruits of the political victory won at the polls. None better understand than do your Honors how empty would have been the political success had not the legal title of the new government been established in the courts. And in accomplishing this, I say, without derogation from the value of the services rendered by others, Attorney-General Conner was more than the mere official—he was the real and acknowledged leader. The people of South Carolina realized that—second only to their and his chief, Governor Hampton—to Attorney-General Conner are they indebted for the permanent establishment of the liberties which were rewon in 1876. Surrounded by dangers and uncertainties, with a full sense of his responsibility, his courage never faltered, his calm judgment never failed; with much to make a devious course seem expedient and questionable methods excusable, he never swerved from "the direct forthright," never resorted to measures which he was not willing to avow. It may be said of him as England's great laureate said of England's great hero—

"Whatever record leaps to light,
He never shall be shamed."

General Conner's popularity with the people of South Carolina, being based upon no arts, but on their admiration, respect and affection, unlike that of most leaders, never waned, but continued as strong and as real after his return from the war until he laid down the burden of life, which had become heavier than even he could bear. I think the one action of his life which disappointed some of the people of the State was his resignation of the office of Attorney-General in 1877, a rare exception where office is so eagerly sought and so reluctantly abandoned. One ambition our friend, I believe, had, a lofty and worthy one—to occupy a place where your Honors sit, a place which he would have most worthily and acceptably filled, with honor to himself and usefulness to the State, but which he would not seek to attain, because he felt it to be inconsistent with the duty he owed to those whom he valued more than life, and prized more than even the rewards of honorable ambition.

I have been carried away by feeling to speak more than I had purposed, and must leave unspoken much that I would gladly have said. In conclusion, I will say that there may have been citizens of South Carolina who have occupied positions of wider usefulness and more extended reputation, who have held higher official stations and who have received greater rewards, but South Carolina has had no son who has enjoyed higher respect, more perfect confidence and a warmer love than did James Conner.

In token of respect to the memory of ex-Chancellor James P. Carroll and ex-Attorney-General James Conner, I move that the court do now adjourn.

In seconding this motion, the Honorable Joseph Daniel Pope spoke as follows:

May it please the Court—The sad but grateful privilege has been accorded me to follow the announcement just made to the court by the Attorney-General, and to second his tribute of respect to the memory of the late Chancellor Carroll. It is altogether befitting that such a testimonial to the worth, the character, the learning, and the public services of the deceased, should be entered as of record in this court. In other days, he sat, not as your Honors now sit, in the Supreme Court, but as one of the judges of the separate Court of Appeals in Equity in South Carolina, when that court survived. And until an All-wise Providence permitted this Commonwealth to be stricken by an era of misrule—happily now no more—he occupied his place as a member of the high court for the correction of errors and for the final adjudication of all such questions of constitutional law as arose in our courts under the State and federal constitutions.

To others, upon other occasions, it has been permitted to speak of Chancellor Carroll as a man and as a citizen; as a learned counselor, as an eloquent advocate, and as a patriot, who was ever true to the State, not only in the bright days of her prosperity, but in the darkest hours of her adversity and humiliation. Here and in this presence we are now to speak of him as a judge.

And in so doing let us ask, what is a judge? Clad in the judicial robe, a judge occupies at once the most exalted position that any man can occupy, both in his relations to his fellow-men and to the government of which he is a part. In his hands are often the issues of life and of death; by his word often the captive is set free or is held within the bars of the prison; upon his judgment often goes forth the fiat by which the estates of the litigant are to be saved or lost to himself or his family. Life, liberty and property are at once in his judicial keeping!

What an office! What a power! What a responsibility! What a delicate trust! How subtle, how nice, how complex, how perplexing are the questions that often address themselves to the understanding or appeal to the conscience of the judge! There are those who speak lightly of these grave responsibilities, and would even lightly assume them; who seem to forget the delicate touch that is required to follow the gossamer thread by which the judge is often called upon to seek out the covert hiding-place of fraud, or bring up truth from the bottom of deep waters where it is said to dwell.

How often to the nicely adjusted, highly sensitive mind of an equity judge, trained to pursue truth, do straws tell which way the wind blows; to such a mind, how often do trifles light as air, when cast into the scales, slowly but surely drag down the beam! And if there be a spectacle of the moral sublime on earth, it is to see such a judge rise to the height of the occasion and ask, not what the letter of the law might say, not what the learning of the schools might say, not what stern logic might say, but what does enlightened conscience say?

Such was the exalted sphere of usefulness, of responsibility, and of honor, to which our deceased friend was called, a quarter of a century ago, by the voice of the representatives of the State. And how did he perform his part? Across the hall, in the library of this court, he has left his record; and those who come after us may judge of him, as we now judge of the great names and the distinguished services of the illustrious men who have gone before us. As illustrative of his powers, need I refer to the case of Myers v. O'Hanlan, as an example of his judicial style, or to the case of Manning v. Richardson, as an instance of his judicial learning. In our reports he has built up a monument to himself which will stand for all time, side by side with those erected by his distinguished compeers.

In the same pages we may read after Harper, a judge illustrious for his talents, revered for his learning, and beloved for the sweetness of that human nature which possessed him. There we may follow the early teachings of De Saussure, who, like Nottingham, in England, has been called the father of equity in South Carolina. There we may trace the heroic courage, the sublime energy, and the masterful authority and common sense of O'Neall; the massive and almost unerring judgment of David Johnson; the subtle and critical learning, the marvelous power of statement and monumental industry of Job Johnston; the masterly decrees and profound legal opinions of the Wardlaws, of whom it may be said that they were among the jewels of the Commonwealth; the exquisite genius of Withers, which, like the finely-tempered Damascus blade, could penetrate to the marrow, or cleave asunder falsehood and error. There we may recall the noble presence of Earle, the exalted and benignant nature of Evans, the strong practical sagacity of Dunkin, the able and admirable adjudications of Dargan; all of whom have passed away, leaving still among the living two octogenarian patriarchs—Glover and Munro—venerable for their great age and their profound learning; and venerated for their unimpeached integrity and for the great services that they in their day rendered to the State. All venerable men!

These were the friends, and many of these the compeers of the late Chancellor Carroll. This was the great company into which he was introduced when he assumed the ermine, which he wore without reproach and returned to the State as spotless as he received it. This was the council board at which he took his seat. Among these and such as these he held his own in all those great qualities that go to make up the grand character of an enlightened judge.

Were I called upon to say what beautiful traits of character peculiarly marked the private and public life of Chancellor Carroll, I should at once answer—modesty and courtesy. Never distrustful of his powers or of his opinions, he yet ever bore himself and avowed his sentiments without vanity, and with a gentle urbanity that was as charming to others as it was graceful in him. Under all circumstances he held in respect the honest convictions of those from whom he differed. In private intercourse he was careful never to contradict the dogmatic assertions of others even when he knew them to be ill-founded and as he abhorred so he avoided colloquial argument as one of the pests of society. On all such occasions he would courteously turn the conversation with a pleasantry, and adroitly lead it into other channels.

As an illustration of the generous and kindly nature of the man, permit me to state here a personal incident. He and I were members of the legislature at the same time. When it was proposed by his friends that judicial honors should be conferred upon him, it was naturally supposed that he would receive, as he certainly deserved, my support. But at the time, there was another proposed for the same honor from my own district, who had, by reason of a long and intimate friendship, a claim upon me which I could not easily forego. I immediately sought out Mr. Carroll at his seat in the Senate, and explained to him the delicacy of my position. His face lighted up with a frank smile and he said: "By all means stick to your friend, and when you can do no better come to me." On the second ballot I did go over to him, along with others, and his election was thus rendered almost unanimous. It is pleasing to recall the frank, cheerful, unselfish feeling that under such circumstances actuated a generous mind.

But the noblest nature and the highest qualities of head and heart cannot long withstand the noiseless tread of the inevitable hour. Sooner or later death comes to all. It came to our friend in the fullness of years and of honors. He has gone! The places that knew him once shall know him no more forever. And in bidding him our last farewell, it can truthfully be said, that we shall never again be called upon in this court to add our tribute of respect to a higher manhood, a purer nature, a more refined mind, a sweeter courtesy, or a more becoming modesty; for these in the highest degree adorned and graced the public and private career of James Parsons Carroll.

In further seconding the motion of the Attorney-General, in so far as it related to the memory of Gen. Conner, the Hon. Leroy F. Youmans rose and said:

May it please the Court—In the heated political canvass of 1876, at the request of the Democratic party, I had the honor to address an immense audience in the city of Charleston, the home of the lamented dead, in memoriam of whom this motion has been made by the official head of the bar of the State, before the most exalted of the judicial tribunals of South Carolina. I have been reminded by some of that audience, that in the course of that address I took occasion to say that "the Democratic candidate for the high office of Attorney-General of South Carolina was eminent in all the departments of his profession, renowned in the arts alike of war and of peace, brave without rashness, prudent without timidity, the soul of honor, and the perfection of common sense, Charleston's favorite son, General James Conner."

This estimate of his character, abilities and position, expressed at a time when the principles, feelings, interests and passions of our people were stirred to their profoundest depths, I, to-day, in the midst of the calm, peace and prosperity which pervade and permeate all this Commonwealth, in the full blaze of the light with which the last seven eventful years, marked by his priceless services, have illumined his career, and in this august presence, deliberately re-affirm. This is due to truth, to history, to the State, to the city of Charleston, and to him.

If in the course of my personal experience I ever met with a man who acted in the full spirit of the principle which Sallust expressed in the commanding language of Rome, "Nam et prius quam incipias consulto, et ubi consulueris, mature facto opus est;" the principle which the greatest of the English poets, the greatest of all poets, expressed, in words known wherever the English language is read or spoken, "If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly;" the principle which the great American pioneer, who fell at the Alamo, expressed with the nervous pith of the West, in words known wherever American point and American directness are known, "Be sure you are right, then go ahead;" that man was James Conner. And this principle is the heroic sentiment of manhood through all the ages of humanity.

My first acquaintance with General Conner was in 1856, on the occasion of my application for admission to the bar, he being one of the examining committee. That acquaintance, at its beginning, was marked by the greatest kindness and confidence on his part, a kindness and confidence which continued unbroken, without interruption or diminution, and ceased only with his mortal existence, when, amid the soul-felt laments of the people of the city of Charleston and the people of the State of South Carolina, "gently and reverently he was laid in the bosom of the State he loved," in the sacred burial-place of the city of his birth, the city of his home, the city whose peace his valor had protected, the city whose prosperity his wisdom had assured.

As early as 1856 his high character and standing in his profession secured him, on the accession of Mr. Buchanan to the presidency, appointment to the position of District Attorney of the United States for the District of South Carolina. How zealously, how ably, how faithfully, with what vigor and skill for the honor and interests of this great Republic, with what just consideration for the rights of the accused, with what entire absence of oppression, persecution, bias, or insolence of office, the duties of that most responsible federal position were performed by him has already been told by better-informed critics, by more competent eulogists—"His praise been hymned by loftier harps than mine." For immediately upon the receipt of the sad intelligence of his death, his distinguished survivors of the accomplished and famed bar of Charleston, in the State Circuit Court then in session there, put upon record in words which have been scattered broadcast by the telegraph and press, the highest testimonials upon each and every of these points. These testimonials "hodie manent longeque manebunt."

Nay, more, the eminent jurist who, at the time of General Conner's being District Attorney, adorned the position of District Judge of the United States Court, and "nil tetigit, quod non ornavit," than whom none knew better, appreciated more highly, or loved more tenderly, the lamented dead, in language reflecting as much honor on the distinguished living by whom it was uttered, as on the distinguished dead of whom it was uttered, in the presence of the bar of Charleston and the court, spoke of General Conner's discharge of the duties of the office of District Attorney, in terms such as Cicero may have spoken of Sulpicius or Hortensius. With the verity of history it may be said that in the entire roll of the United States District Attorneys of South Carolina, commencing with John Julius Pringle, and running down to the present time—a roll embracing judges, statesmen and ambassadors, Edward McCrady, Sr., the Nestor of the Charleston bar, and James L. Petigru, for forty years the acknowledged leader of the bar of South Carolina—there never was one who more fully filled that office than James Conner.

But unexceptionable and praiseworthy as was his conduct in the discharge of the duties of that office, certainly nothing could have been more unexceptionable, praiseworthy and patriotic than the manner of his leaving it. For when, in 1860, it became evident that the great question before the people of South Carolina was, whether the State should attempt the exercise of what she had always regarded her sovereign rights, the District Judge and the District Attorney both resigned the positions they held under the federal government, and cast in their fortunes with their State. And when in 1861 the State having, by the ordinance of her convention, sundered the bonds which bound her to the federal Union, "called upon her sons to redeem the pledges she had made," James Conner responded to that call from Sumter and Manassas 'till the Confederate flag was left > "Without a man to wave it;

> Without a sword to save it."

Posterity will never ask how he responded to that call. The muse of history has long since taken possession of, and will forever preserve that response, as among the most precious and priceless memories of those disastrous days. Go ask the battle-scarred fields of Virginia, and listen to the whispers of the Genius Loci, as they come from the now placid fields of waving grain, where erst

> "Death rode upon the sulphury siroc, > Red battle stamped his foot, and > Nations felt the shock."

Go ask the battle-scarred veterans of the Army of Northern Virginia, the survivors of his company, his battalion, his regiment, his brigade, the division, the corps, the army in which he served. Go read Caldwell's History of McGowan's Brigade. Go to

> "Fame's eternal camping ground,
> Where silent tents are spread,
> And glory guards with solemn round
> The bivouac of the dead."

Unfurl the funeral banners, under which the noble dead of his brigade lie sleeping, and ask the shades of those departed heroes! Go ask the shot and shell that maimed and mutilated his body, blasted his health, and finally, after twenty-one years of physical suffering, consigned him to that most glorious of tombs—the tomb of the patriot and the hero. He lived the life of a patriot and a hero, the most glorious of lives to live; he died the death of a patriot and a hero, the most glorious of deaths to die.

During the dark eight years of South Carolina's history which immediately followed the passage of the reconstruction acts, "the millennium of the minnows," the golden age of the foreign foe and the native traitor, General Conner was among the recognized leaders of those who "never bowed the knee to Baal," or "crooked its pregnant hinges where thrift might follow fawning."

But, distinguished as were his services in the office of United States District Attorney, patriotic and devoted as was his action in resigning that position when South Carolina's honor and his own required it, entwined with the glory of South Carolina as are and forever will be his gallantry, his proficiency in the art of war, and his heroic services throughout the whole of the four years' struggle, as if some still greater act were necessary to complete the drama of his career, and by adding a crowning grace, make it totus, teres atque rotundus, Providence and the good fortune of South Carolina had reserved for him the performance of a still more heroic, a still more patriotic service, which at her command he was to render her, the last and noblest of his public life.

For when in 1876 it was determined by the oppressed people of the State, worn out with the despicable rule of the creatures who since 1868 had lorded it over South Carolina, that, under the lead of Wade Hampton,

> "The man, who though his storied fame
> On stormy fields was won,
> Still boasts no sweeter, nobler name, > Than Carolina's son,"

and relying upon whatever remained of the past honor, courage and energy of the State, determined that these people should be taught that no more harrying would be tolerated, that "the chase was o'er, the hunt was up, the quarry stood at bay," it was at the same time determined that call should be made upon James Conner for the performance of services which involved as much skill and prudence in their conception and mode of execution, as much nerve and ability in their execution, as he had ever been called upon to display on the blood-stained fields of Virginia.

How that call was responded to, let his conduct in the political campaign in South Carolina in 1876, and the history of the rifle clubs of Charleston, of which he was President-in-Chief, let the history of the dual government in South Carolina and the long-continued, the most exciting litigation ever waged before the courts of this State, let his whole career as Attorney-General of South Carolina, answer.

That history is too recent, that history is too deeply stamped upon the memory of all living Carolinians, to require, if even to permit, recital here. Suffice it to say that in the long roll of Attorneys-General of South Carolina, commencing in 1762 with Adam Graeme, and running down to the able and distinguished gentleman who now so worthily fills that high office—a roll including the names of Rutledge, Pringle, Cheves, Richardson, Petigru, Legaré, Rhett, Bailey and the Haynes, while there have been men whose patriotism, ability and fame are unsurpassed, who acted on a wider theater and a less restricted stage, yet the sons of South Carolina who have lived through these late exciting scenes, the ground swell of which has scarcely yet subsided, who have seen, acted, lived that history, can never be made to believe that there ever was a time in the history of the State whose exigencies called upon any of these giants of the past for services in the office of Attorney-General requiring greater promptness, greater firmness, greater courage, greater prudence, greater ability, than the exigencies of these times demanded from Attorney-General Conner; that those demands were ever more fully and fairly met than they were met by him, or that among them all there beat a truer heart, or braver pulse.

He had, from the time of his election as Attorney-General, given his undivided attention and most anxious solicitude to the discharge of his official duties, and had been subjected to continuous and unremitting excitement which would have tried nerves of iron, and which had wasted his delicate frame. The long-continued contest in which he had been so prominent an actor, having come to a successful close, and "novus ordo saeclorum nascitur" having become an accomplished fact in South Carolina, on December 1st, 1877, he sent in his resignation of his high office, to the great regret of the Governor, the legislature, the bench, and the people of the State.

That regret was fitly voiced in Governor Hampton's letter transmitting his resignation, and the action of the General Assembly thereon. "I perform this duty," says the Governor, "with infinite regret. The arduous duties of the office of Attorney-General have been discharged with a zeal, energy and patriotism which could not have been surpassed, while his counsel has been of incalculable importance to me during the past year. He has won the esteem, respect and affection of our people, and he will carry to his retirement the confidence of all with whom he has been associated, as well as the consciousness of having done his whole duty." "Responsibility," said Edward Bulwer (Lord Lytton), "that heaviest word in all our language." "Duty," said Robert E. Lee, in still higher strain, "that noblest word in all our language."

The General Assembly, on the reception of his letter of resignation, in a preamble and resolution spread upon the journal of the Senate and the House of Representatives, Resolved, "that in the conduct of the arduous and delicate duties entrusted to him as Attorney-General, he had deserved the gratitude of the State, and tendered to him their thanks in the name of the people of South Carolina."

In the composition of three most admirable law books, relative to South Carolina decisions and practice, he paid fairly and fully that debt which, Lord Bacon says, every lawyer owes to his profession. He was a most earnest man. Whatever his hands found to do, that he did "totis viribus, maximo conatu." No difficulty, no danger, deterred him. He quailed before no antagonist. He shrank from no labor. He dared do all that may become a man. He was a man, aye, every inch a man. In civil and military life, he believed, and acted to the full on the belief, in that thrilling and soul-sustaining Scripture "Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentiorito."

He read much, he conversed much, he wrote much. He was a full man, a ready man, an exact man. All who met him, allied with him or opposed to him, knew and felt in him a reasoner, a lawyer, a man of affairs. He fully appreciated and acted, both in writing and in speaking, on what the greatest English writer of this century regarded the first rule of all writing and speaking—that rule to which every other is subordinate—that the words used shall be such as most fully and precisely convey the meaning. His extensive range of reading enabled him to have, in a most remarkable degree, at his command, general observations, maxims, illustrations, the sayings of the wise, sententiæ, γνῶμαι, and these he wielded with consummate dexterity, always with force, often with crushing effect, in conversation, in writing, in debate.

Ordinarily, at the bar, his manner was calm, collected and deliberate, but when aroused to the full exertion of his powers by the "gaudia certaminis," or some great moral sentiment, his voice, mien, gesture, made him seem the incarnation of fiery thought. He had all the power of plain things. He summoned no lightning from the heaven of invention, he evoked no fury from the shades below, but the torch in his hand burned with withering power, and he wielded it without fear of man. Like Chatham's, his crutch was a weapon of oratory.

His sympathies were with duty and its performance, never with unscrupulous, remorseless power; not with the heroes whose victorious chariot wheels, stained with the blood of vanquished nations, conducted them to power and renown; they were rather with the captain who, in pursuance of duty, went down with the "ill-fated barque launched in the dim eclipse, and rigged with curses dark;" with Troy's champion at his last stand beneath its walls; with Leonidas in the Grecian Pass; with the dissenting consul at Cannæ; with Maxcy Gregg's last message, when the death damp was on his brow, "Tell Governor Pickens if I am to die now, I die cheerfully for South Carolina."

Acting throughout life on the maxim, that in mortals it is more to deserve than to command success, he has left to the bride whom he so knightly wooed and so knightly won, to his orphan children, to the city and State of his birth and home and love, a legacy more precious than the great successes he achieved in civil and military arenas—the legacy of the lesson of his life: "noble ends by noble means pursued;" "the acquisition of great renown by great public services;" the recollection that he spent and was spent in the service of South Carolina; that he lived for her and died for her; that "His public passion and his ideal dream, his soul's twin Arcady and Academe," was South Carolina; that he loved her as the "Athenian loved the city of the violet crown, as the Roman loved the maxima rerum Roma;" as the Pitts, father and son, loved "the inviolate isle of the sage, and free;" that he was conspicuously prominent among those sons of South Carolina who, under the magic rallying cry of Carolinians for Carolina, raised her from the condition of the prostrate State, and placed her again on her former pedestal of the Palmetto State; and a State is the grandest of the works of man, "grander than the Iliads, or the Pyramids, or the Systems of the Stars."

In granting the motion, and in response to what had been so beautifully spoken of the distinguished dead, Mr. Chief Justice Simpson said:

It is quite proper, Mr. Attorney-General, that this court should pause in its labors under the weight of the sad events which you have just announced, and in honor of the two distinguished deceased whose recent demise has so bereaved the profession.

Of course, it will not be possible for me, under the present circumstances, to review the lives of these two gentlemen, or to pronounce that eulogium upon their worth and virtues which they so eminently deserve. I will say, however, that I fully concur in all that has been said in the beautiful tributes that have just been paid them at the bar, and I will only add a few remarks in reference to them as lawyers.

In the judicial history of our State, and in that bright galaxy of distinguished lawyers and judges whose memories are embalmed in our hearts and whose names we delight to recount when the jewels of our profession are called for, no one, except, perhaps, the lamented Petigru, belonged more exclusively to that profession, or more fully adorned it during their day and generation, than did Chancellor Carroll and General Conner. It is meet, therefore, that we, their survivors, should cherish and, as far as may be, perpetuate their memory.

Chancellor Carroll was admitted to the bar in 1830, I believe, and from that day until his death, a period of more than a half century (except for a short time while he was State Senator from Edgefield county), he devoted himself exclusively and entirely to the pursuit of the law, either as a practicing attorney or as a distinguished judicial magistrate. And recognizing early that the law was indeed a jealous mistress, he gave to it all of his energies, all of his splendid talents, and all of his high character, not only during his early manhood, but also in his middle life and his maturer years. No wonder then that he reaped its rewards and gained its highest honors.

As a lawyer he was distinguished for his courtesy to his brethren, for his firm adherence to the interests of his clients, for his exhaustive investigation of their cases, and for his able and powerful presentation of them to the courts. By universal consent no one stood higher in all these respects than he. As a judicial magistrate, his name and memory are embalmed in the records of chancery, and will last as long as equity has a place in the administration of justice by the courts. In his death, the profession has indeed sustained a great loss. But as to himself we are consoled with the thought that his harvest-time had nearly come. He had already reaped much that he had sown. His life was behind him; his record was made up.

And when considered as a whole, what a record it was! Courtly manners, winning courtesy, indomitable energy, ardent zeal, high ability, profound learning, unwavering fidelity and exalted honor—all beautifully blended and interwoven, made it up, in its grand completeness. Thus standing, it might be studied as a model by which to form professional character; and, as such, I commend it to the bar and to the bench. Sometimes we have seen the great orb of day go down on a cloudless eve, leaving a bright effulgence gilding the tree-tops which marked the horizon beneath which it had just sunk. Thus our friend went down at the close of a most worthy, honorable and useful life, with no spot upon his escutcheon, and with a bright halo overhanging and pointing to his tomb.

It may be said, too, of General Conner, that his whole heart was in his profession. Next to his family and his State, nothing was dearer to him. Save these, he suffered nothing to intervene between himself and its duties, and esteeming it a profession, as it is, in the pursuit of which the best and noblest aspirations and powers of man might be indulged, expanded and enlarged, he loved it for itself, and he embraced it with an unusual devotion. Although he was cut down in mid-life, yet he had deservedly achieved a high and wide reputation as a lawyer, and at his death a most noble future was spread out before him, illumined by a brilliant past.

In addition to his distinguished position at the bar, founded upon those eminent qualities which he displayed in his private practice, it will be remembered that he had been of immense service to his State in his official capacity. Because if South Carolina gained anything by its rescue from the grasp of that band of vandals which plundered it so long, this was due in great degree to the calm wisdom and indomitable firmness of General Conner, guiding the State as Attorney-General, in that hour of her greatest peril, when she was standing upon the very brink of ruin, and which none will forget. Services like these, among the ancient Greeks, would have been the foundation of a marble statute in the market-place, erected by public demand. The people of this State should see to it that the memory of General Conner should never pass away.

Though he died comparatively young, yet he had already scaled all the mountains in his legal pathway, and at his death he was standing on the margin of a grand and beautiful plateau, full of the richest fruits, all of which seemed to be within his grasp. To us, with our finite minds, looking upon what he had already achieved and seeing his commanding position for the future, it does seem that he might have been spared a little longer, so that he could have taken possession of that which he had already earned, and which appeared rightfully to be his; so that he might have finished that beautiful monument, the foundations of which he had already laid so deep and broad, and upon which he was so carefully piling a lofty column. But the ways of Providence are not our ways. They are inscrutable to us, and we are taught that what He doeth is done for the best. In cases like these, then, there is nothing left for us but to submit, deploring our loss and paying what honor we can to the memory of our deceased brethren.

Let this proceeding be entered upon the minutes of the court by the clerk, and let the court stand adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

An employé upon a farm, who is to receive for his services an amount equal to one-half of the crop made, and is to work under the direction, supervision and control of the employer, has no interest in the crop, and, therefore, no right to bind it by a lien.

The statute authorizes a lien to be given only by an owner of the crop as land owner or tenant, and, as such, a cultivator of the soil on his own account.

The word "employed," as used in this statute, is synonymous with the word "engaged," and does not authorize a lien to be given by a mere employé.

The lien given to an agricultural laborer by another statute does not give him such an interest in the crop as would permit him to bind his interest by a lien for advances.

*Before Wallace, J., Anderson, March, 1883.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. L. Tribble, for appellant.
Messrs. Moore & Wardlaw, contra.

September 24th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In 1882, B. F. Strickland leased from A. A. Carpenter about fifty acres of land; and on January 12th, of that year, he entered into a written agreement with one G. W. Wilson, by which he hired Wilson, and his wife and children, to cultivate "about twenty acres of the land, to work the crop at the proper time, and to gather the same when mature, under the direction, supervision and control of the said Strickland. The lands to be cultivated—seventeen acres in upland cotton, and about three acres in bottom corn; the said Strickland to furnish, in addition to the land, tools and stock, and one-half of all fertilizers. In consideration of the services above contracted for, the said Strickland to pay the said Wilson, his executors, administrators, heirs or assigns, an amount equal to one-half of all crops, cotton, corn, &c.; the amount of said portion of the crops to be paid as soon as the crop shall have been gathered and prepared for market; the services herein contracted for shall begin on January 1st, 1882, and continue as long as may be necessary; and, during such time, Wilson to have the use and occupation of a house on or near said lands," &c.

On January 11th, 1882, in order to secure supplies, Wilson executed to A. A. Carpenter what was called an agricultural lien "on his crops of cotton, corn, wheat and all other products of the said farm or farms, wherever grown, to be delivered over to him as soon as they are gathered and can be prepared for market," &c. Strickland also gave Carpenter an agricultural lien and mortgage; but they have both been paid, and do not enter into the case. Under the alleged lien, Wilson received supplies from Carpenter to the extent of about $82.28 up to *April 10th, 1882, when, with the consent of both Carpenter and Strickland, he abandoned his crop and left the place; and, as Carpenter alleges, Strickland verbally agreed to complete the working of the crop, and out of the proceeds of its sale, to pay the advances due, or to become due, to Carpenter. Strickland did take possession of the half-made crop, and gathered and disposed of it; but, denying the alleged agreement, refused to pay Wilson's lien to Carpenter, who thereupon procured an agricultural warrant on Wilson's lien against Strickland, and seized several bales of his cotton to satisfy it.

Strickland denied that he ever agreed to assume Wilson's lien, or that he could verbally adopt it so as to make it enforceable by law against him as a lien; and also insisted, as matter of law, that the demand of Carpenter never was a good and legal lien upon the crop, either as against Wilson or himself, for that he never signed it, and Wilson was a mere hired laborer to work the crop, in which he had no interest, and upon which he could not give a lien in advance. An issue to try the question was framed, and Judge Wallace held with the defendant Strickland, and dismissed the proceedings.

From this order Carpenter appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because his Honor erred in holding that G. W. Wilson had no such interest in his crops on which he could give a lien to A. A. Carpenter, the land owner. 2. Because his Honor erred in not holding that, upon Strickland taking by agreement the crop of Wilson, the said crop was liable to pay for all advances made to Wilson up to the time of that agreement, and thereafter to Strickland himself. 3. That Strickland, after taking Wilson's crop and procuring advances upon his lien, was thereby estopped from denying the validity of said lien." From the view which the court takes it will not be necessary to consider whether any, and, if so, what verbal agreement was made by Carpenter and Strickland at the time Wilson was discharged and left his crop. Strickland was not sued upon any such contract; but the proceeding was a warrant against Strickland, issued by the clerk under the statute, upon the undertaking of Wilson, which, as alleged, had been verbally assumed by Strickland. The only question is, whether that warrant, as *against Strickland, was authorized by law. He certainly never signed it; and we think the clerk exceeded his authority, under the statute, when he issued it against Strickland upon his alleged verbal agreement to take the place of Wilson. The proceeding was under the act which gives the stringent remedy of a lien in advance under which the crop may be seized and sold only where "an agreement in writing shall be entered into before such advance is made," &c.

Besides, we agree with the Circuit judge that Wilson, under his contract with Strickland, was nothing more than a laborer employed for wages, and had no interest, present or prospective, in the crop itself. He was "hired" to work "under the direction, supervision and control" of Strickland, and, in consideration of "the services contracted for," was to "be paid an amount (of money) equal to one-half of all crops, cotton, corn, &c., as soon as the crop should be gathered; the services contracted for to continue as long as may be necessary;" and during such time special provision is made that Wilson "may have the use and occupation of a house on or near the land," &c., &c. All this is inconsistent with the idea that Wilson was lessee and proprietor of the premises for the year. The terms of the contract in this case are much more explicit than they were in that of Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680], in which this court held that "under a contract by which the services of an agricultural laborer are to be compensated by a share of the crop made, but he is to work under the exclusive direction of the employer, who is to have the entire control of the laborers' time and services, the relation of master and servant exists."

Wilson being a mere laborer for stipulated wages, we think it follows that he had no right to give a lien upon the crop to be made. The act upon the subject (Gen. Stat., § 2397), provides that "if any person or persons shall make any advances, either in money or supplies, to any person or persons who are employed or about to engage in the cultivation of the soil, the person or persons so making such advance or advances shall be entitled to a lien upon the crop which may be made during the year upon the land, in the cultivation of which the advances so made have been expended," &c., &c. As we understand it, this means a *cultivator of the soil upon his own account; that is to say, a proprietor, either as land owner or tenant, and as such owner of the crop to be made. It could not have been the intention of the law to include a mere laborer for wages, although he might be engaged as a farm hand in the cultivation of the soil. In such case the laborer has no interest in the crop as such, and to authorize him to encumber the crop of his employer would be to give him rights in the property of another, to introduce great con-

An argument in favor of this right claimed for the mere laborer was drawn from the use of the word "employed." It was said that the word "employed," as used in the act, necessarily implies that there was an employer and an employé, and, therefore, it was the express intention to include him as one employed. We do not think that such was the intention of the law makers, but rather that they used the word "employed" as synonymous with "engaged"—as engaged in a particular business, simply to include those who were already engaged (or employed), as well as those who were about to engage in the cultivation of the soil. This construction is supported by the fact that the original agricultural lien law of 1866, and all amendments thereto down to the act of 1878, used in the same connection the words "engaged, or about to engage," &c. Gen. Stat., 1872, ch. CXX., § 55. This is shown to be the correct construction also by the succeeding section of the act itself, which gives the right to seize the crop in case the person to whom the advances have been made "is about to sell or dispose of his crop." How could a mere laborer, for hire, without having any interest in the crop, sell or dispose of his crop?

It is further urged that, under another provision of the law, an agricultural laborer, whether working for a share of the crop or for wages in money, has the first lien upon the crop in whose hands soever it may be; and, at least, to the extent of this right, the lien of Wilson to Carpenter authorized an agricultural warrant and seizure of the crop made upon the place. The act does go very far to favor the agriculture of the country in allowing a bona fide farmer to give in advance a first lien on his *crop not yet in existence; but it certainly does not go to the extent of allowing a mere laborer on a farm to give a lien for supplies upon his possible lien for wages as a laborer—a lien in advance upon another claim which may exist at the end of the year. The words of the alleged lien itself, drawn in exact conformity with the act, furnish the answer to this view. They do not pretend to give a lien on claims and mere choses in action of the lienor, but a first lien on his crops of cotton, corn, wheat and all other products of the farm, &c. This court has held that the agricultural lien act being a new law must be enforced according to its terms, and that the courts cannot go beyond the remedy provided by it, or supplement it by amendment under the forms of construction. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 548.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Abbeville, September, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

*Messrs. E. B. Gary, and E. G. Graydon, for appellants.

Mr. L. W. Perrin, contra.

September 24th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Basil Davis engaged Lewis Sanders to work his land in the year 1881, upon the following terms: "Davis was to furnish the stock and feed it, and after the guano was paid, Lewis was to get one-half." Richard, the father of Lewis, was in no way known in the contract, but it seems that he assisted in making the crop. Whether there was any arrangement between Lewis and Richard, and, if so, what it was, did not clearly appear. Lewis denied that there was any agreement for compensation, but it was claimed on behalf of Richard, that for his services Lewis promised to give him half that should be made on the place; that they "were halvers in the crop."

During the year Richard got supplies from T. J. Ellis & Bros., and to secure the same, gave them an agricultural lien upon his crop. Towards the end of the year, Davis, the landlord, had a settlement with Lewis, and, in paying him, turned over to him a bale of cotton, which he (Lewis) sold and delivered to the plaintiffs, Miller & Richey. Whereupon the defendants, T. J. Ellis & Bros., claiming that the said bale of cotton in justice and equity should have gone to Richard in payment of his services in making the crop, procured an agricultural warrant on Richard's lien to them, and through the sheriff, DuPre, seized and sold the bale of cotton as part of Richard's crop. At the sale it brought $41.83, now in the sheriff's hands, and Miller & Richey brought this action "for the recovery of the said bale of cotton, or for the value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had, together with $100 damages," &c.

The case came on for trial before Judge Cothran, and under his charge the jury found for the plaintiffs $27, about half the amount for which the cotton was sold. The defendants now appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

*1. "Because his Honor refused a motion for a non-suit made by the defendants after the close of the plaintiffs' case.

2. "Because his Honor refused to charge the jury, that if Lewis Sanders was not subject to the control or authority of Basil Davis in making the crop on the land of Basil Davis in 1881, then the relation of master and servant did not exist between them, and the said Basil Davis was not the sole owner of said crop, if there was a contract between Basil Davis and Lewis Sanders, whereby the said Lewis Sanders was to receive a half or any portion of said crop for making and cultivating the same.

3. "Because his Honor refused to charge the jury when requested by defendants, 'That if Lewis Sanders and Basil Davis were joint owners of said crop, each had the right to dispose of his portion thereof, and the said Lewis Sanders had the right to make a contract with Richard Sanders, whereby he became joint owner of the share of said Lewis Sanders in said crop.' His Honor indorsed upon said request 'refused for the reason that the landlord and tenant were not joint owners; the landlord's rights were paramount till division made.'

4. "Because his Honor charged the jury that if Lewis Sanders and Richard Sanders were owners of equal shares of the crop produced, and Lewis Sanders had sold more than his share of the whole crop produced, the plaintiffs would still be entitled to recover one-half of any part of said crop purchased by them from Lewis Sanders, and seized by the sheriff, by virtue of a warrant issued to enforce payment of a lien given by said Richard Sanders on said crop.

5. "Because his Honor charged the jury that this is an action at law, and the jury should take no notice of any excess Lewis Sanders may have received over and above his share of said crop in this proceeding, although Lewis Sanders might be made to account in equity for said excess.

5. "Because his Honor charged the jury that a joint owner of personal property can, without the consent of the other joint owner, sell not only his interest, but the interest of the other joint owner of the property, and, therefore, where the sheriff levies on the interest of one joint owner of personal property, and sells the property levied upon, his sale disposes of the *interest of both joint owners and makes him liable to the other joint owner or those claiming through him for his share of said property.

7. "Because his Honor charged the jury that each joint owner of personal property is seized in and through the entire property, and that where one joint owner has disposed of more than his share of said property, the other joint owner is not allowed to retain the balance of said property, so as to make up the deficiency; that any remaining property after one joint owner has disposed of more than his share of said property, shall be divided according to the proportion which each had in the property before any part thereof was disposed of.

8. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that they might find a general verdict for the plaintiffs, instead of charging them that they should find specially upon the facts put in issue by defendants' answer.

9. "Because his Honor's charge utterly ignored the equitable defense set up in defendant's answer, and the equitable defense set up in the answer, not having been passed upon by the presiding judge, the judgment is null and void.

10. "Because the judgment is in all respects contrary to law and evidence."

The first exception as to the non-suit was properly withdrawn for the reason that the mere possession of the plaintiffs may have been enough to put the defendants to their proof.

Under the last general exception that "the judgment is in all respects contrary to law," it is claimed that the defendants may make the objection that the verdict was a nullity, for the reason that the action being for "claim and delivery of personal property," it should have been in the alternative, for the property, or in case a delivery cannot be had, for its value and damages for the detention. Bardin v. Drafts, 10 S. C. 496, and the second judgment in the case of Eason v. Miller & Kelly, 18 S. C. 381. But we do not regard this as necessarily an action pure and simple for the delivery of the cotton. At the time the action was brought, the cotton had already been sold, leaving only in the hands of the sheriff the proceeds of the sale. The prayer was for "the recovery of the said bale of cotton, or for *the value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had, together with $100 damages," &c. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $27. At the time it was rendered, the defendants made no objection to the form of the verdict. As was said by the court in the case of Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 327, cited and followed in the case of Williams v. Irby, 16 S. C. 374, "the plaintiffs had a right to demand either damages for the taking and detention, as in trover for conversion, or the return of the property with damages. The code has not changed the rights of the parties in this respect. The provisions of section 301 (now 299) of the code, apply to a judgment awarding possession of personal property, not to a case where the plaintiff is entitled to general damages. It is for the plaintiff to elect which form of remedy he will pursue. We see no reason why the plaintiff could not elect to treat the case as an action for damages merely, notwithstanding the form of relief demanded by the complaint."

It is not necessary to consider the distinctions made in the other exceptions as to the relative rights of joint tenants, joint owners and partners. In the view taken by the court there is a question lying further back, which is conclusive of the case. Without considering whether Lewis was a tenant or mere employé of Davis, the landlord, there can be little doubt that Richard was a mere employé of Lewis. There was no privity between him and the landlord. He was not known in the contract with Davis. He was neither landlord, tenant nor subtenant of any part of the land. His only contract was with Lewis, who became his employer, and bound to pay him, and, therefore, he was a laborer for hire. This court has lately held, in the case of Carpenter v. Strickland, ante p. 1, that a mere laborer for hire, although employed in the crop, is not a cultivator of the soil in the sense of the act, and is not entitled to give a lien upon any part of the crop, before settlement with his employer.

This case would be perfectly plain if Richard's compensation had been in dollars instead of part of the crop. But in the view that he was to receive for his services part of the crop, it is claimed that he was something more than a mere laborer for *hire—that he was co-tenant, joint-owner or partner of Lewis, with a vested interest in the part of the crop indicated. The fact that he was to be paid in a part of the crop could not change his status. The part of the crop mentioned had reference only to the manner and measure of payment, while the crop, as such, remained the exclusive property of Lewis until settlement between them, which settlement alone could determine whether anything was due on the contract. As was said in the case of Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 85 [40 Am. Rep. 680], "The fact that as an incentive perhaps, to diligent and faithful work, the compensation of the laborer is not a fixed and definite sum of money, but is made to depend upon the amount of the proceeds of his labor, cannot change the relation in which the employé has voluntarily placed himself towards his employer. It certainly cannot, as has been argued, convert the relation into that of partners or joint-owners of the crop. Until the crop is divided, it belongs to the employer, and all that the laborer is entitled to is in the nature of a chose in action, a right to demand compensation for his labor, which by the agreement, is to be measured by the amount of the crop raised. Rogers v. Collier, 2 Bailey 581 [23 Am. Dec. 153]," and other authorities.

We think that Richard had not the right to make the alleged lien to J. T. Ellis & Bros., before settlement with Lewis, and that all the proceedings under it were void.

Besides this was a law case in which only the title to the property was involved. In deciding it, the court could not, for several reasons, stop to state the account between Lewis and Richard, in order to ascertain their respective shares, especially as the contest was between strangers, and neither Lewis nor Richard were parties before the court. In our view the legal title was in Lewis and passed to his alienees. If Richard has not received his full share, his remedy is against Lewis as upon a chose in action.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

NOTE.—In connection with the foregoing case, was heard the case of Lewis Sanders against J. F. C. DuPre. DuPre, as *sheriff, under the same lien of Ellis & Bros., against Richard Sanders, levied upon some seed cotton and the ungathered crop of Lewis Sanders, and sold them for $41.83. Lewis Sanders then brought action against the sheriff and Ellis Bros., demanding the same judgment as in the principal case. The verdict was for plaintiff for about one-half of the amount claimed. From the charges and refusals to charge of Judge Cothran, the defendants appealed upon the same grounds, so far as applicable, as were raised in the appeal of Richey & Miller v. DuPre.

December 12th, 1883. The following order was passed by

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The above-stated case having been heard, by consent of counsel, in connection with the case of Richey & Miller v. DuPre, as sheriff, and J. T. Ellis & Bros., the judgment in that case is conclusive of this case. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

20 S. C. 12

STATE v. WILLIAMS.

Under an act authorizing the governor to appoint a supervisor of registration, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, if in session, and, if not in session, subject to its approval at its next session, and which act declared that the term of office of such supervisor should be two years, the term of office of a supervisor appointed during vacation was not for the term of two years, but was merely provisional, and terminated when the senate, at its next session, adjourned without approval of the appointment.

The "next session," within the meaning of this statute, meant the next session, in fact, whether special or regular.

A supervisor appointed by the governor in vacation, and nominated to the senate at its next session, which was a special session, but not confirmed, and seven months afterwards elected clerk of court, was not elected clerk during the term for which he was appointed supervisor.

[4. Officers ⇐30.]

As the constitution declares that every qualified voter shall be eligible to every office elective by the people, unless laboring under some one of the disabilities mentioned in the constitution, a statute which declares a supervisor of registration to be ineligible to any other office during the term for which he is appointed is unconstitutional and void.

*This was a proceeding in the original jurisdiction of this court, it being an information in the nature of quo warranto, filed on January 23d, 1883, in the name of the State of South Carolina, by C. Richardson Miles, attorney-general, against Joseph J. Williams, praying for a rule to show cause, and for judgment of ouster. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. St. J. Jervey, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

September 24th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a proceeding in the original jurisdiction of this court to oust the defendant from the office of clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Berkeley county, upon the ground that he was not eligible to said office by reason of his having been elected thereto during the term for which he had been appointed supervisor of registration for said county.

There was no controversy as to the facts, which are as follows: On March 1st, 1882, Williams was appointed by the governor supervisor of registration for Berkeley county, was commissioned on the thirteenth of that month, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office. The general assembly met in extra session on June 27th, 1882, and was adjourned sine die on July 5th, 1882. On the last-mentioned day the governor informed the senate of Williams' appointment, and that body failed or refused to approve the same. On July 24th, 1882, the governor sent to the secretary of State the following notice: "Removed J. J. Williams, supervisor of registration, and appointed P. J. Couturier, of St. Stephens, as supervisor of registration for Berkeley county in his stead." Couturier was commissioned for the unexpired term July 31st, 1882, and on November 28th, 1882, the governor informed the senate, which was then in session, of Couturier's appointment, which was approved by that body. Williams was elected clerk on November 7th, 1882.

Stat. 1111) incorporated *in the general statutes of 1882 as section 91, providing for the appointment of supervisors of registration, reads as follows: "On or before the first day of March next, and on or before the same day in every second year thereafter, the governor shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, if in session, and, if not in session, subject to the approval of the senate at its next session, and subject to removal by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, one competent and discreet person in each county, who shall be a qualified voter thereof, and who shall hold his office at the county seat, who shall be known as the supervisor of registration of such county. * * * The term of his office shall be for two years from the date of his appointment; he shall continue in office until his successor shall be appointed, and shall qualify; and he shall not be eligible to any other office during the term for which he is appointed."

The case of the plaintiff rests upon the proposition that Williams was appointed supervisor for the term of two years from March 1st, 1882, and that by the express terms of the act above quoted he was not eligible to any other office during said term; and, hence, that his election as clerk was a nullity.

The terms of the act are somewhat peculiar—different from the language usually employed in such cases. The act does not, as is usually the case, declare that the appointee to the office of supervisor of registration shall be ineligible to any other whilst he holds the office of supervisor; but its terms are, "shall not be eligible to any other office during the term for which he is appointed." Hence, the mere fact that the defendant was out of office as supervisor, either by removal, resignation or otherwise, at the time he was elected clerk, would not affect the question. The real inquiry is, whether Williams was elected clerk during the term for which he was appointed supervisor. If he was, then, under the express terms of the act, he would be ineligible to the office of clerk, and, the election being a nullity, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment of ouster.

What, then, was the term for which Williams was appointed supervisor? Was it for two years from March 1st, 1882, or did it expire upon the failure or refusal of the senate, at its next *session, to approve the appointment made by the governor? It will be observed that the act does not give to the governor the unqualified power of appointment; but its language is, "the governor shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, if in session, and, if not in session, subject to the approval of the senate at its next session." It is clear, therefore, that if the senate is in session at the time, the governor cannot make any valid appointment without the approval of that body. If, however, the senate is not in session, he may make an appointment "subject to the approval of the senate at its next session." That is, the appointment made by the governor is provisional merely, and, unless approved by the senate at its next session, terminates with such session.

The court is bound to take judicial notice of the fact, that the senate was not in session on March 1st, 1882, when the governor made the appointment of Williams as supervisor of registration, and therefore such appointment was provisional merely, and expired with the next session of the senate, at which, it is conceded, there was no approval of said appointment. The governor, without the approval of the senate, had no power to appoint a supervisor of registration for the term of two years. He could only appoint for a term ending with the next session of the senate, unless that body approved his appointment, and as there was no such approval, the term for which Williams was appointed expired on July 5th, 1882, when the next session of the senate terminated without approving the appointment made by the governor. The subsequent act of the governor, on July 24th, 1882, in removing Williams from office was a work of supererogation, and cannot affect the question. The term for which Williams had been appointed had then expired, and, being out of office, no removal was necessary.

It may be said that the words "next session" in the act above quoted should, under the authority of Arnold v. McKellar, 9 S. C. 335, be construed to mean next regular annual meeting, and, if so, then the term for which Williams had been appointed supervisor of registration had not expired when the election for clerk was held, inasmuch as the next regular session of the senate had not terminated, and indeed had not commenced, on Novem*ber 7th, 1882, when the election for clerk was held, and hence that Williams was then ineligible to that office. The construction given to the words in question, or rather very similar words, in Arnold v. McKellar, is fully vindicated by the reasons stated in that case; but no such reasons apply here, and therefore we are bound to give the words in question their usual and ordinary signification. It seems to us, therefore, that Williams was not elected clerk during the term for which he had been appointed supervisor of registration, and therefore he was not ineligible to the said office of clerk.

But even if it should be conceded that Williams was appointed supervisor of registration for the full term of two years from March 1st, 1882, it would be far from clear that the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment of ouster, for it may well be doubted whether that provision of the act quoted which declares a person appointed to the office of supervisor of registration ineligible to any other office during the term for which he has been appointed, is constitutional. Section 31 of Article I, is as follows: "All elections shall be free and open, and every inhabitant of this commonwealth, possessing the qualifications provided for in this constitution, shall have an equal right to elect officers, and be elected to fill public office." Section 7, of Article VIII, is in the following language: "Every person entitled to vote at an election shall be eligible to any office which now is, or hereafter shall be, elective by the people in the county where he shall have resided sixty days previous to such election, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, or the constitution and laws of the United States."

From the clauses of the constitution above quoted it would seem to follow that every qualified voter is eligible "to any office which now is, or hereafter shall be, elective by the people in the county where he shall have resided sixty days previous to such election," unless he labors under some one of the disabilities mentioned in the constitution. This being a right guaranteed to every voter by the organic law, cannot certainly be taken away or abridged by any mere legislative provision. It is not pretended that the defendant labored under any one of the disabilities mentioned in the constitution, and it follows necessarily *that any act of the general assembly designed to impose upon him any other disability would be unconstitutional and void.

The office of clerk of the Court of Common Pleas is an office "elective by the people," and the fact that the election at which Williams was elected took place during the term for which he had been appointed supervisor of registration, could not render him ineligible to such office, as that is not one of the causes of ineligibility provided for in the constitution, and it is beyond the competency of the legislature to add another cause of ineligibility to those provided for in that instrument. The language of the constitution is affirmative, not negative merely. It in effect declares that every qualified voter shall be eligible to any elective office, unless he labors under some one of the disabilities mentioned in the constitution; and hence any attempt on the part of the legislature to add any other disability, would be in direct conflict with the positive mandate of the constitution, and, therefore, void.

The judgment of this court is that the rule be discharged and that the information be dismissed.

REESE v. LYON.

After default, the mortgagees of a chattel seized it; on the next day they refused to surrender possession to the mortgagor upon demand made and a tender by him of the debt and costs, unless they were also paid an unsecured claim held by them against him. Subsequently, they sold the chattel; and, afterwards, this action was instituted by the mortgagor against the mortgagees to recover the possession and for damages. Held, that the action could not be sustained as an action for claim and delivery, as the plaintiff had no title nor right to possession after seizure on condition broken.

*Before Mackey, J., Sumter, October, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Jos. H. Earle, for appellant.

Messrs. J. J. Dargan and Marion Moise, contra.

September 24th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was commenced, as to the appellant, James W. Lyon, on February 12th, 1878; the other copartner, Samuel H. Lyon, not having been served with the summons, never became a party to the action. The case, as made by the testimony for the plaintiff, was, substantially, as follows: On February 5th, 1877, the plaintiff executed a mortgage to Lyon Bros. & Co. on certain personal property to secure the payment of a debt of $90 on or before October 15th, 1877. After default in payment of the mortgage debt, to wit, on January 10th, 1878, the mortgagees seized the mortgaged property and took it into their possession, and on the next day plaintiff tendered to them the amount of the mortgage debt, together with the expenses of seizure, and demanded a return of the property. With this demand the mortgagees refused to comply, unless the plaintiff would also pay an additional amount, in which it was alleged the plaintiff had become indebted to the mortgagees after the execution of the mortgage, which additional indebtedness was, however, denied by the plaintiff. The plaintiff having refused to pay this additional sum, the property was sold at public sale under the mortgage, whereupon this action was brought, which, in form, appears to be an action to recover the possession of the mortgaged property, together with damages for its detention.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony, a motion for non-suit was made upon the ground that, under the showing made, the action could not be maintained, "whether the same be considered an action of claim and delivery of personal property, or an action in the nature of a bill to redeem." The Circuit judge refused the motion, "and ruled that the plaintiff could not *recover in an action of claim and delivery of personal property, or under a bill to redeem; but that the plaintiff would be entitled, under his complaint upon the case as proved by him, to a verdict for damages, because of the detention and sale of the mortgaged property by the defendants after tender to them of the amount due under the mortgage, together with the costs of seizure, although such seizure of the mortgaged property was made by the defendants after condition broken." To this the defendant duly excepted.

The testimony for defendants, in addition to what had been shown by the plaintiff, was to the effect that after the execution of the mortgage the plaintiff became further indebted to them in the sum of $160; and that the mortgaged property brought, at the sale, the sum of $135.

The appellant requested the Circuit judge to charge the jury: "That it was the duty of the plaintiff to have tendered to the defendants the whole amount of the mortgage debt, and also the amount of his subsequent indebtedness to them." This his Honor refused to do; and, on the contrary, charged the jury: "That the amount of the mortgage debt being tendered the mortgagees, together with the costs of seizure, the mortgagor was entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property, notwithstanding any subsequent indebtedness of the mortgagor to the mortgagees, and without tendering such indebtedness, this not being a bill to redeem." And he also charged: "That the plaintiff being entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property from the time that he tendered to the defendants the amount of the mortgage debt, together with the costs of the seizure; that if such amounts were tendered as alleged, and if the defendants, refusing such tender, detained and sold the property, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages in this action;" to all of which the appellant duly excepted. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $105, and from the judgment entered on such verdict, the defendant, James W. Lyon, appeals, relying upon the points made by his exceptions as above stated.

Without stopping to remark upon the apparent inconsistency between the ruling of the Circuit judge, upon the motion for a *non-suit and his charge to the jury, we will proceed to consider and determine the real questions which we understand to be raised by this appeal. The fundamental inquiry is as to the effect of the tender of the mortgage debt made after breach of the condition of the mortgage, and after the mortgaged property had been taken into possession by the mortgagees under the mortgage. There can be no doubt that upon breach of the condition of a mortgage of personal property the legal title to the property mortgaged becomes vested in the mortgagee. Wolf v. O'Farrel, 1 Tr. Con. Rep. 151, more fully reported under the title of Wolff v. Farrell, 3 Brev. 68; Trescott v. Smith, 1 McCord Ch. 486. The question then is, Does a tender, not accepted after condition broken, revest the title in the mortgagor? If it did, then, as Chancellor Harper says, in Walling v. Aiken, McMull. Eq. 15, there would be no necessity for the mortgagor to invoke the aid of a court of equity by a bill to redeem, as he would have a complete remedy at law. Accordingly, it is laid down in books of established authority that a tender after condition broken of the mortgage debt, which is not accepted, will not revest the title in the mortgagor. Jones Chat. M. 633; 2 Hilliard Mort. 536; 2 Jones Mort., §§ 892, 1798; Patchin v. Pierce, 12 Wend. 61.

It is true, that in some of the States it is now held that a tender of the mortgage debt, made after breach of the condition, discharges the lien of a mortgage of real estate, because there, as well as in this State, the legal title does not pass even after breach of the condition; and it may be that here also a tender, after breach of the condition of a mortgage of real estate, of which the mortgagor remains in possession, would be held to be a discharge of the lien of the mortgage, inasmuch as the legal title never passed. But that question is not now before us, and we are not to be understood as passing upon it. Here, we are dealing with a mortgage of personal property, under which the legal title unquestionably does pass upon breach of the condition, and the common law rule applies, under which the tender cannot have the effect of revesting the title in the mortgagor.

It is quite clear that the mortgagees committed no violation of the rights of the mortgagor in seizing the mortgaged property upon default in the payment of the mortgage debt; and we *think it equally clear that the subsequent tender of the mortgage debt did not destroy the right of the mortgagees, as legal owners, to sell the property. The only rights which the mortgagor had, after breach of the condition of the mortgage, were either to bring an action to redeem the mortgaged property, which, of course, must have been commenced before the foreclosure of the mortgage by a sale, or an action against the mortgagees to account for any surplus proceeds of the sale which might remain after satisfying the mortgage debt. This action, not having been commenced until after the sale, cannot be maintained as an action to redeem; and the plaintiff's only right, as mortgagor, was to an account of the proceeds of the sale, and to such an action the mortgagees would certainly have a right to set up any claim, whether secured by the mortgage or not, which they may have against the mortgagor. Such an action would be based upon the foundation of the implied contract of the mortgagees to pay back to the mortgagor the surplus proceeds of the sale, and any claim arising out of contract could be set up by the mortgagees as a counter-claim to such action.

Even in an action to redeem, the common law rule was that the mortgagor must pay not only the mortgage debt but also any other unsecured claim held by the mortgagee against the mortgagor; and this rule has been adopted in this State when the legal title is vested in the mortgagee. Walling v. Aiken, McMull. Eq. 1. Whether this rule would apply in the case of a formal mortgage of real estate, under which the mortgagor retained possession, we are not now called upon to decide. But where a mortgagor goes into a court of equity and asks to have a deed, absolute in form, construed to be nothing more than a mortgage, and asks to redeem, or where a mortgagor comes to redeem a mortgage of personal property, under which the legal title is always vested in the mortgagee upon condition broken, then, as he is asking the aid of equity, he is required to do equity by paying all that may be due by him to the mortgagor, whether secured by the mortgage or not.

The rule is different where the action is brought by the mortgagee to foreclose the mortgage. There the action being based upon the contract to pay the mortgage debt, the mortgagee is *entitled to recover no more than the amount secured by such contract. Hence, the cases of Magwood v. Lubbock, Bailey Eq. *382; McCaughrin & Co. v. Williams, 15 S. C. 505, and Walker v. Walker, 17 S. C. 329, cited by respondent's counsel, which were, in effect, cases to foreclose a mortgage, do not apply. So, too, the case of Hunter v. Wardlaw & Edwards, 6 S. C. 74, was a case in which a mortgagee of personal property attempted to foreclose by seizure and sale after the mortgage debt was paid, as the court held, and, therefore, there was then no breach of the condition of the mortgage, and, consequently, the legal title never vested in the mortgagee.

We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in his charge to the jury; and that the case, as made by the plaintiff, cannot be sustained. It certainly cannot be maintained as an action of claim and delivery of personal property, for the plaintiff had no legal title, and no right to the possession of the property sued for. Nor can it be maintained as an action to redeem, as it was not commenced until after the foreclosure of the mortgage by seizure and sale. Nor is there any foundation upon which to rest an action for damages, as it does not appear that the defendants have committed any wrongful act. They had a right to seize and sell the property as they have done, and they cannot be made responsible in damages for so doing. The only right which the plaintiff has is to require an account from his mortgagees of the proceeds of the sale, in which accounting the defendants must be allowed credit, not only for the mortgage debt, with the expenses properly incident to the seizure and sale of the mortgaged property, but also for any unsecured claims which the defendants, upon such accounting, may be able to establish against the plaintiff.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect the views herein announced, with leave to the plaintiff, if he shall be so advised, to amend his complaint so as to enable him to demand an accounting from the mortgagees of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property upon the principles hereinbefore laid down.

*LAKE v. SHUMATE.

L. purchased at public sale a tract of land for M., paid the greater part of the purchase-money, and took titles in his own name, M. giving to L. a note for such his payment, and himself paying the balance, under a verbal agreement that L. should convey to M. when this note was paid. Subsequently M., being in possession, mortgaged this land to D., which mortgage was duly recorded. L. died and his widow became sole owner of the legal title to the land, and also of M.'s note to her husband, and afterwards, regarding such title as her security, she made a loan to M. of money belonging to a ward of whom she was guardian. Some years later, M. gave to this widow a new note for the balance due to her upon his two notes so held by her, she never having had actual notice of the mortgage to D. In action by the widow to have D.'s mortgage canceled and for other relief, this land was sold. Held, that D.'s mortgage was not entitled to receive any part of the proceeds of sale until after full payment to L.'s widow of the moneys due to her on M.'s consolidated note.

The fact that the money lent by the widow belonged to her as guardian, while the original debt was due to her individually, does not affect her rights in the matter.

In a contest between M. and L., M. could not demand titles without paying all of his indebtedness to L.; and D., under his mortgage of M.'s interest in the land, can claim only such interest—and that is, what remains after paying to the heir of L. the balance of the purchase-money and all other debts due to her by M.

If actual notice of the mortgage to D. was had before other money was lent to M. by L. or his widow, the mortgage would be preferred to such subsequent loans, but neither possession of the premises by M., nor the record of the mortgage, were sufficient to charge the holder of the legal title with notice.

Before Cothran, J., Greenville, November, 1882.

The appeal in this cause came to this court under the title of Mary P. Lake against W. T. Shumate, administrator of J. P. Moore, deceased, T. C. Gower, J. N. Greer, W. A. Williams and Samuel J. Douthit, Judge of Probate for Greenville county. The action was commenced in the life-time of J. P. Moore, not later than April, 1879. The complaint stated the facts of the case and prayed judgment "that the cloud upon her title be removed, that *the mortgage to the defendant Douthit be marked satisfied, and that she may have such other and further relief as the nature of the circumstances of the case may require, and to the court shall seem wise and just."

Answers were filed by Moore, Douthit, Williams and Greer, and the last three asked for a sale of the land, the subject-matter of the action. It was sold in the fall of 1879, under a decretal order of Judge Fraser—for how much does not appear. The facts which gave rise to this controversy are stated in the opinion of this court.

The decree of the Circuit judge, omitting its statement, was as follows:

Assuming that Moore had the right to give the mortgage in question to the Probate judge, and that the latter had the right to take the same as a valid and legal security (for without such assumption there is no case presented here), the question for consideration and determination now may be thus stated: Has the plaintiff here paramount right to be paid that portion of her debt for money advanced to Moore after the execution of the mortgage to the Probate judge; or is she to be limited to the sum with interest, which was advanced by Dr. Lake for Moore, with a claim as to the balance subordinate to the rights of the mortgagee? There is not enough to satisfy both.

The case was argued by the plaintiff's counsel as one of tacking, but I have no hesitation in saying that that iniquitous doctrine does not prevail in this State or in this country, where, in the language of Chancellor Kent, "by the operation of the registration laws, it has been torn up by the roots." If, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to the whole of her demand, her right to it must rest upon other ground than this.

It cannot be denied that if the mortgage were out of the way, and Moore were here asserting his right to specific performance, he would be required to do equity by paying up the whole amount due by him before the court would enforce such right. Did his mortgage to the Probate judge convey anything except the right which he had to have the contract with Dr. Lake *specifically performed? That was all the interest that he had in the subject-matter, and it was all he could transfer to another.

Assuming that Moore had a mortgageable interest in the lot (see Witte v. Wolfe, 16 S. C. 256,) it must follow that the recording of such mortgage would be all that the law requires to affect any one who afterwards should take a mortgage of the same estate. But it by no means follows that the plaintiff here, who already had the legal estate, can be affected by such notice. This the law calls constructive notice, and it differs very essentially from that other kind of notice which gives actual knowledge and thereby affects the conscience. This actual knowledge the plaintiff, it appears, did not have, and in the absence of it, in good faith relying upon the legal title, she should be protected and secured. Nor was she bound to look down the line from the point of her legal title for subsequent incumbrances. Nothing short of actual knowledge of such could affect her—constructive notice was not sufficient. See National Bank of Chester v. Gunhouse, 17 S. C. 489.

This position derives valuable support from the analogous and well established principle of a release of his lien upon a portion of the premises by a senior mortgagee with actual knowledge of the existence of a second mortgage upon the premises. In such case the senior mortgagee must abate a proportionate part of his debt. But the mere record of such second mortgage does not affect the first mortgagee. See Jones Mort., § 562. "It would not be reasonable to subject the mortgagee to the constant necessity of investigating transactions between the mortgagor and third persons subsequent to the mortgage." Continuing, the same author says: "A subsequent purchaser takes his title with full knowledge of the mortgage, and if he wishes to protect himself he should notify the mortgagee of his purchase. The record is constructive notice only to subsequent or those claiming under the same grantor." Ibid., § 723. And this is the case of mortgages pure and simple. Surely the holder of the legal title, as in the case at bar, could not be placed in worse condition.

It is true, as contended for by the defendants, that Dr. Lake's title from Dr. Furman, although absolute in its terms, must be construed to be only a mortgage in fact. But it must be con*strued by the court to be so, for in its terms it is not a mortgage, but an absolute deed, and in putting upon it the construction demanded, the court would be derelict in duty if it failed or refused to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case; and conspicuous amongst these are (1) the security which ought always to attach to the possession of the legal title; (2) the further loans of money upon the faith of it, and (3) the ignorance of the actual existence of the intervening mortgage to the Probate judge.

Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged and decreed, that the plaintiff, Mary P. Lake, is entitled to have judgment in full of her demands against the defendant, James P. Moore, as ascertained and set down by the master in his report, from the proceeds of the sale of the lot in question.

Let the plaintiff have judgment against the defendants for her costs and disbursements.

From this decree the defendants appealed upon the following exceptions (omitting the first, which is immaterial):

2. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to the full amount of the $4,000 note, the master having found that there was no agreement between the late J. P. Moore and Mrs. Lake, when the $1,300 was loaned him by her as guardian, that the house and lot should stand as security for that amount in addition to the other note. The decree should have been for the amount due on the $2,200 note, then for the amount due the defendant Douthit and then for the $1,300 note to plaintiff.

3. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the plaintiff, Mrs. Lake, was not affected with notice by the recording of the mortgage from J. P. Moore to the defendant Douthit, Probate judge.

4. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the defendant Douthit occupied the same position that J. P. Moore did, by the taking of the mortgage, and that before he could have had a specific performance from Dr. Lake, he (Douthit) would have been required to pay off both of these notes.

5. "Because the Circuit judge erred in decreeing that the *plaintiff was entitled to the whole amount due on the two notes, when it appears from the testimony that the mortgage executed to Douthit was before the second loan was made, which second loan was by her in a different right, to wit: as guardian of her minor son, T. E. Lake.

6. "Because the defendant, Moore, being in possession of the house and lot in question, exercising acts of ownership over the same, paying no rents and paying the taxes on the same, which facts being well known to the plaintiff and being sufficient in law to put her on the inquiry, she is estopped from disclaiming actual knowledge of the Douthit mortgage, or other equities prior to the second loan. The Circuit judge erred in holding that actual knowledge was necessary to bind her.

7. "Because the Circuit judge, having held that 'Dr. Lake's title from Dr. Furman, although absolute in its terms, must be construed to be only a mortgage in fact,' and having admitted that the plaintiff occupied no higher position in this matter than Dr. Lake, erred in holding that defendant Douthit's mortgage was postponed until the second advance of money made by the plaintiff to Moore was paid.

8. "Because the Circuit judge, having held that the title from Dr. Furman to Dr. Lake was nothing more than a mortgage, then on the principle 'Once a mortgage always a mortgage' the claim should have been decreed to be paid according to their respective priorities.

9. "Because this being an equity proceeding, and the lands having been ordered sold upon the suggestion of the answers of the defendants, the Circuit judge should have provided for the costs to be paid out of the funds in the hands of the court and not by the defendants personally."

September 24th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case, as gathered from the decree of the Circuit judge, are substantially as follows: On January 4th, 1870, the late Dr. Lake, the husband of the plaintiff, through his nephew, James P. Moore, bought, at public sale, the tract of land over the proceeds of sale of which the present controversy arises, and titles were duly made to him. Five hundred dollars of the purchase-money was paid at the time by Moore, and the balance, amounting to something over $2,000, was paid by Lake. The purchase was, in fact, made for Moore, who went into possession under an agreement with Dr. Lake, that titles were to be made to Moore when he refunded the amount paid by Dr. Lake, for which amount Moore gave his note to Dr. Lake. Moore made valuable improvements on the land, and continued in possession until the same was sold under an order in this cause. Moore having died pending the action, the same was continued against his administrator, as we suppose, though that fact does not appear in the "Case."

On September 16th, 1871, Moore became the guardian of his co-defendant, Williams, gave bond as such to the Probate judge, Douthit, with defendant Gower as his surety; and also gave a mortgage of the said land as additional security to the Probate judge, Douthit, which was duly recorded. Soon afterwards, the Probate judge, either doubting his right to take that kind of security, or learning that Moore did not hold the legal title to the premises mortgaged, required additional personal security, *whereupon the defendant Greer signed the bond as an additional surety.

In September, 1872, Dr. Lake died intestate; and in the same month, the plaintiff and the heirs of Dr. Lake, all being sui juris, entered into an agreement by which the latter conveyed to the former all their interest in the land in question. In the settlement of Dr. Lake's estate, on May 12th, 1873, the note of Moore to Dr. Lake above referred to, then amounting to something over $2,000, was assigned to the plaintiff as part of her share of her husband's estate. On October 13th, 1874, the plaintiff, as guardian of one T. E. Lake, loaned to Moore other moneys amounting to $1,300; and afterwards, on August 7th, 1877, the balance due on these two notes was consolidated, and a new note given by Moore to the plaintiff, individually, for something over $4,000.

These transactions between Moore and the plaintiff were, as she says, based upon the security she felt in the possession of the legal title to the land, and were made without any actual notice of the existence of the mortgage to Douthit, which, however, was duly recorded in the proper office. Although the plaintiff made the subsequent loan to Moore upon the faith of the security she felt in the possession of the legal title to the land, there was no evidence of any special agreement between her and Moore that the land should stand as security for such further loan.

It was conceded that so much of the note held by the plaintiff, as represented the balance due on the note originally given by Moore to Dr. Lake, should be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the land; and the only controversy was whether the balance of the note now held by plaintiff, representing the amount due on the loan made by plaintiff to Moore, after the execution of the mortgage to Douthit as Probate judge, was entitled to priority over said mortgage. The Circuit judge held that such balance was entitled to priority over said mortgage, and from his decree defendants appeal.

We concur with the Circuit judge in the conclusion which he has reached. We are unable to see how the fact that the loan made by the plaintiff to Moore was originally made in her *capacity as guardian of T. E. Lake, can affect the question. She was responsible to her ward for the money loaned, and was legally entitled to enforce payment of the same. It was not the case of a chose in action belonging to her ward, assigned by her to Moore, but it was money in her hands which it was her duty to invest, and which she had a right to call in whenever she thought proper so to do. More than this, she did call in the investment of her ward's funds, and took a new note payable to herself individually, and it is upon this new note, and not upon the one payable to herself as guardian, that she now bases her claim. If the note now held by her does, in fact, represent funds of her ward, he may have an equity to pursue the same. But for aught we know he may have been settled with by plaintiff, and if so, then she would be equitably as well as legally entitled to the note. At all events, we do not see what concern either Moore or his mortgagee had in the matter.

There is no doubt that, under the facts proved, Moore would be entitled to demand from the plaintiff specific performance of the agreement between himself and Dr. Lake. But when he invoked the aid of a court of equity for that purpose, that court would require him to do equity by paying, not only the balance due on the purchase-money, but also any other indebtedness which he may have incurred to Dr. Lake, or to the plaintiff who stands in his shoes. Walling v. Aiken, McMull. Eq. 1; Secrest v. McKenna, 1 Strobh. Eq. 356. Hence, if the contest here was between the plaintiff and Moore, there is no doubt but that the plaintiff would be entitled to payment of the whole amount of her demands.

But it is contended that the result must be different when the contest is between the plaintiff and Douthit, as mortgagee of Moore. Although Moore never held the legal title, and was entitled only to an equitable estate, yet, under the authorities, (Roddy v. Elam, 12 Rich. Eq. 343; Witte v. Wolfe, 16 S. C. 256,) such an estate can be made the subject of a mortgage. Assuming, then, for the purposes of this case, that the Probate judge had a right to take this kind of security, and that the Douthit mortgage is a valid one, the inquiry next presented is whether the mortgagee of Moore stands in any better position *than he does. The mortgage to Douthit did not operate as a transfer of Moore's estate in land, but it only impressed a lien upon such estate which could only be enforced to the extent of Moore's interest, which, as we have seen, was only what might remain after paying, not only the balance due on the purchase-money, but also any other debts that might be due by him to the holder of the legal title. Douthit cannot claim as assignee of Moore; his only claim is to enforce his lien upon Moore's interest, whatever that may be.

If, however, the plaintiff had loaned money to Moore after notice of his mortgage to Douthit, then, upon a plain, equitable principle, such loan would be postponed to the lien of such mortgage, as otherwise a fraud might be practiced upon Douthit in which the plaintiff, having notice, would be a participant. But in the absence of notice, which it would have been very easy for Douthit to have given, we see no reason why the case should be taken out of the operation of the general rule. The plaintiff as owner of the legal title loaned her money upon the faith of the security which she thus held, and it would be inequitable now to deprive her of such security or postpone it to a lien of which she had no notice.

Our next inquiry then is, Did the plaintiff, at the time she loaned her money to Moore, have notice of the lien of the Douthit mortgage? It is conceded that she had no actual notice, but the appellants contend that she had constructive notice, first, by the fact that Moore was in possession; second, by the record of the Douthit mortgage. It is quite true that when one purchases land of which a person, other than the vendor, is in possession, such possession is notice to him. But notice of what? Why simply, that the party so in possession may have some claim which he had better inquire into. Moore's possession, therefore, was only notice to the world that he had some kind of claim to the land, which, upon proper inquiry, would have been found to be a claim of a person in possession under a contract to purchase, with the right to enforce specific performance upon payment of the balance due by him. But how his possession could be regarded as notice of the Douthit mortgage we are unable to conceive.

*Next, as to the notice which is claimed to be derived from the recording of the Douthit mortgage. This of course would only be constructive notice, and the question, therefore, is narrowed down to the inquiry whether constructive notice, derived from the recording of the Douthit mortgage, would be sufficient in a case of this kind. No case directly in point has been cited nor have we been able to find one, but, reasoning from analogous cases, we are satisfied that mere recording is not sufficient notice in a case of this kind. In addition to the analogy mentioned by the Circuit judge in his decree, derived from the rule in regard to the release of the lien of a mortgage upon a portion of the mortgaged premises without actual notice of a junior mortgage, as laid down in 1 Jones Mort., § 562, we may mention another analogy drawn from the rule in regard to a mortgage to secure future advances, as laid down in 1 Jones Mort., § 372. According to that rule a mortgagee under such a mortgage is not affected with notice by the record of a junior mortgage, and he may with safety continue to make advances subsequent to the recording of such second mortgage which will be protected by the lien of his mortgage. But any advance made after actual notice of such second mortgage will not be so protected.

Indeed, the rule as laid down in Jones Mort., §§ 557, 558, 562 and 723, seems to be that recording is only notice to subsequent purchasers and creditors, and that as to a prior mortgagee it is not even constructive notice. As is said in section 723, "A subsequent purchaser takes his title with full knowledge of the mortgage, and if he wishes to protect himself he should notify the mortgagee of his purchase. The record is constructive notice only to subsequent purchasers, or those claiming under the same grantor." The same rule would of course apply to a subsequent creditor secured by a mortgage. According to these authorities the recording of the Douthit mortgage did not operate even as constructive notice to the plaintiff. As the Circuit judge has well said, if these rules apply to the case of a formal legal mortgage, with how much more force should they apply in a case like this, where a legal title is construed to operate as a mortgage!

to cover indebtedness other than that intended to be secured by the mortgage, apply only to legal and formal mortgages, and not to a case like this where the court is asked to construe a strictly legal title as a mortgage. In such a case, the rule, as we have seen, is that when the court is asked to decree specific performance, or that the mortgagor, so called, may be allowed to redeem, the vendee will be required to pay not only the balance due on the purchase-money, but also any other debts which he may owe the vendor. Walling v. Aiken; Secrest v. McKenna, supra. In fact the transaction may be regarded, in equity, as a mortgage to secure not only the balance of the purchase-money, but also all future advances, and the rule, as we have seen, in such a case is, that nothing but actual notice of a subsequent incumbrance will be sufficient to postpone the lien for such advances to the lien of such subsequent incumbrance.

So, too, the remark made by Chancellor Harper, in Walling v. Aiken, relied on by the appellants, that the rule requiring a mortgagor coming to redeem to pay not only the mortgage debt, but also all that he might owe the mortgagee, did not apply when an assignee or creditor of the mortgagor brought his bill to redeem, was manifestly made in reference to a case involving a purely formal mortgage, and was not intended to apply to a case like this, for he immediately afterwards proceeded to draw a marked distinction between the two cases, and held that while a tender by the mortgagor at the day appointed of the amount of the mortgage debt would have the effect of revesting the legal title in the mortgagor, thereby rendering it unnecessary for him to invoke the aid of the Court of Equity, yet it could have no such effect in a case like that then before the court, and that, therefore, notwithstanding the tender had been made at the day appointed for the payment of the debt, the mortgagor, so called, must pay all that he owed.

In addition to this, it must be remembered that the remark of the distinguished chancellor, so much relied upon by the appellants, was made in a case in which the rights of assignees or *creditors were not involved, and was, therefore, a mere passing observation. Whether the question of notice would not be a material and necessary inquiry is not stated or even alluded to, as it need not have been, inasmuch as the case then under consideration did not call for any careful statement of the rule with its necessary qualifications.

We do not desire to be understood as intimating any opinion upon the question whether a mortgagor, under a strictly formal mortgage of real estate, who is in possession of the mortgaged premises, is bound, when he brings his bill to redeem, to pay not only the mortgage debt, but also any other debt which he may owe the mortgagee. That question is not involved in the present controversy and has not been discussed, and is not intended to be decided.

In cases of this kind the question of costs is a matter addressed to the discretion of the Circuit Court, and we see no reason for interfering with the matter.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Kershaw, February, 1882.

*This was an action by W. T. Bell and M. A. Gordon, grandchildren of Willis B. Huckabee, against Annie E. Bell and others, grandchildren, and J. J. Huckabee and others, children, of W. B. Huckabee, and against Witte Brothers. The facts connected with the claim of Witte Brothers are stated in the opinion of this court. Omitting this statement from the master's report, it was otherwise as follows:

The master respectfully reports that, in obedience to the order of reference in this case, evidence and testimony have been taken and herewith submitted. There seem to be three leading questions in the case, each of which will be stated, and conclusions of fact and law set forth.

I. The claims of Joseph J. Huckabee against the estate of his father, Willis B. Huckabee, to be paid his share of the crops made by them, working together on the farm, and also for one-third of the Nelson tract of land—370 acres. Joseph J. Huckabee testified that he worked with his father on this land from 1852 to 1872, except four years when he was in the army. His services were for overseeing and managing the farm, plowing, doing wood and blacksmith work; that his services were worth $300 per annum, and he had four hands (slaves) in the crop up to 1865; that his father was old and infirm, and unable to manage the farm. Proof is by other witnesses to same effect, that Joseph J. Huckabee did execute this work as stated above; and further, that during the war, Joseph J. Huckabee, his wife, his four children and eighteen slaves, W. G. Huckabee, wife, three children and two slaves, A. A. Huckabee, wife and three children, all lived on the farm with their father, his wife and daughter; and all these families were supported by the produce of the farm, which was chiefly provisions and little cotton, and the products were chiefly used in supporting the family and farm, and in paying taxes and tithes; that the father, Willis B. Huckabee, died April 3d, 1875, and J. J. Huckabee has never rendered any demand to his executor for any debt due to him by his father; that he confessed a judgment to his father on February 24th, 1874, for $2,905, for a note dated August 13th, 1873, due at one day, given by him and W. G. Huckabee, for a store account, as they both testified to. To this claim plaintiffs *plead statute of limitations, not having made any demand for it within four years after the death of testator, on April 3d, 1875, until he filed his answer in this case, March 26th, 1881.

Conclusion of Law.—The whole claim is stale and barred by statute of limitations; he never demanded it from W. B. Huckabee in his life-time, but, on the contrary, confessed a judgment to him for a debt due; never demanded same from his brother, the executor of his father; therefore the claim must be rejected.

The demand for one-third of the Nelson tract of land is equally untenable. Whatever contract was made by J. J. Huckabee with his father about the land was merely parol; never demanded to be executed in his life-time, or since his death, by the executor. The testimony on the subject is that of Joseph J. H., who says that he told his father to bid off the land at the sale by the commissioner in equity, and he would help to pay for it by the labor of himself and slaves, on condition that his father would give him his proper share of the land for such work, when the land was paid for. He does not say his father agreed to this proposition, but his father did buy the land, and he paid his proportion of the cost by the labor of himself and slaves. W. G. Huckabee testified that he heard his father say that J. J. Huckabee told him if he would buy the land, he (Joseph J. Huckabee) would come home and work the land and help to pay for it; that his father told him he would do what was right by his son Joseph; that Joseph J. Huckabee did move upon the land and made crops upon it by himself and his slaves, together with his father's slaves, and they, together, did pay for the land; that the labor performed by J. J. Huckabee was that of plowman, manager, blacksmith and carpenter, all of which he performed well and skillfully. All this work was done prior to 1872, when he left the farm and moved off, and two years thereafter he confessed a judgment to his father for $2,905, on a note dated August 13th, 1873, and swore that he owed the note. From this testimony the conclusion of law is reached, that the claim is untenable and barred by the statute of limitations, and should be rejected.

II. A judgment was confessed for $3,006.68 by Joseph J. and W. G. Huckabee to their father, Willis B. Huckabee before *the clerk of the court, on February 24th, 1874, founded on a note dated August 13th, 1873, with interest up to the date of confession, and execution thereon issued; that according to the requisition of law, the two parties confessing the judgment made oath before the clerk of the court on the same day, that the facts set forth in the confession and judgment were true.

Defendants (Witte Bros.) allege in the third section of their answer, that they have no knowledge of this judgment, and pray it may be proved; and they offered testimony to show that there was no consideration for the note on which the judgment was founded, and it was received under protest of plaintiffs. The testimony offered is that of J. J. Huckabee, who testifies that the consideration of the note for $2,905, on which the confession was founded, was a store account due by him and his brother, W. G. Huckabee, to their father; that the reason of confessing the judgment was to prevent creditors, to whom he was bound as surety for others, coming down upon him and breaking him up, as he was threatened to be sued for such surety debts. Willis G. Huckabee testified that the consideration of the note was the store account that he and his brother owed to their father. This is the whole testimony on the subject. I find, therefore, as matter of fact, that there was a valuable and just consideration for the note on which the confession of judgment was founded, and, therefore, as matter of law, that same is valid, subsisting and unpaid.

III. Claims of Witte Brothers. I find the facts as follows: * * *

From these facts I draw the conclusion of law that the note of $2,000 to Witte Bros., by J. J., W. G. and A. A. Huckabee, dated January 20th, 1874, must be regarded as paid—

1. Because J. J. Huckabee made payments to Witte Bros. from the crops of 1874 of larger amounts than $2,000 and interest, and $1,200 agreed to be advanced, and the signers of said note being recognized as sureties only by Witte Bros., had the equity to require such payments to be applied to the payment of those amounts.

2. Because, when Witte Bros. advanced to J. J. Huckabee beyond the $1,200, they gave no notice to the signers of the note *that they were doing so, so that the said signers might protect themselves; that when they advanced beyond the $1,200, the said signers of the said note were not bound by it.

3. Because this note was due on December 1st, 1874, and by the taking of new securities and extending the time for payments of said debt for which the note was collateral, Witte Bros. have released the securities.

4. Because the advances made by Witte Bros. to J. J. Huckabee beyond the $1,200 provided for by the mortgage, were made subsequent to the date of the confession of judgment by J. J. Huckabee, and must be postponed to that judgment under the authority of Ror. Jud. Sale, § 824.

5. Because, by the authority of Story Eq. Jur., § 459, payments made by the debtor must be applied to the payment of the oldest debt; and here the note given being older than the advances, must be considered paid.

6. Because, when there are equities between the parties, the Court of Equity will not follow the strict rule of law that a creditor without instructions may apply payments to any debts due to him, but will take cognizance and decree in favor of the equity. Here the equity is that the signers of the note were sureties, without notice of the advances made beyond the $1,200. See Hammersly v. Knowlys, 2 Esp. N. P. 666, quoted by Chancellor Harper in Heilbron v. Bissell, Bailey Eq. 435.

7. Because, in no sense can the note of Joseph J., W. G. and A. A. Huckabee to Witte Bros. for $2,000, dated January 20th, 1874, be considered a continuing guarantee of the final balance due by J. J. Huckabee to Witte Bros., but must be confined to the year 1874.

IV. I find, therefore, that from the proceeds of the sale of the lands of Joseph J. Huckabee, 1,150 acres mortgaged to Witte Bros., the said judgment confessed to Willis B. Huckabee shall be first paid, and the balance be applied to pay on said mortgage debt, and recommend the same to be sold as prayed for by said Witte Bros.

V. I recommend that the following real estate belonging to the estate of Willis B. Huckabee, deceased, be sold * * *

J. M. Desaussure,
Master Kershaw Co.

*To this report numerous exceptions were taken by all parties, upon which was passed the following decree:

This action is brought by certain legatees under the will of Willis B. Huckabee against the executor and others for the settlement of the estate of the testator. The whole case has been heard by the master for Kershaw county, and a report made as to the law and facts. The exceptions to the report are numerous, and taken by both sides. According to the view I take of the case, it will not be necessary to consider all of the exceptions in detail. The questions involved are not dependent one on the other, and the order in which they are considered is, therefore, not material.

The first question considered by the master relates to "the claim of Joseph J. Huckabee to be paid his share of the crops, made by them working together on the farm, and also for one-third of the Nelson tract of land." The findings of law and fact by the master in relation to this claim are approved by this court. The findings of the master in relation to the claim of J. J. Huckabee for one-third of the Nelson tract of land are approved and confirmed by this court.

In relation to the judgment confessed by J. J. Huckabee and W. G. Huckabee to Willis B. Huckabee on February 24th, 1874, the finding of fact by the master is approved and confirmed. To these facts I will add the remark, that there is nothing to show that Willis B. Huckabee, the plaintiff in the judgment, had any knowledge that the design of J. J. Huckabee or W. G. Huckabee in confessing the judgment was to hinder, defeat or delay their other creditors. The finding of law by the master in regard to this confession of judgment is approved and confirmed.

The allegation of the complaint, that A. A. Huckabee had purchased lands of the testator's estate at an undervalue, is not passed upon by the master or pressed before me. I assume therefore, that cause of action is abandoned.

The remaining question relates to the mortgage executed by J. J. Huckabee on January 24th, 1874, to secure a note executed on January 20th, 1874, for $2,000, to Witte Bros.

Witte Bros. *make no objection to the litigation of their claims in this action, but join in so much of the prayer of the complaint as asks the sale of the land described in their mortgage. The findings of fact by the master in relation to the transactions between Witte Bros. and J. J., W. G. and W. B. Huckabee, are approved and confirmed. There may be some inaccuracy in the figures of the master, but this can be corrected upon a future reference, the design being to settle, as far as this court can, the principles upon which the rights of parties depend, and upon which the accounts may be subsequently made up.

Now, upon the facts, is the mortgage of January, 1874, satisfied? In January, 1874, J. J. Huckabee was indebted to Witte Bros. for the amount of balance unpaid of his account of 1873; for this balance, J. J. Huckabee executed his sealed note to Witte Bros. with W. B. and A. A. Huckabee as sureties; to further secure the note, and to secure advances for the year 1874, he executed the mortgage; the advances thus secured were not to exceed $1,200. Accordingly, advances were made in 1874 and exceeded $1,200 in amount. The amount of the balance of the account of 1873, including the $2,000 for which the note had been given, was brought forward and stood the first entry in the account for 1874. In November, 1874, J. J. Huckabee began to forward cotton to Witte Bros., and continued to do so, from time to time, up to February 26th, 1875. The sums for which these lots of cotton were sold were credited upon the account of J. J. Huckabee, but not upon the note.

In 1875 a new contract was entered into by Witte Bros. and J. J. Huckabee, in which another mortgage of the same land was executed by J. J. Huckabee to Witte Bros. This mortgage, among other things, contains a stipulation that this land is again mortgaged to secure the same $2,000. There is no evidence to show that the note of $2,000 was given and accepted in payment of the balance of 1873 pro tanto. Yet, notwithstanding the sum of that balance stood at the head of the account of 1874, $2,000 of that sum was represented by the note secured by sureties and a mortgage. That balance, as it stood at the head of the account, was unsecured, while the following items of the account, to the *amount of $1,200, were secured by the same mortgage that secured the $2,000.

These facts sufficiently differentiated the note to enable the parties to agree as to the application of the payments. And the agreement of January 15th, 1875, shows that J. J. Huckabee and Witte Bros. had agreed that the payments should not be considered as applied to the $2,000. It is therefore adjudged, that the note of $2,000 is not paid, and that the mortgage of January 24th, 1874, is unsatisfied.

There is no explanation as to any further agreement as to the application of the payments to the account for advances for the year 1874; it must be, therefore, adjudged, that the payments must be applied, beginning at the first item for supplies, and continued regularly in succession until the payments are exhausted. It is further adjudged, that the supplies, payment for which was secured by the mortgage of January, 1874, were the supplies, to that amount, first delivered and charged to J. J. Huckabee, and that the supplies, payment for which was secured by the said mortgage, are paid for.

It is clear that the balance due Witte Bros. on the account of 1875, is not secured by the mortgage of January, 1874. That mortgage was security for another and independent debt, and there is nothing to show that it was ever intended to cover any other debt than the one described on its face. On the contrary, for the debt of 1875, there was, in addition to other securities, a new mortgage of the same lands.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the land described in the mortgage of J. J. Huckabee to Witte Bros. be sold by the master for Kershaw county, the time and terms of said sale to be fixed by a subsequent order of this court, and that the proceeds of said sale be first applied to the amount of the note and interest the mortgage was given to secure, and, after the satisfaction of the said note and interest, to the judgments against J. J. Huckabee and others in favor of Willis B. Huckabee, and any balance to the mortgage of Witte Bros., of January, 1875. * * *

Huckabee appealed, *and also the defendant, J. J. Huckabee, upon the exceptions stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chesnut & Workman, for plaintiffs and A. A. Huckabee.

Messrs. Leitner & Dunlap, for J. J. Huckabee and Witte Bros., and for the latter, also, Messrs. Buist & Buist.

September 26th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought for the settlement of the estate of Willis B. Huckabee, deceased, who died in March, 1865, bequeathing his estate to plaintiffs, and several of the defendants, his children; the defendant A. A. Huckabee, one of them, being appointed executor. The will directed that each of the legatees should account to the estate for whatever amounts they might be indebted thereto, without interest.

It appeared that some time before the death of the testator, to wit, in August, 1873, the defendant J. J. Huckabee executed a note to his father, with W. C. Huckabee, his brother, as surety, for $2,905; that in February, 1874, these parties confessed a judgment to W. B. Huckabee on this note, amounting at that time to $3,006.68. It further appeared that, on account of certain dealings between J. J. Huckabee and the defendants Witte Bros., of Charleston, the said J. J. Huckabee, on or before January 22d, 1874, had become indebted to the said Witte Bros. in the sum of $2,000, for which Huckabee gave his note at said date, with W. B. Huckabee, the testator, and A. A. Huckabee, as his sureties, with interest at the rate of fourteen per cent. per annum, and payable on or before December 1st, 1874. At the same time, as further security to this note, and for supplies to be advanced to him to an amount not exceeding $1,200, with interest at fourteen per cent., he executed a mortgage to Witte Bros. of a tract of land containing 1,150 acres, situated on the waters of Wateree river in Kershaw county.

This mortgage bore date prior to the confession of judgment of J. J. Huckabee and

W. G. Huckabee to their father, the *testator. The plaintiffs, however, claimed that the debt had been satisfied by produce consigned by Huckabee to Witte Bros., and one object of the complaint was to have it so declared in order that the land of J. J. Huckabee covered by this mortgage might be sold to pay the judgment confessed to the testator free from the cloud of the mortgage; and to this end Witte Bros. were made parties to the action, who answered, denying that their mortgage had been satisfied, and alleging that the confession of judgment was without consideration, and, therefore, void. J. J. Huckabee and W. G. Huckabee also set up the defense that the confession was without consideration; and J. J. Huckabee further claimed that his father was largely indebted to him for services as manager of his father's business from 1851 to 1862—nine years and seven months, and again from 1865 to 1872, six years and eight months—and for other services as blacksmith at the rate of $300 per annum; and further, for one-third interest in a tract of land, known as the Jack Nelson land, which he alleged had been purchased by his father with the understanding that he was to have one-third interest therein.

The case was referred to the master, who, after full testimony, reported that the judgment by confession was founded upon a sufficient consideration, to wit, a store account, and was a valid judgment; that the Witte Bros.' mortgage had been satisfied by sales of produce shipped by J. J. Huckabee, and that the claim of J. J. Huckabee against the estate of his father was stale and barred by the statute of limitations; and he recommended that out of the proceeds of the sale of the 1,150 acres of land mortgaged to Witte Bros. the judgment confessed to the testator, W. B. Huckabee, be first paid, and the balance, if any, be applied to a second mortgage of Witte Bros., executed in 1875, and junior to the judgment confessed.

Upon exceptions to this report, Judge Wallace sustained it, except as to the satisfaction of the Witte Bros.' mortgage; as to this, he held that the note of $2,000, secured by said mortgage, had not been paid, and he ordered the land sold, the proceeds thereof to be applied first to the amount and interest of said note, and, after the satisfaction thereof, then to the judgment against J. J. Huckabee and W. G. Huckabee, and any balance to *the second mortgage of Witte Bros. From this decree the plaintiffs and the defendant J. J. Huckabee have appealed; the plaintiffs upon the ground that his Honor should have held, upon the facts and law of the case, that the $2,000 note secured by mortgage to Witte Bros. had been paid; and the defendant, upon the grounds: 1. Because his Honor erred in sustaining the report of the master, wherein he held that defendant's whole claim for services was barred by the statute of limitations; 2. Because his Honor erred in sustaining the report of the master, wherein he holds that the demand for one-third of the Jack Nelson land, set up by J. J. Huckabee, was untenable; 3. Because his Honor erred in sustaining the master's report, that the confession of judgment was a valid and subsisting debt.

We will take up the plaintiffs' exceptions first. To a proper understanding of the question raised in this exception, it will be necessary to go a little deeper into the facts connected with the business transactions of J. J. Huckabee and Witte Bros. It seems that Huckabee was a planter in Kershaw county, and that he obtained his supplies, &c., necessary to the running of his farm, from Witte Bros, merchants, in Charleston, to whom he shipped his cotton and other produce; that at the end of the year 1873, the balance against Huckabee, in favor of Witte Bros., was something over $2,000, for which Huckabee gave his note (the note in question). The account of 1873, on the books of Witte Bros., was left standing, no entry of the note as a credit being made; the balance of 1873, including the $2,000, being carried forward and left standing as the first entry on the account of 1874.

At the time the note was taken, as has already been stated, Witte Bros. agreed to advance, for the year 1874, an amount not to exceed $1,200. And with the view to secure this note and the advances agreed upon, Huckabee then executed the first mortgage, to wit, in January, 1874. During that year Witte Bros. furnished supplies considerably over the amount agreed upon, to wit, $3,229.80, instead of $1,200. In November, Huckabee began to send forward cotton to Witte Bros., which he continued to do until January, 1875. The proceeds of this cotton were *credited upon the account of Huckabee, no part being paid to the note.

In January, 1875, Witte Bros. agreed to make advances for that year to an amount not to exceed $3,000, with interest at fourteen per cent., to be paid in December, 1875; and Huckabee agreed to send forward his crop of cotton for that year, the proceeds to be applied to pay expenses of papers, the advances and interest, "and then to the payment of any amounts that may now be due" to them; and should any balance remain, to be placed to the credit of Huckabee. That agreement was in writing, and contains a lien on the crop and a mortgage on the 1,150 acres before mentioned, to secure the $3,000 and interest, and also the sum of $2,000 now due for past advances. At the end of the cotton season for 1875, upon a balance being struck, March 28th, 1876, Huckabee was indebted $3,746.10, which included the $2,000 note.

The parties had little or no dealings in 1876. Their relations, however, were renewed in 1877, when further advances were made during that year. No balance was struck in 1877–8 or 9, but on January 26th, 1880, a balance is struck of $223.69 in favor of Huckabee, which balance, it is admitted, should be credited on the balance against him in 1875, to wit, the $3,446.10. This amount, to wit, $3,446.10—$223.19, is the amount claimed by Witte Bros. in the account up to March 28th, 1875, including the $2,000 note and interest. It is not contended that the first mortgage secures any portion of this balance except the $2,000 note and interest, and the sole question is, whether, under the facts as above, that note should be regarded as paid.

The solution of this question depends upon the principles applicable to the application of payments. This doctrine has been much discussed both in England and also in the American States; and because of the contrariety in the decisions much confusion has resulted. This has given rise to a separate work on the subject by Mr. George H. Munger, where numerous cases are collected and discussed. At one time and in many cases in England, the civil law, which seemed to regard the interests of the debtor as most to be protected, was followed; at another and *in other cases, the creditor was the favorite. Finally, as Mr. Munger concludes, the rule adopted in Great Britain and most of the States of this country, is as follows (Munger, ch. III., p. 10): 1. Where money is paid by a debtor to his creditor, the debtor, has a right to make the appropriation to which account he pleases. 2. If the debtor make no appropriation, then the creditor may apply it at his own pleasure to the satisfaction of any demand which he has against his debtor. 3. If neither party make any such application, then if there be various debts due the creditor, the court will make the application according to its own view of the law and equity of the case under all the circumstances.

In our State this doctrine has also been much discussed and a conclusion reached somewhat in unison with the above principles, but rather more distinctly defined and limited. The most important of the cases in our reports are the following: Smith ads. Screven, 1 McCord 368; Black v. Shooler, 2 McCord 294; Schnell v. Schroder, Bailey Eq. 342; Heilbron v. Bissell and Warner, Bailey Eq. 430; McDonald v. Pickett, 2 Bailey 618; Carson v. Hill and Jones, 1 McMull. 83; Jones v. Kilgore, 2 Rich. Eq. 66; Brice v. Hamilton, 12 S. C. 37. In the first three cases the proposition first above stated is distinctly announced, to wit: that a debtor when he makes a payment has the right to direct and control the application. This seems to be the well-settled doctrine everywhere. The second proposition, as a general rule, is also well settled, to wit, that the creditor may make the application if the debtor has not done so. This was held in Schnell v. Schroder, supra, and in Heilbron v. Bissell and Warner, supra. It was further held, that the creditor in making the application was not limited as to the time within which he may do so, in accordance with Stewart v. Cochran, Bailey Eq. 380. And in Brice v. Hamilton, 12 S. C., supra, the last case upon this subject, this court held, that when the debtor directs no application at the time of payment the rule is that the creditor may make the application at any time before judgment or verdict; approving Heilbron v. Bissell and Warner, and limiting Jones v. Kilgore.

cellor Harper goes *fully into a discussion of the whole subject, and after a thorough and most able examination of the prominent decisions, concludes in opposition to the leaning of the master of the rolls, as follows: "With the respect due to so great an authority, I have examined the cases referred to and some others on the same subject, and my conclusion is, on the preponderance of authority, that the creditor has the unlimited right to appropriate, when the debtor has made no appropriation at the time of payment." This, then, seems to be the law in our State, and such being the law, the third proposition above is not very important, as it will not be often that the creditor would fail to exercise his right. It was said, however, in Jones v. Kilgore, if neither party would fix the application, then it devolves on the court, and will be made pro tanto to the demands held by him who receives the money, or if one demand be less secured than the other the application would be made to it in the first instance, citing 5 Mason 82; 4 J. J. Marsh. 97; 9 Cow. 420.

Now, apply these principles to the facts of this case. The payments made by Huckabee to Witte Bros. in 1874, after the $2,000 debt had been contracted and the note therefor given, were made from the proceeds of the cotton shipped by Huckabee after November of that year. There is no evidence that Huckabee gave any directions as to the precise application when the consignments went forward. In the absence of this, Witte Bros. had the right to make the application which in their answer they say they did do, making the application to the advances of that year. This application was subsequently recognized as proper by Huckabee in the agreement made the next year, 1875, for advances of that year, as that agreement contains a lien on the crop and a mortgage on the 1,150 acres of land to secure said advances, and also the sum of $2,000, due for past advances with the interest thereon. Besides this, we think that the same result would follow from a careful examination of the original contract between the parties, and a proper construction thereof.

At the close of the year 1873, Huckabee was found indebted about $2,000; this was ascertained, and a note given for the amount, with delay of payment until December, 1874. This note was given by Huckabee, with his father and brother as *sureties. It is true the amount was carried forward at the head of the account for 1874. This was, no doubt, done early in the year, and before it was settled by note; the note was not given until January 20th, 1874, and standing at that time in the shape of an account, it was never changed; yet, the facts are that the debt was ascertained, and was closed up by note before the business of the next year commenced. The argument of the appellant is that, notwithstanding the arrangement made as above, yet the debt of 1873 and 1874 was all one debt, represented by a running account; and that, under the law, where payments are made in such a case, the payments should be applied to the first items; and many authorities are referred to sustaining this latter proposition. These are not denied. The general rule of law, no doubt, is as stated; but, in our judgment, the facts do not fit. We think there was a separation here of the two debts; one was ascertained and liquidated before the other was contracted; one was present and the other in the future, when the mortgage was given, and the doctrine of the application of payments to two or more debts applied, and sustains the ruling of Judge Wallace on this subject.

As to the claims of J. J. Huckabee against the estate of his father for services, &c., and also his claim for a portion of the Jack Nelson land, the findings of fact and law of the master have been approved by Judge Wallace. We see no reason to disturb either. There seems to be no foundation in the facts for either claim; and, certainly, as to the first, the statute of limitations would be a complete answer in any event.

As to the judgment confessed by the Huckabees, the master finds as matter of fact that it was based upon a store account. The Circuit judge sustains this finding; and further, he states that there is nothing to show that Willis B. Huckabee, the plaintiff in the judgment, had any knowledge that the design of J. J. Huckabee or W. G. Huckabee, in confessing the judgment, was to hinder, defeat or delay their other creditors. We cannot say that these findings have no support in the testimony.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The suspension of the statute of limitations by act of the legislature does not affect the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time.

[4. Payment ⟸66.]

When a presumption of payment commenced to run in February, 1861, it became complete in twenty-years, notwithstanding the stay-laws of 1861–1865, and the suspension thereby of the statute of limitations.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, November, 1882.

This was an action by E. T. Shubrick, trustee, against L. G. Adams, administratrix of W. C. Gatewood. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Rutledge & Young, for appellant.

Mr. S. Hyde, Jr., contra.

September 26th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an action brought against the respondent as administratrix of W. C. Gatewood, deceased, on a joint and several bond executed by Dr. Geddings, with Gatewood as surety. Gatewood died in February, 1861. Dr. Geddings made several payments on the bond after the death of Gatewood—the last on April 9th, 1877. Dr. Geddings died in 1878, leaving a balance on the bond unpaid. This action was commenced against the estate of Gatewood on August 21st, 1882, to recover this balance. The defendant pleaded payment, relying on the presumption arising from the lapse of time, more *than twenty-one years having intervened between the death of Gatewood and the commencement of the action.

Judge Pressley, who heard the case, sustained this plea, holding that the death of Gatewood severed the obligation, and more than twenty years having elapsed since the death of Gatewood, and before the commencement of this action, that the estate of Gatewood was entitled to the presumption of payment, notwithstanding the stay-law. He therefore ordered and adjudged that judgment be for the defendant with costs. The case now comes before this court on appeal; the main question involved being whether the presiding judge erred in declining to deduct the time which elapsed during the existence of what is known as the stay-laws.

The presumption of payment arising from the lapse of twenty years, as a general principle of law, is not contested by the appellant; but it is denied that the principle applies in this case, for the reason, as it is alleged, that twenty years in the sense of that principle has not elapsed here, because, as contended by the appellant, the four years of the stay-laws should be deducted, which, if done, it is conceded that less than twenty years will be left; and such being the case, the facts would not then warrant the application of the presumption. So, as we have already said, the principal question in the case is, should the four years of the stay-laws have been eliminated.

This is the first time that this question has been distinctly made in this State as applicable to the presumption of payment of a sealed note arising from the lapse of time. The question is important, and requires mature consideration. In the recent case of Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C. 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618] where the Circuit judge had held that the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time was rebuttable—dependent upon the weight of the testimony as to the fact of payment, and that lunacy, the insolvency or solvency of the defendant, and the stay-law were facts that might be considered as bearing upon that question, which he ruled should be decided by the preponderance of the evidence—this court reversed the judgment because of error, as we held, in the ruling of the Circuit judge, that the presumption could be *rebutted by the preponderance of testimony as to the actual fact of payment.

In our opinion, founded upon authority, (see the cases referred to in Boyce v. Lake,) we regarded the presumption as having acquired an artificial force much stronger than a mere possibility, subject to be overthrown by a simple preponderance of testimony to the contrary, and that the question in such case was not one of payment to be decided by the weight of the testimony directed to that point with the onus on the plaintiff, but that on account of the artificial force which the lapse of time had given to the presumption, this was conclusive unless overthrown by testimony of the character required to resist a debt barred by the statute of limitations. This was the pith of the opinion in Boyce v. Lake, following Judge Wardlaw, Chancellor Harper and Dunkin, and Lord Ellenborough in the cases cited therein. There was no distinct motion made in Boyce v. Lake to deduct the four years of the stay-law, nor was the point squarely made or decided, although it was incidentally involved in the case. Such being the fact, we feel at liberty to consider this question independent of that case now for the first time distinctly presented.

The argument of the appellant is that the stay-law created a legal disability which prevented the assertion of his rights; and that, under the law, the currency of the presumption of payment was arrested during the continuance of such disability. The first question to be considered, in connection with this argument, is the proposition that the stay-law created a legal disability. Is this proposition a sound one? if not, and upon examination it should fall, of course, the remainder, which is a conclusion drawn from it, would go with it. Upon this point it is needless to do more than to refer to the case of the State v. Carew, 13 Rich. 506 [91 Am. Dec. 245]. The legislature, on December 21st, 1861, passed an act entitled "An act to extend relief to debtors, and to prevent the sacrifice of property at public sales." By the first section it is provided "that it should be unlawful for any officer of this State to serve or execute any mesne or final process of any courts of the State for the collection of money until after the expiration of the first session of the next general assembly of this State," &c. This act was renewed in December, 1863, again in December, 1864;

*and in December, 1865, it was continued of force until the adjournment of the next regular session. At the May Term of the Appeal Court, 1866, these acts, in so far as they interdicted the service of process, mesne or final, were declared unconstitutional by the Court of Errors, in the case above referred to, in a most elaborate and able opinion delivered by Dunkin, C. J.

In the face of this opinion it cannot be consistently contended that creditors were laboring under any legal disability in the enforcement of their claims by virtue of these acts. It is true for four years they stood unimpeached, and were acquiesced in; but this did not give them the sanction of law, and it is the legal aspect of the interdiction which is now under consideration. Did these acts create a legal disability which prevented the plaintiff from asserting his right? That is the question. There can be no other answer but a negative one. Upon the very first assault, and before they had been sanctioned by time or construed by inferior courts, they fell by an almost unanimous opinion of the highest court in the State, the Court of Errors. In such a case there is is no room for the doctrine of communis error. Nor is there any ground upon which it can be claimed that a legal disability existed.

But even admitting that such disability existed, would that help the appellant under the facts of this case? The following legal propositions have been established in reference to the statute of limitations in numerous decisions, and they may be regarded as firmly settled. 1. That where a party is under a legal disability at the time his right of action accrues, the statute is not put in operation until the disability ceases. For instance, in the cases of infancy, coverture, or where the defendant is absent from the State. Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq. 376; Gray v. Givens, 2 Hill Eq. 514. 2. Where the disability intervenes after the right of action accrues, and, consequently, after the currency of the statute has commenced, as a general rule, it is powerless to stop the statute.

These principles are as firmly established and as well settled, perhaps, as any connected with our jurisprudence. See the cases of Fewell v. Collins, 3 Brev. 286; Adamson v. Smith, 2 Mill. Con. R. 269 [12 Am. Dec. 665]; Faysoux v. Prather, 1 N. & M. 296 [9 Am.

Dec. 691], where Judge *Cheves collects and discusses many authorities. Richardson v. Whitfield, 1 McCord 403. In consequence of this latter principle, whenever it has been deemed proper that the statute of limitations should not operate after its currency has once commenced, an act of the legislature became necessary to arrest it. Hence, in the stay-laws, the statute was suspended by a special provision. This provision of these acts has been declared constitutional. Barry v. Iseman, 14 Rich. 129 [91 Am. Dec. 262]. And it has been enforced in the case of Wardlaw v. Buzzard, 15 Rich. 162 [94 Am. Dec. 148], where the plaintiff was given the benefit of the suspension.

Now, the important question arises, do these principles apply to the presumption of payment growing out of the lapse of time? Judge Wardlaw, in the case of Wadsworthville Poor School v. McCully, 11 Rich. 430, said: "The period of twenty years was originally adopted in analogy to the English statute of limitations." Judge Cheves, in the case of Adamson v. Smith, 2 Mill Con. R. 272 [12 Am. Dec. 665], makes the same suggestion in reference to the statutes. He says: "They are statutes of peace and repose, necessary to the comfort of society. They are found in some shape or other in every country, and under every government. Their adoption is scarcely a matter of choice. If the positive enactments of the legislature do not put a limit to the time within which claims should be made, that limit results from the rules of evidence; and the law presumes that the claim which has been for a great length of time forborne, does not exist. Time, with its long train of inevitable and incidental auxiliaries, destroys the muniments of rights, and the evidences of acquittances, and these statutes and legal presumptions which perpetuate their effect, are indispensable." He concludes, that the balance is infinitely in their favor, and that they should be upheld and sustained, notwithstanding the fact that in special cases injury may be done.

The two, then, originally adopted for the same reasons and standing upon the same grounds, that of repose and peace, should be governed and enforced upon the same general principles, and decisions which have been made in reference to the one should apply with more or less force to the other. Governed by this rule then, and applying the cases above cited in which the statute *was involved, to the presumption arising from the lapse of time, it would follow that where the disability existed before the right of action accrued, the currency of the presumption would not begin, but where it intervened afterwards, the presumption would not be arrested unless by special act the presumption had been suspended. It requires a special act to suspend the statute, and why not the presumption.

Now the facts in this case are, that even supposing the stay-laws to have created a legal disability, yet this was a disability after the presumption of payment had commenced. The last payment on the note during the life of the intestate, Gatewood, was in February, 1860. This was made by Dr. Geddings. Gatewood died in February, 1861. This payment of Geddings no doubt continued the liability of Gatewood from its date, and the presumption of payment by lapse of time began then. The first stay-law was enacted on December 21st, 1861, nearly two years after the right of action accrued, and after the currency of the presumption began.

Here, then, the disability, if it be a disability, intervened. Can we, upon authority, or from the analogy of decided cases in reference to the statute, say that the presumption was arrested? This is, at least, doubtful. If this was a case under the statute, we might so conclude; but it would not be by the authority of the decided cases, but upon the ground that the acts creating the stay of mesne and final process, supra, also contained a provision suspending, in such cases, the limitation to bringing action in express words. This provision of these acts would be relied on and enforced, not from common law principles demanding it, but because it was so enacted. The legislature, however, did not see proper to suspend the presumption of payment in such cases, but simply suspended the statute of limitations; and we can find no sufficient authority for this court to go beyond the act. We would feel bound, if the statute was alone involved, to declare it suspended whether the stay-laws were constitutional or not, because the suspension of the statute has been declared constitutional, and it would be our duty to follow this decision. This was done in Wardlaw v. Buzzard, supra. But where the presumption of payment is alone involved, and in the absence of *any enactment suspending that presumption in a given case, what other guide have we but the weight of the decisions holding that no intervening disability can avail.

The Wadsworthville Poor School v. McCully was very similar in some of its features to this case. Mr. Wadsworth had devised his lands to certain persons in trust for the establishment and maintenance of a poor school. The legislature, recognizing and appreciating the benevolence of Mr. Wadsworth, and to secure the lands to the purposes intended, by special act suspended the statute of limitations as to all the lands thus devised. In after years, the trustees sued to recover from McCully a portion of the lands then in his possession. McCully relied on the presumption of title arising from twenty years' possession. The plaintiff urged that the statute of limitations had been perpetually suspended, and that this should apply to the presumption of title founded on long possession, as well as to the technical statute of limitations. The court held that the act suspending the statute as to these lands did not affect the presumption of a conveyance from the owner arising from twenty years' possession.

How does this case differ from the one at bar in principle? Here, as in that case, the statute of limitations was suspended; and this suspension would have protected the plaintiff in either case had the statute been the defense interposed by defendant; but the defense has not, in either case, relied on the statute. They have relied upon a different defense altogether, and one not affected by the suspension, to wit, lapse of time. Judge Wardlaw, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Wadsworthville Poor School case, said: "The period of twenty years was originally adopted in analogy to the English statute of limitations; but it has no connection with our statute. It would be a great stretch of special indulgence, given by the suspending act, to say that thereby the plaintiff was not only shielded against the effect of ten years' possession, but was indemnified against all the effect of time and acquiescence." He further said, "But we cannot perceive the influence which the suspending act of 1805 has upon the presumption." Neither can we perceive the influence which *the suspending provisions of the stay-laws have upon the presumption in this case.

It is urged by appellant, in reply to this, that while the statute was suspended in favor of Wadsworth, yet that he was under no disability to sue; that he might have brought his action notwithstanding the suspension; that instead of doing this he submitted to the invasion of his rights, and, therefore, had no cause to complain. So too, did the plaintiff in the case at bar. The case of State v. Carew, supra, holds that the stay-laws never had any binding force; they were nullities from the beginning. They were not in the way of the plaintiff to bring her action. No doubt she thought otherwise, but she was mistaken. True, it was a reasonable mistake, and one which, under the circumstances, was entitled to all respect, and it would be gratifying to the court to relieve her if it could be done consistently with the rules of law, but we do not see how this can be done.

We have examined the cases relied on by the appellant, to wit, Brewton v. Cannon, 1 Bay 482; Higginson v. Air, 1 Desaus. 427, and Dunlop & Co. v. Ball, 2 Cr. 180 [2 L. Ed. 246]. The first case, reported in Bay, was heard in 1795. But few of the facts are given; and the opinion of the court is embraced in less than a dozen lines. It simply stated that while twenty years presumed payment of a bond, yet that the war and the variety of distresses occasioned by a revolution alter the situation of a country greatly; and, therefore, all these circumstances should have been permitted to have gone to the jury to judge whether the presumption was so strong as to warrant them to find for the plaintiffs, overruling Judge Bay, who tried the case, and who held that it was a rule of law that twenty years would presume payment of a bond, and in directing the jury to so find as matter of law. The point of the case must have been this error of law in the ruling of Judge Bay.

In Higginson v. Air, one of the points made was that the deceased partner was bound by the payments and admissions of the surviving partner. In Dunlop & Co. v. Ball, the plaintiff was an alien enemy, and the court held that no presumption could arise during a state of war as between these parties. These cases, then, are not in point. They fail to touch the precise *question here. Even admitting them to be authority to the extent claimed by appellant, to wit, that a legal disability, whether it exists before action brought or intervenes afterwards, should be deducted; yet the appellant could claim no relief thereby, because, as we have seen, there was no legal disability in this case. The foundation rock upon which the structure is attempted to be built is absent. State v. Carew, supra.

The ruling of Judge Pressley, that the death of Gatewood severed the obligation, and that, therefore, subsequent payments by Dr. Geddings did not bind the estate of Gatewood, is sustained by the cases of Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich. 374, and Smith v. Townsend, 9 Rich. 44.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

20 S. C. 57

LANIER & CO. v. TOLLESON.

[1. Bankruptcy ⊂⊃51.]

In action against a discharged bankrupt on a new promise to pay a debt contracted before the bankruptcy, a distinct, positive and unequivocal promise to pay must be shown to have been made by defendant after his discharge in bankruptcy; neither partial payment nor expression of an intention to pay amount to such promise.

Such a promise is sufficient, although only verbal, and made upon a condition, if the condition is shown to have been performed.

[3. Bankruptcy ⊂⊃418.]

It is also sufficient, notwithstanding the plaintiffs' written consent to defendant's discharge in bankruptcy; for such discharge did not operate as an extinguishment, payment or release of the debt.

[4. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃732.]

An exception not considered because couched in terms too general.

[5. New Trial ⊂⊃40.]

After a verdict responsive to the issues raised by the pleadings, the Circuit judge, on motion for new trial, is not bound to pass upon matters which should have been presented by requests to charge but were not; and his refusal to grant a new trial does not involve any ruling upon the grounds so taken in support of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 62–66; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃40.]

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, October, 1882.

*Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Mr. Stanyarne Wilson, contra.

September 28th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action, which was commenced February 10th, 1882, was brought to recover the amount due on two promissory notes, given by defendant to plaintiffs, one payable on June 9th, and the other on July 9th, 1877, prior to the discharge of the defendant in bankruptcy, the plaintiffs relying upon a promise alleged to have been made subsequent to such discharge.

It appeared in evidence that the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt on March 6th, 1878, and was duly discharged on October 23d, 1879, with the written consent of plaintiffs to such discharge. L. L. Lanier, one of the plaintiffs, was introduced as a witness, and testified that after defendant had filed his petition in bankruptcy, he paid him on account of said notes $20, and that after his discharge, to wit, on October 7th, 1881, the defendant paid him the further sum of $5, and at the same time "promised to pay them more the next time that he should see L. L.

Lanier, one of the plaintiffs herein," and that in December, 1881, he promised to pay the balance due on said notes, "as soon as he was able."

The plaintiffs also put in evidence two letters of defendant written while the proceedings in bankruptcy were pending, in one of which, after asking plaintiffs to sign their consent to his discharge, he uses this expression: "I hope to live to see the day when my friends will not regret this act of kindness," and in the other, after asking plaintiffs to forward proof of their debt to the register in bankruptcy, he says: "I hope some day to be a man again, and will not forget my friends." None of this testimony was objected to at the trial, and when the letters were offered in evidence "plaintiffs' counsel stated to the jury that these letters were introduced, not to prove a promise, (as those promises only could bind defendant that were made after his discharge in bankruptcy October, 1879,) but only to show that the *defendant had always intended to pay debts of this kind, and thus corroborate the testimony of Lanier." The tax returns of defendant, dated June 30th, 1882, were then introduced, showing personal property to the amount of $380, and real estate assessed at $2,500.

Defendant put in evidence his discharge in bankruptcy, and testified that he had never made the promise testified to by Lanier, and had not paid him the $5, as alleged, on the said notes; that he was auditor of the county for several years prior to 1876, and that his family consisted of himself, his wife and grandson, and that defendant's health was bad. M. A. Newland and James R. Tolleson were also offered as witnesses to corroborate defendant as to his version of the conversation between him and Lanier, in which the latter alleged the promise relied upon was made, and as to the alleged payment of the $5 to Lanier; but he offered no testimony as to his inability to pay the note at the time the action was commenced.

At the close of the testimony the defendant's counsel requested the Circuit judge to charge the jury "that the letters of Tolleson, put in testimony, do not constitute a new promise to pay the notes," to which the judge replied "that he considered that a question of fact for the jury, having told them what sort of a promise would bind defendant, to wit, that it must be a distinct, positive and unequivocal promise to pay, made after his discharge in bankruptcy, and that neither partial payment nor expression of an intention to pay, did amount to such promise. His Honor then turned to plaintiffs' counsel, in the presence of the jury, and asked him, did he claim that the letters constituted a promise to pay, and he replied that he did not. His Honor further charged that the question whether or not defendant made the promise to plaintiffs alleged in the complaint must be determined by them from all the testimony. That this question of fact must be determined from the testimony; that if the jury believed the testimony for the defense, the verdict must be in his favor, but if they believed the testimony for the plaintiffs they should find for the plaintiffs." In response to an inquiry from the court before the jury retired, defendant's counsel stated that he did not desire to make any other requests to charge.

*The jury having found for the plaintiffs, the defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds "that the verdict was contrary to both law and the testimony; that on a recovery on a new promise it was essential for plaintiffs to show that the promisor was more able to pay at time of suit than when the promise was made; that such a promise to pay was to be governed or controlled or modified by the condition and wants of the defendant and his family, and that a promise to pay when able was not such a promise to pay as would support an action like this." The motion for a new trial was refused, the judge ruling "that if the testimony for the plaintiffs was believed by the jury, it was sufficient to sustain their verdict. He further ruled that the testimony whether or not defendant was able to pay had gone to the jury; that they were the proper judges of the matter, and he was not disposed to disturb their finding. He remarked, by way of illustration, in refusing the motion, that he thought a promise to pay when able resembled a promise of an administrator to pay when in funds, but he did not take this as a reason for refusing the motion on this ground. In refusing the motion he also stated inferentially as much as is contained in paragraphs V. and VII. of the grounds of appeal, infra, inasmuch as he was requested, by such motion, to grant a new trial for the reasons contained in them, and he refused to do so, saying that the jury were the proper judges of the matter whether defendant was able to pay, and he was not disposed to disturb their finding. The matters contained in paragraphs IV., V., VI. and VII. of the grounds of appeal were not brought to the attention of his Honor by defendant's counsel, by request to charge or otherwise, till by this motion for a new trial."

The defendant appeals upon various grounds which will hereinafter be considered in detail. We are unable to perceive wherein the Circuit judge has committed any error of law, and that is all that we are at liberty to inquire into. The whole of his charge, we assume, is not before us, for in that portion of it which is stated in the "Case," nothing is said as to the fact that the promise relied upon was a conditional promise, and that in such a case it would be necessary to prove the allegation made in the complaint that the condition had been fulfilled, and that *defendant, at the time the action was commenced, was able to pay. But we can scarcely suppose that the Circuit judge omitted so to instruct the jury, or if he had, that the counsel for defendant would have failed to ask for such instruction; and it does not appear that there was any such request to charge. The jury were told, and properly told, that a promise which would be sufficient to bind the defendant "must be a distinct, positive and unequivocal promise to pay, made after his discharge in bankruptcy; and that neither partial payment nor expression of an intention to pay did amount to such promise." And then the jury were left to pass upon the question of fact. We do not see what more could be expected.

But we will proceed to consider the several grounds of appeal in which error is imputed to the Circuit judge. "I. In refusing to charge the jury that the letters of Tolleson, put in testimony, do not constitute a new promise to pay the claim." We think it clear, from the statement which we have made—copied largely from the "Case" as prepared for argument here—that this ground has been taken under a misapprehension of the charge. For it seems to us, from that statement, that the jury were not only so charged, in effect, but that the proposition contended for was emphatically impressed upon their minds by the distinct statement, twice made to them by the plaintiffs' counsel, that the letters were not offered in evidence for the purpose of proving a new promise, but simply for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of Lanier. We do not see, therefore, how the jury could have been misled, for when they were told by the Circuit judge that a promise to be binding must have been made after the discharge in bankruptcy, and when the letters showed on their face that they were written before such discharge, the jury must necessarily have known that the letters did not constitute such a promise as would bind the defendant, especially when the plaintiffs' counsel had twice, in their presence, distinctly disavowed offering the letters with any such purpose.

"II. In charging that if a verbal promise, such as is alleged in the complaint, was proved, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover." We do not exactly perceive the point of this exception. If the allegations of the complaint were proved, then it *would appear that the defendant, after his discharge in bankruptcy, had made a distinct and positive promise to pay, upon a certain condition which had been fulfilled; and if so, we see no reason why the plaintiffs could not recover. If, however, the point of the exception is that the promise was merely verbal and not in writing, then we know of no authority here requiring such a promise to be in writing. It is only by special statutory enactment, and that, too, of recent date, that a promise to take a case out of the statute of limitations must be in writing; but we know of no such statute requiring a promise to pay a debt, after the debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy, to be made in writing. But if it is meant that the promise alleged in the complaint was not sufficient, because it was conditional, we are unable to see any grounds for such a position. A conditional promise is, and ought to be, as valid and binding as any other when the performance of the condition has been proved. 1 Pars. Cont. 434; Brown v. Joyner, 1 Rich. 211; Hayes v. Clinkscales, 9 S. C. 441. And if the point of the exception is that the promise in this case cannot be enforced, because it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs consented to defendant's discharge in bankruptcy, it is still without foundation. The reason why a promise to pay a debt voluntarily released cannot be enforced is that there is no consideration for such a promise. Hence, if the debt had been released in this case, there would have been no consideration for the promise relied upon. But a consent to a debtor's discharge in bankruptcy is a very different thing from a release of the debt. Such a discharge, like a successful plea of the statute of limitations, operates only as a bar to an action for its recovery, but does not operate as a payment, release or extinguishment of the debt. Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C. 216. Hence, the fact that the plaintiffs consented to defendant's discharge in bankruptcy is of no consequence here. The debt still remained unpaid, and the moral obligation to pay it constituted a sufficient consideration to support the promise relied upon.

"III. In refusing a new trial." It has been so repeatedly decided that an exception, couched in such general terms as this, *cannot be considered here, that we need not say more upon the subject.

"IV. In ruling, upon the motion for a new trial, that a promise to pay, when able, had the same effect as a promise of an administrator to pay when in funds." We do not understand that the Circuit judge so ruled, or, in fact, made any ruling at all upon this subject. All that he said was said by way of illustration; and it is expressly stated that he did not take this as a ground for refusing the motion. Indeed, what he really did say was that "a promise to pay when able, resembled a promise of an administrator to pay when in funds," and not, as alleged in this ground of appeal, that such a promise "had the same effect as a promise of an administrator to pay when in funds." The two promises may resemble each other, and, in fact, do, both being conditional promises, and yet they may, possibly, not have the same effect.

"V. In ruling that it was not essential to show, on a promise to pay when able, that the promisor was more able to pay at the time of suit than when the promise was made. VI. In ruling that the testimony of the plaintiffs, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to sustain the verdict. VII. In ruling that a promise to pay, when able, was not to be governed or controlled or modified by the condition and wants of the defendant and his family." These three grounds of appeal will be considered together. They seem to have been taken under a misapprehension of the judge's ruling upon the motion for a new trial. It is true these were grounds urged in support of the motion for a new trial which was overruled, but they presented points which should have been, and were not, made by requests to charge. The Circuit judge, in rendering his decision upon a motion for new trial, did not undertake to pass upon them as separate and distinct propositions, as he need not have done. If they had been presented by requests to charge and had been refused, then, possibly, this appeal would have had better support. But after the jury have rendered their verdict, we are bound to assume that they were satisfied from the evidence that the promise had been made as alleged, and that the condition upon which it was made had been fulfilled. There having been no error of law in *the charge of the Circuit judge, as we have seen, all that he was called upon, by the motion for a new trial, to do, was to say whether the evidence adduced was sufficient to warrant the verdict. This he did, and from his decision, as to this point, there is no appeal.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

This was a petition by George W. Glenn and John E. Glenn, as administrators of the estate of G. W. Glenn, Sr., deceased, for *final settlement. The decree of the Probate Court was as follows:

1. The abolition of slavery took place before the death of Geo. W. Glenn, and slaves given by him cannot be regarded as advancements. By the statute the value of the advancement is to be estimated at the death of the ancestor, relation being had to its condition at the time of the gift. This point is decided in the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C. 51, where the Supreme Court holds that "we do not see how a slave can be regarded as an advancement when the intestate died after the abolition of slavery, when slaves lost their attributes as property." It was contended by counsel for G. W. Glenn, administrator, that in that case the donor reserved title in himself, and had a life interest in the slaves, and that the principle does not apply in this case. Regardless of the contingent titles held by the donor in that case, it was there decided that the slaves were not advancements, and so I hold in this case.

2. The question of interest in final accounts has been much discussed. I have reviewed the authorities submitted by both sides. The true mode of computing interest is laid down in the case of Baker v. Lafitte, 4 Rich. Eq. 392.

3. The cash rents for the year 1867 are estimated at $500 in gold, and it is admitted that the premium on gold was 40 per cent. I think that in the final account the administrator should be held accountable for the amount of $700, being the value of gold at that time in United States treasury notes.

4. It is in evidence that G. W. Glenn, Jr., and J. E. Glenn borrowed $5,000 from Col. John Glenn, and Dr. G. W. Glenn, Sr., was their surety. It seems that John E. Glenn owed G. W. Glenn, Jr., a note of $1,800, with interest, amounting to $2,300, for which G. W. Glenn received, in 1865, a credit on the note of $5,000, leaving a balance of $2,700 still due on said note; that interest was paid on the note of Col. John Glenn up to the death of the latter. There is, then, now due on the note of $5,000, interest from the death of Col. John Glenn up to 1865, when a credit of $2,300 should be placed upon the same, and the balance to bear interest to May 13th,

1881. The note is for *money borrowed from Col. John Glenn, and assured by Dr. G. W. Glenn, Sr., and the evidence shows that it was considered by Dr. G. W. Glenn, Sr., to be an advancement to his sons G. W. and J. E. I think the proper way to estimate the amount which each should be liable for, is to ascertain the balance due at the date of the credit, and divide that amount equally, and allow the amount of advancement made to G. W., Jr., to be credited by $2,300, and then compute the interest on the balance due by each one to July 1st, 1881.

5. The note of $1,130 due by R. C. Gilliam is founded on the basis of slavery still existing, and the consideration is for negroes advanced, and, on the principle heretofore announced, it is not an advancement.

6. The gold watch was added to $1,000 note given to J. H. Mims to make his distributive share equal to R. C. Gilliam, the which consideration is based on negroes as an advancement, and therefore cannot be regarded as an advancement. Although the watch of itself did not partake of the same character, yet, taken in connection with the whole transaction, it, too, is tinged with the idea as held in Hughes v. Eichelberger, and under all these circumstances cannot be considered an advancement.

The note of $1,000 given by J. H. Mims stands in the same category as the $1,130 note of R. C. Gilliam, and for the same reasons cannot be regarded as an advancement.

It is therefore ordered that the distribution of the assets of the estate of Dr. Geo. W. Glenn, deceased, in the hands of the administrator be made in accordance with this decree, after the costs and disbursements of this action, and all advancements which were made as indicated herein, and such payments as may have been made by the administrator since the death of George W. Glenn, Sr., shall have been deducted.

From this decree an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court. The Circuit decree is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court, as are also the exceptions.

Messrs. Jones & Jones and George Johnstone, for appellants.

Messrs. J. T. Barron and W. H. Lyles, contra.

*September 28th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Dr. George W. Glenn, Sr., late of Newberry county, died in 1866. The appellants, his two sons, administered upon his estate. In June, 1870, they filed a petition in the Probate Court for a final settlement, but this was delayed, as it is alleged, by suits against the estate, especially the suit of one Harvey Terry against the stockholderss of the Commercial Bank, which suit largely involved the estate. This suit, however, having terminated in July, 1881, another publication was made, and the settlement proceeded to a decree by the Probate Court. From this decree an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, Judge Pressley presiding, and from Judge Pressley's decree, the matter is now before us on appeal.

The questions presented are: First. Whether certain of the distributees should account, as for advancements, for certain slaves given off to them by their father, the intestate, during his life, to wit, in 1860; the said intestate having died after emancipation, and some of the distributees having sold the slaves received, before emancipation. Second. G. W. Glenn, Jr., one of the appellants, under an order of court, rented the real estate of his father in 1867 at $500 in gold, and had charged himself in December, 1867, for said rent, $500, $166 of which he had paid out to Mary A. Glenn, one of the distributees. Gold at that time was at 40 per cent. premium, and the question is, Should he be charged with this premium, or simply for gold? Third. The appellants, some time before the death of their father, to wit, in 1859, had borrowed of their uncle, one John Glenn, the sum of $5,000, for which they gave their note, with their father, the intestate, as surety. In 1859 John Glenn died, and G. W. Glenn, Sr., the intestate, administered on his estate and became possessed of this note. In 1863, G. W. Glenn, Jr., paid on this note about $2,300. After this payment, and a short time before his death, G. W. Glenn, Sr., destroyed this note, having charged himself with it in the estate of his intestate, John Glenn, and the question as to this note is, whether the appellants should account for the same in full, debt and interest, or whether it should be regarded as an advancement to them by their father, *and, if so, at what time, or rather to what time, should interest on the note be added in ascertaining the amount of the advancement, and, also, in what proportion should each appellant account? Fourth. Should the appellants be charged with interest on the funds of the estate in their hands during the delayed settlement? Fifth. Should a gold watch, valued at $130, given to one of the distributees, Mrs. Mims, be charged as an advancement with the negroes bought by her husband?

As to these questions, Judge Pressley held: 1. Under the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C. 51, that the negroes could not be regarded as advancements. 2. That the $5,000 note destroyed by the intestate, should be charged as an advancement to the appellants without interest until after the death of the intestate. 3. That G. W. Glenn, Jr., should be charged with 40 per cent. premium on the $500 rental of the land of his father. 4. That in the absence of all proof that appellants had kept the funds idle and uninvested, pending the litigation against them, they are liable for interest on their annual balances, and the interest should be calculated according to the rule laid down in Baker v. Lafitte, 4 Rich. Eq. 392. He made no decree as to the gold watch.

The appeal involves a review of these questions, and the rulings thereon by the Circuit judge. The decree adjudged other matters of interest to the parties, but the appeal embraces only the questions above stated. As to the first question, we regard the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, supra, as conclusive and controlling. It was there held distinctly, Justice McIver delivering the opinion of the court, that where the parent had died after the abolition of slavery, slaves previously given off to a child, could not, under our statute, be charged as an advancement in the settlement of the estate of the father, the question as to the services of such slaves while in the child's possession being reserved, as the point was not raised in the case. Nor is that point raised here. It is true that, in the case of Hughey v. Eichelberger, the court was somewhat influenced by the ground taken by the appellant's counsel, to wit, that the father there had reserved a life-estate in the negroes given to the child; but the main ground relied upon by the court was the construction of *the act on the subject of advancements, and upon this Justice McIver said: "We do not see how a slave can be regarded as an advancement when the intestate died after abolition of slavery, whereby slaves lost their attributes as property. It is manifestly impossible to ascertain the value of such an advancement, if advancement it be called. By our act of 1791, corresponding in terms with section 7, ch. LXXXV. Gen. Stat. 440, the value of the advancement is to be estimated at the death of the ancestor, relation being had to its condition at the time of gift. McCaw v. Blewit, 2 McCord Eq. 104. * * * Now, in this case, the intestate having died after the slaves were emancipated, it is clearly impossible to ascertain the value of these slaves by the rule established by the statute, and we are not at liberty to invent any other." This reasoning is unanswerable, and applies to the case now before the court as strongly as it did to the case in which it was used. The ruling of the court below is sustained as to this point.

As to the second question, Judge Pressley says in his decree, that "for the year 1867 George Glenn, administrator, rented intestate's plantation for $500, payable in gold, and at the end of the year charged himself with $500, then received for such rent. About the same time he paid one of the distributees $166 in gold and charged in addition 40 per cent. premium on said payment. It is very clear that the remainder of said gold in his hands, as administrator, is chargeable with a like premium in the absence of all proof by him that he continued to hold said gold for estate purposes, until it depreciated in comparison with currency. The Judge of Probate has so decided, and I sustain him on that point."

There is nothing objectionable in this. The gold which the administrator received was the property of the estate. It was received by him for the estate; and at the time it was worth forty per cent. more than its nominal value, and the administrator should account for it at that value, unless it was held by him for estate purposes until it depreciated without fault on his part. If it was so held, and had depreciated, he above all others was cognizant of the fact, and it was incumbent on him to make proof thereof, otherwise its original value will be presumed *against him. This he seems to have understood, as he obtained credit for $166 paid to one of the distributees at the premium of forty per cent. It would not be just to charge him simply with the $500, and then credit him with its disbursement in whole or in part at a premium of forty per cent.

Third. In Rees v. Rees, 11 Rich. Eq. 108, where a mother held a bond against her son, given for eleven slaves, which, previous to her death, he had purchased from her, and which bond the mother destroyed, it was held as an advancement of so much money, and the son was required to account for it as such. This case is in point as to the $5,000 note held by the intestate on the appellants, and determines the question as to the fact whether this note should be regarded as an advancement. It must be so regarded, and being so regarded, it must be governed by the law applicable to advancements generally on the subject of interest. No interest can be charged until the death of the intestate. This is as to advancements generally, and it must apply here.

But the main questions are, When was the advancement made? What was its amount? and How should it be proportioned between the two sons? The note seems to have been destroyed by G. W. Glenn, Sr., a short time before his death, which took place in May, 1866. A payment of $2,300 had been made by G. W. Glenn, Jr., some time previous to the death of the intestate; but at what precise time it does not appear in the briefs. At one place it is stated in 1863, and at another in 1865. We suppose it was really made in 1865, as it is so stated in the decree of the Probate judge. At the time of this payment, the intestate had not determined to destroy the note. He still held it and received a large payment upon it from one of the makers. He must have concluded, however, within a short time after this payment, to destroy it—as he died early in the next year—and the evidence is that he destroyed it a short time before his death; but up to the time it was destroyed, it was a subsisting obligation against the two sons, principal and interest, and the amount then due must be regarded as the advancement. Taking the payment to have been made in 1865, the proper way to estimate the advancement would be to compute the interest up to the payment in 1865, then divide the amount between the two, charging each *with one-half at the death of the intestate as an advancement, the advancement of G. W. Glenn being diminished by a credit of the $2,300 paid by him on the note, and it is so adjudged.

Fourth. There is no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the interest to be charged to the appellants, administrators, on the funds of the estate in their hands. The judge said: "In the absence of all proof that appellants kept the funds in hand uninvested and unused by them to meet pending litigation against them, they are liable for interest on their annual balances, &c., &c., the calculation to be made according to the rule stated in Baker v. Lafitte, 4 Rich. Eq. 392." Doubtless there are many cases where the rule would be deflected, and where the administrator or executor should be excused from interest altogether; but this should be upon facts warranting the holding of the funds idle to meet the demands and exigencies of the estate, and developing the fact that the funds were actually so held idle.

Fifth. We can see no reason why Mrs. Mims should not be charged with $130 as an advancement, the value of the gold watch received by her.

It is the judgment of the court that the decree below be modified in accordance with the principles hereinabove announced; and it is ordered that this judgment be certified to the Probate Court for Newberry county, so that the settlement may be made in conformity thereto.

[This case is also cited in Faber v. Faber, 76 S. C. 161, 56 S. E. 677, without specific application.]

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, April, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, for appellant.

October 2d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. At the sale of certain real estate, situated in the city of Charleston, under a consent decree pronounced by Judge Fraser in the above-entitled cause, Peter Tecklenburg became the purchaser at the price of $1,280, who failing to comply, a rule to show cause was issued against him by Judge Cothran, presiding, on March 9th, 1883. To this rule the said Tecklenburg made return, admitting that he had refused to comply, and gave as a reason, that he was advised by counsel that the title offered was not good and marketable. In support of this answer he submitted the following statements: "1. That the legal estate to said land is vested in the trustee, Francis Dupont, his successor or his heir-at-law; and neither the said Francis Dupont, or, if he be dead, his heir-at-law, nor any substituted trustee is a party to the proceeding under which the sale was made. 2. That there are in esse remaindermen, the grandchildren of the said Emma Leroy, who are not parties to the said proceedings. 3. That the purpose of said proceeding is not to effect a change of investment, but to destroy the trust estate, and scatter the corpus thereof. 4. That it is sought to apply one-half of the proceeds of sale in liquidation of a large arrearage of taxes, which taxes, under the law, are exclusively the debt of the life-tenant, and he prayed that the rule be dismissed with costs.

On hearing the rule and answer, Judge

Cothran ordered that *it be made absolute; and further, that the proceeds of the sale, after payment of costs and expenses, be retained, subject to the further order of the court modifying the previous order of sale to that extent. Tecklenburg has appealed, assigning error, substantially, on the grounds stated in his answer to the rule.

The main question involved is, whether Tecklenburg could obtain a complete title under his purchase; whether a deed from the officer of the court, under the circumstances, could convey such a title. This is denied by the respondent to the rule, because, as he alleges, all persons interested in the land were not made parties to the proceeding under which it was sold. If this position is correct, the conclusion urged by the appellant would follow, because it is well settled, that to divest one of his interest in property of any kind by the judgment of a court, he must be a party to the proceeding, either in person or by a representative, otherwise the judgment is a nullity as to him. The precise point to be considered, then, is, whether all necessary parties were before the court when this consent decree was rendered by Judge Fraser.

The land originally belonged to Mrs. Heloise Boudo, who died in 1837, leaving of force her last will and testament, under which the said land, with the balance of her estate, was devised and bequeathed to the parties therein named upon certain terms and conditions. To ascertain the rights of the parties it will be necessary to consider the provisions of this will, and the codicil thereto. One Charles Edmondston, was the executor, and the testatrix directed that he should duly settle and assure to a competent trustee one moiety of her estate to certain uses, that is to say, in trust to receive the rents, issues, income and profits thereof during the natural lives of Narcisse Leroy and Emma Leroy, his wife, (a daughter of testatrix,) and from time to time to pay the same to the said Emma and her assigns, for her sole and separate use, &c. &c. So that the said Emma Leroy shall not sell, mortgage, charge, or otherwise dispose of the same in the way of anticipation. And if the said Emma Leroy should survive her husband, then in trust to convey the said moiety to the said Emma, her heirs and assigns forever.

*By a codicil, the testatrix afterwards changed somewhat the terms of this bequest as follows, to wit: She directed that the said one moiety should be settled and assured to the sole and separate use of the said Emma in the manner and upon the conditions mentioned in her will, but subject to the alterations made in the codicil. She then revokes so much of her will as directed the moiety to go to Emma absolutely, in the event that she survived her husband, and directs that said moiety shall be settled to the sole and separate use of the said Emma, notwithstanding her coverture, free from the direction, control or interference, debts or contracts of her present or any future husband, so that she shall not sell, mortgage, charge or otherwise dispose of her interest in the same by anticipation. And that the said interest shall be for the term of her natural life, and no longer. And after the death of the said Emma, then said moiety to be equally divided among such children as she shall leave surviving her, the issue of deceased children to represent their parents, and take shares accordingly. And if the said Emma should leave no children nor their issue living at her death, then said moiety was to go to such persons then living as by the laws of the State shall at that time be entitled to distribution thereof.

In April, 1841, Charles Edmondston, who had qualified as executor, conveyed by deed, reciting therein the will and codicil, to one Francis Dupont, one moiety of the lot of land now in controversy, to have and to hold the same unto him, his heirs and assigns forever, in trust nevertheless to have and to hold the same and to take and receive the rents, issues and profits of the same and every part thereof, &c., to the sole use of the said Emma, notwithstanding her coverture, free from the direction, control or debts of her husband, &c. And from and after her death, then the said moiety shall be equally divided among such children of the said Emma, or the issue of such deceased children, as she shall leave surviving her, the issue of such deceased children to represent their parents, &c. And if the said Emma shall leave neither children nor their issue living at her death, then to such person or persons as by the laws of the State shall then be entitled to distribution of her estate.

F. Dupont accepted the trust. He has, however, been dead *for some years. Narcisse Leroy, the husband of Emma, is also dead. The plaintiff, Emma Leroy, is the Emma mentioned in the will, and her children are all parties plaintiff with her. Some of these children have children, none of whom are parties. No trustee has been substituted for Dupont, nor has his heir-at-law been made a party. It is admitted that the lot is vacant and unproductive. It is claimed that it has been forfeited for non-payment of taxes, and the city council of Charleston has titles from the sinking fund commission. The plaintiff and the city council obtained a consent decree that the land should be sold and the proceeds divided equally. This last provision, as it has been stated, was modified by Judge Cothran's order, so that the proceeds of the sale should be retained in court subject to its further order. The position of the appellant is, that the heir of the deceased trustee and the grandchildren of the life-tenant, Emma, should have been made parties, which not having been done, a marketable title cannot be made to him. This raises the question as to the character of the interests of the different parties under the will, the codicil and the trust deed to Dupont.

There can be no doubt that the interest of Emma is a life-estate in equity. But what is the estate of the remaindermen? Is this a vested, or contingent remainder? The plaintiffs, under the authority of Seabrook v. Gregg, 2 S. C. 68; Rivers v. Fripp, 4 Rich. Eq. 276; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. 495 [12 L. Ed. 1170], and other cases of like character, contend that the children of Emma have a vested remainder, with a condition subsequent attached, by which this remainder may be defeated, it is true, but in advance of this defeat, no other persons except those before the court have an appreciable interest, and no others, therefore, need be made parties. Is this construction tenable?

It is true that the inclination of the courts is against contingent remainders, for good and sufficient reasons, and, in doubtful cases, the balance will always be turned against a construction which leads to their establishment; but where such remainders have been clearly created, founded upon the well-settled rules of law, they must be sustained. Persons owning property have the right to dispose of their acquisition as to them shall seem proper, and so long as they keep within the rules of law, *no court is invested with power to defeat this right. The general definition of a contingent remainder as found in Blackstone (and no better can be given) is, that it is "an estate in remainder limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event." 2 Bl. Com. 169. The limitation here is "to such children of Emma Leroy, or the issue of such deceased children as she should leave surviving her, the issue of deceased children to represent their parents, and if she shall have neither children nor their issue living at her death, then to such person or persons as by the laws of this State shall be entitled to distribution of her estate."

It will be observed that the limitation is not to the children generally as a class, but to such children as shall survive her. This language is peculiar and seems significant. The event which is to determine the beneficiary, is survivorship. This is in the future, and is certainly an uncertain and dubious event. It may never take place, either as to a child of Emma, or as to the issue of a deceased child. Emma may outlive all of her descendants, children and grandchildren. In such case, among these there would be no remaindermen, and no such estate could ever vest. But even should this event happen, until it does take place, it is quite as uncertain who of the children, or of their issue, will be embraced among the survivors, as is the happening of the event itself. Thus the limitation is both to a dubious and uncertain person and upon an uncertain event. See the cases of Dehon v. Redfern, Dud. Eq. 118, and Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 385.

In the first, Chancellor Harper, in speaking of remainders like this, used the following language: "They were to the children who should be living at the death of the daughters, respectively, or to the children of those who had died leaving children. Until the death of the daughters it must remain perfectly uncertain who will be the persons to take, and this is the definition of one species of contingent remainders." In the latter case, Mr. Justice McIver delivered the opinion of the court. In that case the language of the will was substantially the same as in this. The court held the remainder contin-gent. But the case is here *referred to especially on account of the able and conclusive reasoning of Justice McIver on the questions now before us.

The cases relied on by the respondent, Rivers v. Fripp, supra, and others, do not apply. In these cases, generally, there was an event fixed, which was to happen, or not happen, at a time beyond the termination of the life-estate, to wit, the majority of the remaindermen, and upon which the absolute character of the remainder was to depend. In such cases the courts have held that this was a condition subsequent, which might defeat the remainder already vested, and not a condition precedent, upon which it was to attach. The courts presumed this to be the intention of the donor, otherwise there would be a period, to wit, the time between the death of the life-tenant and the majority of the remaindermen, when no one would be entitled to the estate.

It is true that all of the cases relied on by the respondent are not characterized by this feature, and especially in the case of Williamson v. Berry, supra, is it absent. It is difficult to reconcile that case with the law, as seems to be settled in other cases; and it is to be regretted that the learned court pronouncing the judgment in that case did not go deeper into this question. It will be seen, however, upon an examination of that case, that while the court expressed a very decided opinion upon the point involved here, yet that question was not raised in the grounds of appeal which carried the case up, and, therefore, was not really before the court for adjudication. But be that as it may, the weight of authority in our State is the other way, and in obedience to these we must hold, that the remainder here is a contingent remainder to such of the children of Emma Leroy as may survive her, and to the surviving issue of such as may be deceased at her death, the said issue taking the share which their parent would have taken in case of surviving.

It is further the opinion of the court, that the legal title of the property in question was in the trustee, Dupont, during his life, which, at his death, descended to his heir-at-law. This follows from the terms of the trust deed, and it must be so held unless the estate was executed by the statute. It is a familiar doctrine that the statute never executes a use while there is anything for the trustee to do. Here there were active and responsible duties *devolving upon the trustee. He was to receive and pay over the rents and profits, and he was to preserve the trust, so that the life-tenant could in no event sell, mortgage, charge or otherwise dispose of her interest by anticipation.

Now the questions arise, Should the grandchildren of Emma Leroy, known to be alive, have been made parties, as well as her children, and should the heir-at-law of the trustee, Dupont, have been before the court? In Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627], the court said: "That the Court of Equity has the power to sell the estates of infants, remaindermen, whether vested or contingent, when they are parties before the court, is unquestionable." It further said: "The court has also power to bar by its decree for sale of property, the interest of unborn contingent remaindermen, and of contingent remaindermen, residing abroad, whose names and places of residence are unknown, and who, of course, cannot be made parties before the court." See, also, the case of Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq. 331. This is in accordance with the general rule in equity, that all who are materially interested in the subject of the suit, however numerous, that can be, ought to be made parties in the shape of either plaintiffs or defendants. Trescot v. Smyth, 1 McCord Eq. 301.

We think that the grandchildren in this case, at least those whose names and residences are known, should have been made parties. We think, too, that the proceeding was defective in the fact that the heir-at-law of the trustee was not summoned. The fee of this land was in him during his life, and at his death it descended to his heir-at-law. Without their presence, or the presence of a substituted trustee in whom the fee could vest, it is not in court, nor has it any representative here. Nor can it under the circumstances be conveyed to the purchaser. The proposed title to the appellant is then defective, wanting a material link—Story Eq. Pl., §§ 207–211; Hopkins v. Mazyck, Rich. Eq. Cas. 263—and he is not bound to accept it. The other questions in the case, as to the destruction of the trust, and who should be responsible for the taxes, need not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the rule be discharged.

20 S. C. *79

*SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

[1. Corporations ⇐338.]

The liability of the officers personally for debts of a corporation, in case of their violation of sections 16, 17 and 28 of the general incorporation act of 1869, (General Statutes of 1872, Chap. LXIV.,) under which the company was chartered, arises by contract under the provisions of their charter. Sullivan v. Sullivan Manufacturing Company, 14 S. C. 494.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bird & Co. v. Calvert, 22 S. C. 298; Hall & Co. v. Klinck, 25 S. C. 352, 60 Am. Rep. 505.

The certificates in this case held not to have been made and recorded in compliance with the requirements of sections 16, 17 and 28 of the act of 1869, and, therefore, under section 29, the officers were jointly and severally liable as individuals for the debts of the corporation contracted during the time of such violation.

[3. Corporations ⇐341.]

To substitute actual notice, by a creditor, of the facts required by this act to be reported and recorded, the actual notice should be of all the facts required in the record; moreover, actual notice by the creditor could not relieve the officers of the company of the liability imposed by the act, which became a contract by them when they accepted their office, to the effect that if they failed to perform the duties then assumed, they would pay the debts of the corporation.

[4. Limitation of Actions ⟸58.]

The personal liability of the officers resulted, under section 29, from a failure to perform the duties imposed by sections 16, 17 and 28, and from the time of such failure, the statute of limitations began to run in their favor, as individuals.

[5. Limitation of Actions ⟸58.]

Several pre-existing notes having been consolidated into one large note, the statute of limitations would not run in favor of the officers on their personal liability until the maturity of the last note, if such last note was taken as payment, such personal liability being dependent upon the fact of indebtedness and failure to perform their corporate duties, and not upon the character or consideration of the debt.

But the latest note not being shown to have been payment of the older notes, the liability attached to the persons in office at the dates of the earlier notes, from which time the statute of limitations as to such indebtedness began to run in the officers' favor.

The relation of the officers, personally, to the debts of the corporation was not like that of partners and joint contractors, where admissions by one before the debt is barred have been held to bind the others.

[8. Bills and Notes ⟸430.]

[The question whether a note issued by a corporation on the taking up of several of its prior notes was in payment of such notes, or merely a renewal in consolidated form, is one of intention, the burden of proof resting on the party claiming it to be a payment.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1251; Dec. Dig. ⟸430.]

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, July, 1882.

This was an action by Hewlett Sullivan against the Sullivan Manufacturing Company and its officers, commenced in February, 1880. The cause has been before this court on appeal once before, and will be found reported, 14 S. C. 494. The *character of the action, the indebtedness and other matters will be found in the opinion of this court at the present hearing.

At the hearing, Judge Pressley permitted one of the defendants to plead the statute of limitations, the others having plead it in their original answer.

All the certificates are furnished in the brief; but it will be sufficient to state here the original certificate of March 23d, 1871, and that of September 13th, 1872. All the certificates were signed and sworn to by the officers, and recorded by the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville county. The original certificate was as follows:

"State of South Carolina, }
"Greenville County. }

"March 23d, 1871.

"To F. L. Cardoza, Secretary of State:

"Sir—In accordance with the provisions of an act of the general assembly of said State entitled an 'Act to regulate the formation of corporations,' approved December 10th, 1869, we beg leave to make the following certificate, to wit:

"That we, stockholders of the corporation known as the Sullivan Manufacturing Company, cotton-yarn and cotton-cloth manufacturers, organized June 8th, 1870, and re-organized on the 28th September, 1870, with a capital stock of not less than twenty thousand dollars, and doing business at Fork Shoals on Reedy Fork creek, waters of Reedy river, in the county of Greenville and State aforesaid, did, on the 28th day of September, 1870, at a meeting called for that purpose, at which meeting four-fifths of the stock of the company was represented, organize our company under the provisions of the act of the general assembly above referred to, and elected the officers required by said act. Thirteen thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars of the capital stock of the company have actually been paid in, and the par value of the share has been fixed at one hundred dollars per share."

The other certificate referred to was as follows:

"Fork Shoals, Greenville Co., S. C.
"13th Sept., 1872.

"To W. A. McDaniel, Clerk of the Court for said County:

"Sir—In accordance with the provisions of an 'Act to regulate the formation of corporations,' approved December 10th, *1869, we beg leave to make the following certificate, viz.: At our annual meeting held on the fourth, the president and some of the stockholders being absent, the annual meeting was adjourned to this day. A quorum being present from notice having been given previously that the capital stock of the Sullivan Manufacturing Company would be increased by subscriptions to the original stock of said company; whereupon thirteen thousand and three hundred dollars ($13,300) in new stock was taken, namely, G. W. Sullivan, Sr., eighty-three hundred dollars ($8,300); Jane C. Todd, one thousand dollars ($1,000); E. A. Featherston, one thousand dollars ($1,000); Emma Austin, one thousand dollars ($1,000); H. E. Holland, one thousand dollars ($1,000); and James M. Sullivan, one thousand dollars ($1,000). All of said sums being paid in full, except subscription of James M. Sullivan. And further, the treasurer's books being examined, we find that from the beginning, sixteen thousand four hundred and forty-two dollars and forty cents ($16,442.40) of the original stock has been paid, and on the assessment of twenty per cent. of the original stock, the sum of thirty-one hundred and sixty-three dollars and fourteen cents ($3,163.14) has been paid. The par value of the shares being one hundred dollars each. And we further find there is due the company on original stock and assessments, thirty-one hundred and ninety-six dollars and ninety-six cents ($3,196.96), and that the liabilities of the company are about seven thousand dollars ($7,000)."

The matters in this case, which the decree of Judge Hudson leaves open, are the amount due the plaintiff by the said company, and the liability of its directors for the same.

I find that said company is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $8,008.27 on note dated October 16th, 1876, with interest at 10 per cent. from December 25th, 1876. I further find that there is a balance due plaintiff on open account of $1,432.98 for cotton sold to said company during that year. For the amounts above stated, plaintiff is entitled, and is hereby authorized, to enter judgment and issue execution against the said company.

As to the liability of the directors of said company, I find that the certificate filed by them with the secretary of state is not a proper compliance with section 16 of the act of 1869, and that when the capital of said company was opened to admit new *stockholders, no certificate was filed according to section 17 of said act. I further find that none of the annual certificates filed by the directors with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas contain the necessary information to persons dealing with said company, which section 17 of said act plainly requires.

The directors have pleaded the statute of limitations, and my judgment is that the statute runs in their favor from the time the several debts were contracted. There is no sufficient proof before me as to the exact date of the several contracts, which were consolidated in the said note of October 16th, 1876. My judgment, therefore, is, that the directors who were acting at the various times when the several items of debt included in said note were contracted, are liable jointly and severally for such portions of said note as cover debts contracted during their year of service, but subject to plea of the statute of limitations, to run from the date each item of debt was contracted.

As to balance due on open account for the year 1879, I find that G. W. Sullivan, Sr., and G. W. Sullivan, Jr., were the only acting directors for that year. The testimony is clear that the company was then insolvent, and that the stockholders left it to the management of these two directors. P. D. Cureton was elected one of the directors in 1877, and then signed the defective certificate which was filed with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, but he took no part in any of the subsequent proceedings of said company. That fact was known to the plaintiff, and it is clear from his own testimony, and that of G. W. Sullivan, Sr., and G. W. Sullivan, Jr., that his dealings were solely with them during the year 1879.

It is, therefore, adjudged that plaintiff is entitled, and hereby authorized to enter judgment and issue execution against G. W. Sullivan, Sr. and G. W. Sullivan, Jr. for $1,432.98, balance of 1879. It is further ordered, that the master do take the testimony and report as to what items of debt, and their respective dates, were consolidated in the said note of October 16th, 1876, and who were the directors of said company at the time each debt was contracted.

All parties appealed upon exceptions which raised the points considered in the opinion.

*Messrs. Perry & Perry and J. H. Whitner, for plaintiff.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, the Sullivan Manufacturing Company, doing business in Greenville county, on October 16th, 1876, gave its sealed note to plaintiff for $8,008.27, payable on or by December 25th thereafter, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. after maturity. This note was the consolidation of other notes held by plaintiff on this company, previously given. The said company was also indebted to the plaintiff, as he claimed, in the sum of $8,228.48 for cotton sold to it during the year 1879. The action below was brought by the plaintiff to recover payment of these demands, and to that end he prayed, with other relief, that he should have judgment for said sums against the company and also against the directors, George W. Sullivan, Sr., G. W. Sullivan, Jr., D. Dunklin Moore and Paschal D. Cureton, alleging that for reasons hereafter to be examined, the said directors were personally liable for these debts.

Judge Pressley, who heard the case, held and decreed that because of the failure of the directors to comply with certain requirements of the act of 1869, entitled an "Act to regulate the formation of corporations," that the directors, G. W. Sullivan, Sr., G. W. Sullivan, Jr., and D. D. Moore, were personally liable for such of the plaintiff's claim as was not barred by the statute of limitations, which statute the said defendants had interposed. He further held, that as the large note of plaintiff's was but the consolidation of other smaller notes given by the company at different dates prior to said consolidation, that the statute would begin to run in favor of the directors at the maturity of each of these smaller notes. He therefore gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,432.98, the amount of the cotton debt as found by him, and to which the statute had not been interposed, and ordered that it be referred to the master to take the testimony and report as to the items of the consoli*dated debt, their respective dates, and who were the directors at the time each debt was contracted.

Both sides have appealed. The directors from so much of the decree as holds them personally liable for any part of the debts, and the plaintiff from so much as allows the said directors the protection of the statute of limitations.

First. Was it error in the Circuit judge to hold the directors liable for the plaintiff's debts? and, second, if not, was it error to permit them to shield themselves from any portion thereof by the statute of limitations? These are the questions before the court. The solution of the first must depend upon the construction of those sections of the act of 1869, under which this company became a corporate being, and then upon the fact whether the requirements of the sections had been complied with by the directors. The second upon the question whether the statute had a new starting point at the consolidation of the previous notes, or whether, having commenced with each of the old notes as they fell due, its currency continued.

The sections of the act of 1869, under which Judge Pressley held the directors liable, are sections 16, 17 and 28. He said: "As to the liability of the directors of said company, I find that the certificate filed by them with the secretary of state is not a proper compliance with section 16 of the act of 1869; and that when the capital of said company was opened to admit new stockholders, no certificate was filed according to section 17 of said act. I further find that none of the annual certificates filed by the directors with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas contain the necessary information to persons dealing with said company, which section 28 of said act plainly requires."

The act of 1869 referred to is found in 14 Statutes at Large, p. 297, and the sections involved are as follows:

"Section 16. Before such corporations commence business, the president, treasurer and a majority of the directors shall sign, swear to, publish three times in some newspaper, printed in the town or county wherein such corporation is situated, and deposit with the secretary of state a certificate setting forth the corporate name and purpose of the association, the amount of the capital stock, the amount actually paid in, and the par value of the *shares in the corporation, and shall file a copy thereof with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in the county wherein the corporation is situated, to be by him recorded in a book kept for the purpose within thirty days after the payment of any installment called for by the directors; a certificate thereof shall be in like manner signed, sworn to, deposited, filed and recorded.

"Section 17. When the capital stock and shares of any such corporation are increased or reduced under the provisions of section 14, a certificate thereof shall be made, signed, sworn to, deposited and recorded in the manner aforesaid.

"Section 28. Every corporation organized under the provisions of this act shall file the certificate required of corporations by sections 23 and 24, and the directors shall make, and the president, treasurer and a majority of the directors shall sign, swear to, and deposit with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the county in which said corporation is established or located, within thirty days after the date of the annual or semi-annual meeting next preceding the date of such certificate, a certificate stating the date of such annual and semi-annual meeting, the amount of capital stock paid in, the name and number of shares held by such stockholders, the amount invested in real and in personal estate, and the amount as nearly as can be ascertained of existing demands against the corporation, all as ascertained at the date of such annual or semi-annual meeting."

Section 29 provides that "if the officers of any such corporations violate the provisions of section 2, or neglect or refuse to perform the duties required by sections 16, 17 and 28, they shall be jointly and severally liable for debts contracted during the continuance of such violation, refusal or neglect."

Sections 16, 17 and 28 are not difficult to comprehend, nor do they need interpretation. The duties imposed and required are plainly and distinctly stated. They are applicable to all corporations like this. They were imposed for a wise purpose, and the consequences of a failure to comply therewith on the part of the officers are unmistakably announced. The act of 1869 is a public act. It is not hid under a bushel, but it is spread upon the statute books; and a corporation organizing under its terms, is supposed, members, officers and all, to know its different pro*visions and to accept its obligations, and whether the statutes be penal or remedial can in fact make but little difference, because, let it fall under the one class or the other, there can be no mistake as to the real meaning of section 29, supra, wherein the legislature in terms not to be misunderstood enacted: That if the officers of any such corporation shall violate section 2, or neglect or refuse to perform the duties required by the other sections mentioned, they shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts contracted during the continuance of such violation, refusal or neglect.

In the face of this plain enactment it would be unnecessary refining to halt at the question, even if it were an open question, whether this liability results as a penalty or by contract. The name which may be given to it will not alter its character or lighten the burden imposed. But it is not an open question, because the point was distinctly considered and adjudged in the former case between these same parties, 14 S. C. 494. The question, therefore, recurs, Did the directors comply with the required conditions and terms during the time the plaintiff's debts were contracted? if not, prima facie liability has attached and it must be enforced unless the defenses invoked amount to a shield.

The findings of Judge Pressley as to the violation of sections 16 and 17 do not seem to have been expressly excepted to by the defendants, and according to the law governing appeals these findings are not subject to our review; but if they were, we do not see that they have been or can be successfully assailed. In fact it is admitted in the argument, that no certificate of the increase of the capital stock was made as seems to be required by section 17.

Section 16 requires that before the company commences business a certificate containing certain facts, made, signed and sworn to by the president, treasurer and a majority of the directors, shall be: 1. Published three times in some newspaper printed in the town or county wherein such corporation is situated; 2. Deposited with the secretary of state; and, 3. A copy thereof filed with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in the county wherein the corporation is situated, *to be by him recorded in a book kept for that purpose. In response to these requirements the company addressed a communication to the then secretary of state, and we suppose deposited with the secretary of state the first certificate found in the brief, containing substantially the fact required, upon which is indorsed the following: "Greenville, S. C. Clerk's Office. Recorded in Register Mesne Conveyance Book CC, page 566, and recorded 27 March, 1871. (Signed,) W. A. McDaniel, R. M. C." Also, "Greenville, S. C. Clerk's Office. Recorded in Corporation Book, page 1, and recorded 27 March, 1871. (Signed,) W. A. McDaniel, R. M. C."

Judge Pressley held that this certificate filed in the secretary of state's office was not a compliance with section 16 of the act. How could he have held otherwise? Where is the evidence that it was published three times in a newspaper printed in the city of Greenville or in Greenville county? Where is the evidence that a copy thereof was filed with the clerk of the court of that county? It is needless for us to inquire why the legislature demanded such special and particular acts on the part of the officers of such companies. All that it is for us to know is, ita lex scripta est.

Section 17, immediately following the provisions of section 16, as to depositing, recording, &c., of the certificate therein required, provides, that when the capital stock and shares of any such corporation are increased or reduced under the provisions of section 14, a certificate shall be made, signed and sworn to, deposited and recorded in manner aforesaid. The response to this was the certificate of September 13th, 1872, (found in the brief), addressed to W. A. McDaniel, and recorded in register of mesne conveyance, book EE, page 53. Recorded September 27th, 1872; signed W. A. McDaniel, R. M. C. Was this a deposit and a record in manner aforesaid? Did the annual certificates comply with section 28?

We find in the brief five certificates which we suppose were intended as the annual certificate required by the section, to wit, September 13th, 1871; September 13th, 1872; September 4th, 1873; September 2d, 1874, and September 5th, 1877. The first is defective in that it does not state the names and numbers *of shares held by the stockholders, the amount invested in real and personal estate, nor the estimated amount of existing demands against the corporation. The second, third, fourth and fifth are defective in the two first particulars of the first. The third was not recorded until September 21st, 1874. There seems to have been no certificate for the years 1875, 1876 and 1878. Why, does not appear fully in the brief. It was said, however, that there was no annual meeting for the years 1876 and 1878. Enough appears to sustain Judge Pressley's findings. There was not a full compliance with the terms or spirit of the act under which this company was attempting to do business, and Judge Pressley had no alternative but to enforce the liability imposed by section 29, which is a joint and several liability upon the officers for all debts contracted during the continuance of such violation, refusal or neglect.

As to the open account claim of plaintiff, its date and the officers of the company were known, and the judge authorized judgment and execution to enter for the amount found by him, $1,432.98, against G. W. Sullivan, Sr., and G. W. Sullivan, Jr., the acting officers. As to the large claim inasmuch as the dates of the different notes of which it was made up were not known, nor who were the officers at the time they were contracted, to apply the principles of law held by the judge to these demands, to wit, as to the statute of limitations, the judge ordered the master to take testimony as to the dates of these items, and who were the directors of said company at the time each debt was contracted.

This brings us to an examination of the main ground of the defense, which is, admitting the findings of the Circuit Judge to be correct as to the defects in the certificates required by sections 16, 17 and 28 of the act, yet, these defects were all cured as to the plaintiff by his personal knowledge of the facts thus required, the argument being, that these requirements were intended to put persons dealing with such companies upon their guard; to give them all necessary information as to their financial condition so that they might be dealt with understandingly; and that while this was important and necessary as to outsiders, yet, to one actually informed as to these matters by personal contact and *familiarity with the corporation, this was wholly unnecessary; that actual notice was the equivalent if not better than constructive notice. And it is urged that the plaintiff was so informed; that he was, in fact, the financial friend and adviser of the company.

This position is founded upon the analogy drawn from the familiar doctrine in reference to the recording of mortgages and other papers required to be recorded. It is true there are many such cases where actual notice will cure the defect of non-record. Can this doctrine be applied here? In the first place there is conflict in the testimony as to the extent of plaintiff's knowledge. He was not a stockholder, though he did attend some of the annual meetings; and in one meeting in 1875 seems to have represented the stock of one Mrs. Holland. As late as 1879, however, he swears that he "had no idea that the company was then insolvent." This is sustained by the fact that during that year he sold a large amount of cotton to the company. To substitute "actual notice" for a record, in a case like this, the actual notice should convey all the facts required in the record. Here the record was required to contain many minute and special facts. It will not do to say that all this was dispensed with, because the plaintiff was the brother of the president, uncle to the directors, the financial adviser of the concern, and, generally, the confidant and friend of all the parties. All this, if true, did not necessarily bring home to him the facts which the law required these officers to set forth in their annual certificates and to be deposited and filed in public office.

But a complete answer to this position is, that the liability of the directors, under the act of 1869, arises upon contract. Mr. Justice McIver, in this case, (14 S. C. 500,) said that "when these defendants accepted the positions of directors of a company, organized under an act declaring that in certain contingencies they should become liable for the debts of the company, they must be regarded as having agreed that if such contingencies should happen they must pay the debts of the company." This is the true theory of the act, and the liability thereunder is based on positive contract springing into existence the moment there is a failure to do what the act requires. The plaintiff comes *into court, proves the failure, and demands the enforcement of the incident contract. Can his right be frittered away by the construction urged by the defendants? The doctrine as to recording mortgages cannot be invoked here.

The true doctrine is found in Thomp. Corp. Off. 422, 423, where, in discussing the question as to the outside information of the creditor, he says: "The other reports, if filed, could give him no additional information of value. How, then, could the failure, neglect or refusal to file them injure him? Why, under such circumstances, should the directors be held personally liable for their neglect or refusal to comply with sections 18 and 19? What good reason could a creditor set up for insisting upon such liability? There could be but one—the positive provisions of the statute creating such liability, &c. The liability is the same whether the corporation is solvent or insolvent at the time the debt was contracted." And again, at 426, "The reliance of the creditor, therefore, one way or the other, the fact that he may be injured or not injured because of the failure to make and file the report, the fact that the corporation may be solvent or insolvent, or that the creditor at the time he dealt with the corporation had actual knowledge of the financial condition of the corporation, will not affect the liability created by the statutes."

The consideration of the plea of the statute of limitations comes next. When this statute is applicable at all, it commences to run at the accrual of the right of action. Now we have seen that the liability of the directors arises on contract; the right of action, therefore, of plaintiff, if he has any, must come from a breach of this contract and must accrue at the time of the breach. What is the contract? It is a general agreement made by the directors through the twenty-ninth section of the act of 1869, that they will, upon certain conditions, jointly and severally become liable for all debts contracted by the corporation. This agreement is not a necessary incident to every debt of the corporation founded upon the same consideration and attaching to such, but it is separate and apart from the debts and may or may not attach, dependent upon the contingencies specified in the act. The debt of the corporation is the primary, or rather *the original liability, and the contract of the directors is a subsequent matter and founded upon different and other considerations. The debt of the corporation is evidenced by note of open account for goods sold or services rendered, as the case may be; the liability of the directors by the terms of the section 29 of the act.

Now, it seems that the plaintiff held various notes on the corporation, all of which were given before the large note mentioned herein, and all of which were consolidated in said note. It further appears that during the times these various notes were given, the directors then in office failed to comply with sections 16, 17 and 28 of the act of 1869, and, therefore, that these directors became liable under their agreement as specified in section 29. The cause of action to the plaintiff was the failure on the part of the directors to comply with this agreement, to wit, to pay the notes of the company according to their tenor and effect, and a right of action accrued to him, as to said directors, upon the occurrence of this failure, to wit, at the maturity of each of the notes. And now, whether that right has been barred and lost as to any or all of these notes must, of course, depend upon the lapse of time since. Has six years intervened? It was to ascertain this that the Circuit judge referred the case to the master, and the final determination of the question must await his report.

The above is based upon the idea that the subsequent consolidation of these previous notes into the large note of plaintiff has not changed the status so far as to create new rights and impose new obligations. Let us now inquire into the correctness of this position. The consolidation of the previous notes into the large note had one of two effects. First, it created a new debt upon the corporation, of which the previous notes were the consideration, which notes it paid off and extinguished; or, secondly, it was a mere renewal of the previous notes which, for convenience, were consolidated into one and not a new debt creating a new liability. If it had the first effect, then we do not see why the directors, who were then in office, should not be liable for this large note under section 29, if at that time they failed or refused to comply with sections 16, 17 and 28. The *liability of the directors does not depend upon the character or consideration of the debt of the company, but upon the fact of that indebtedness accompanied with a failure on their part to perform certain imposed duties at or about the time the said indebtedness was contracted by the company, and in this event the currency of the statute would commence at the maturity of said large note. Under such a view, the ruling of his Honor, the Circuit judge, would be error. If, however, the second effect was the result, and the previous notes were not, in fact, paid off and extinguished, then the liability of the directors would depend upon the application of the statute to their agreement as to said notes, and the ruling of his Honor would be correct.

The pivot, then, in this branch of the case is, did this consolidation effect a payment and extinguishment of the previous debts, or was it a mere renewal, leaving those debts unpaid and still in existence. It was said in Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C. 80, that whether one security operates in payment and satisfaction of another is always a question of intention. And this seems to be the well-settled doctrine upon this subject. Burton v. Pressly, Cheves Eq. 1; Costelo v. Cave & Bradley, 2 Hill 528 [27 Am. Dec. 404]; Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 527, and many other cases. The Circuit judge has found, in substance, that the pre-existing notes had not been paid. He has, therefore, gone back behind the note sued on and ordered an inquiry as to the items and the dates of the several debts included therein, holding that the directors who were acting at those various dates were liable, but subject to the plea of the statute of limitations. We have found but little testimony in the case directed to this point. The most that there is comes from the plaintiff, where he speaks of the large note as a consolidation. The rule seems to be that the intention must govern, the onus probandi resting upon the party affirming it. The defendants deny payment, and the testimony of the plaintiff, so far as it goes, is against it. There was no error, therefore, in this finding of the judge.

We do not think that the relation of the directors to the company was such as to warrant the application of the principles of law contended for by plaintiff's counsel, in cases of joint and *several notes, copartnerships, &c., where the admissions, acts and payments of one will bind the others and prevent the statute or give it a new starting point. In such cases the parties are so closely connected that they are regarded in some sense as agents, one of the other, and bound, therefore, by each other's acts and admissions. But here no such connection exists. There the parties are all in the same contract, entered into at the same time and upon the same consideration. Here the contracts are different, that of the company being upon notes given by them for goods sold or services rendered, and that of the directors upon a general agreement made when the terms of the act of 1869 were accepted as evidenced by the organization of their company under its provisions. There is no analogy between the two, and, therefore, not subject necessarily to the same principles of law.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Result only concurred in.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, December, 1881.

The complaint in this case was as follows:

1. That John Graveley, the above-named testator, formerly of Charleston, in the county and State aforesaid, departed this life in England, on or about the 31st day of March, 1865, leaving, unrevoked and in full force and virtue, a last will and testament, a copy of which is hereto annexed as a part of this complaint.

2. That said will was proved in England, and subsequently thereto, to wit, on or about the 3d day of April, A. D. 1872, was admitted to probate on an exemplification thereof, by George Buist, Esq., judge of the Court of Probate for the county aforesaid, and then and there qualified Maria Torrens Graveley, one of the executors named and appointed by said will, and one of the defendants above named.

3. That the said testator inter alia bequeathed to John Graveley, the plaintiff herein, a legacy of $2,000 as follows, to wit, "I give and bequeath two thousand dollars each to John Graveley and Francis Porcher Graveley, the sons of my nephew, Cowlam Graveley, to be held in trust for them by my executors, and paid them with the accumulations of interest as they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years."

4. That John Graveley, the above-named plaintiff and legatee, has attained the age of twenty-one years, to wit, on or about the 18th day of September, A. D. 1879, and thereupon became entitled to the payment of the said legacy of $2,000, with the accumulations of interest thereon, but that he has not received the said legacy or any part thereof, nor have the accumulations of interest thereon nor any part thereof been paid him.

Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment for the said sum of $2,000, with the accumulations of interest thereon, at the rate *of seven per centum per annum, from the said 31st day of March, A. D. 1865, and the costs of this action.

The testator, John Graveley, executed his will in 1862; he died in March, 1865. Letters testamentary were granted to his widow, Maria Torrens Graveley, as executrix, in England, in May, 1865, and subsequently in America, in 1872. By this will the testator bequeathed to John Graveley, the plaintiff, a legacy of $2,000, to be paid him, with the accumulations of interest, when he attained the age of twenty-one years, which age was attained by the plaintiff on or about the 18th day of September, 1879.

The testator was a British subject by birth, but was, according to the testimony of Cowlam Graveley, to which no exception was taken, a denizen of South Carolina, and made his fortune as a merchant of Charleston. At about the time of the breaking out of the late war in the United States he removed to England, was in that country at the date of the will, and died there in March, 1865, just about the close of hostilities in America. The will contained a similar bequest to Francis Porcher Graveley, who was a resident of Charleston, and who has been settled with. It contained also a bequest to the St. George's Society of Charleston, and the residue of the testator's estate is given in trust for his widow and children.

Subsequent to qualifying in this State, the executrix, in 1873, invested in England the sum of £327 11s. 5d. and £90 6s. 0d., which, with accumulations added, and legacy duty to the British government subtracted, she submits amounted to the sum of £521 4s. 10d., about the time of the coming of age of the plaintiff. This she was willing to pay to the plaintiff on condition that he receipted for his legacy, which he refused to do. And the plaintiff has been paid no part of his legacy, nor the accumulations. He now brings this suit to recover the legacy bequeathed to him, and the accumulations of interest thereon.

On the threshold the plaintiff is met with the objection on the part of the defendant that this is an action ex contractu; that the summons is in the form of such as are prescribed in the code *for actions ex contractu; that the summons and complaint fix the character of the proceeding, and that the complaint, containing no averment of the assent of the executrix to the legacy from which a promise may be implied, does not state facts sufficient to sustain an action ex contractu on the implied promise of the executrix. We, who are accustomed to the old equity practice, find great difficulty in realizing that the code has abolished the various forms of action, and that but one form of action (criminal actions excepted) now is known to the law, denominated a "civil action;" and yet it is a fact that by recent legislation all distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of the same, are abolished.

A civil action is commenced by service of a summons, the requirements of which are stated in section 151 of the code. Section 152 requires a notice to be inserted in such summons. In actions ex contractu, the summons must state that the plaintiff will take judgment (in case of failure to answer) for a "sum specified therein." In other actions that (in case of failure to answer) the plaintiff will apply for the relief demanded in the complaint. When the action is not ex contractu, it does not follow that the plaintiff must use the exact words of the section, if he does, in fact, give notice that he will ask for the relief demanded in the complaint; and in this action that is just what the summons gives notice to the defendant, the plaintiff will apply for in case of default, to wit, the amount of the legacy ($2,000), with the accumulations of interest thereon. The complaint herein states all the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to equitable relief, and the technical objection to the form of his summons, even if it could have availed the defendant on a motion to set it aside, now comes too late.

But it is not the summons which decides whether or not the action is, in its nature, legal or equitable; this depends upon the facts stated in the complaint. The complaint must state concisely the facts which constitute the cause of action, and when, as in this case, the summons and complaint are served together, the defendant has notice of the nature of the action. If the facts stated in the complaint entitle the plaintiff to legal relief, it will be granted, and if to equitable relief, that will be decreed. *Conceding the summons to be irregular, the plaintiff, at this stage of the proceedings, would be entitled to amend the same, and if it were necessary, I would allow him so to do.

The legatee is next met with the objection that this is the ancillary jurisdiction, and that he cannot here hold the executrix to account for the legacy. I do not find it incumbent on me to determine the question of domicil thus raised, for the case can now be decided on other issues. This I do not regret, as the defendants claim that the question is not presented in the pleadings and that the raising of it at the hearing has in some measure operated as a surprise to them. I avoid, therefore, resting the decree on this issue, but were it necessary to decide it, I should hold that the question of domicil was properly raised, and that, from all the facts before me, the domicil of the testator, at the time of his death, was in Charleston. To this conclusion I arrive, not from the mere language of witnesses, but from the facts and circumstances proved. The evidence shows that the testator made his fortune in Charleston, resided there up to about the time of the civil war, was a denizen of this State, married a Charleston lady, his children were born in that city, and most of his estate, of which we have knowledge, was in this country.

'Tis true he went to England about 1860 to reside during the war, and being in that country in 1862, he executed his will, in which, as his executrix and executor, he appoints his widow, a South Carolinian, and a merchant of Charleston, the place where the bulk of his fortune lay. Just about the close of hostilities he died (March, 1865). I cannot gather from these circumstances a purpose on his part to permanently sever his wife and children from the friends and associates of their lives and the home of their birth, nor himself from his interests in this country. On the contrary, my opinion is that his stay in England was occasioned by the conflict in America, and was only of a temporary character. His domicil in this State having been proved, the evidence that it was lost is not sufficient.

But in rendering this decree I will treat this administration as ancillary. And now as to the right of the legatee to proceed in this jurisdiction, I deem no higher authority requisite than the *case of Harvey v. Richards, 1 Mason 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 6184]. That case expressly rules that legatees and distributees, as well as creditors, have the right to demand distribution of the estate in the ancillary jurisdiction where the necessities of the estate do not otherwise require, and the law of the domicil as to the order of distribution is duly regarded. I hold it to be the duty of a State to protect its own citizens, whether legatees or creditors, and this court will not send a legatee, a citizen and resident of South Carolina, where ample assets are, where the executrix has qualified, without cause, to a foreign tribunal for redress.

Nor will it, where, as in this case, no cause is shown for the exercise of comity, remit the assets to a foreign country merely to compel the legatee to follow them. If the condition of the estate, or the ends of justice demanded it, the court would remit the assets, but such is not the case here; no allegation or pretense of insufficiency of assets is alleged; on the contrary, the executrix professes her readiness to pay a sum, the result of an investment made in England, no reason having been suggested for remitting the funds in the hands of the South Carolina executrix to England; the legatee is entitled to recover his legacy here, and such, I am of opinion, was the intention of the testator, for the use of the word "dollars" in connection with the legacy, the appointment of a Charleston merchant and a Carolina lady as executor and executrix, and the scheme of the will, all tend to create this belief.

It is unnecessary to look into the investment in England, or consider its propriety; sufficient it is that the legatee demands his legacy in this forum of competent jurisdiction, under such a state of facts as entitles him to relief. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of his legacy, with interest from one year after the testator's death, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff do recover against the said Maria Torrens Graveley, executrix of the last will and testament of John Graveley, deceased, the sum of $4,198, together with the costs and disbursements of this suit, to be levied of the goods and chattels which are of the said testator, the said John

Graveley, deceased, in the hands of *the said Maria Torrens Graveley, as executrix, as aforesaid, to be administered, and if she has not so much thereof in her hands to be administered, then to be levied of the proper goods and chattels of the said Maria Torrens Graveley.

Memorandum.—As defendants' counsel is fearful that the language of this decree does not, with sufficient fullness and correctness, set forth the grounds of his objection to the plaintiff's cause of action, both as to form and substance, and may be construed as having found facts against him, as for example, the denizenship of John Graveley, the testator, I have here to remark that it is not designed, in the least, to put the defendants' counsel in any position which might be at variance with the facts; nor can he be so placed, as all legal positions are still left to be fully taken by exceptions to the judgment, and the facts of the case are derived almost entirely from record testimony, and that taken by commission.

Other matters are stated in the opinion of this court.

[For subsequent opinion, see 25 S. C. 1, 60 Am. Rep. 478.]

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for appellants.

October 25th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action brought to recover a legacy from Maria Torrens Graveley, executrix, bequeathed to the plaintiff by the will of John Graveley, deceased. The bequest is in the following words: "I give and bequeath two thousand dollars each to John Graveley and Francis Porcher Graveley, the sons of my nephew, Cowlam Graveley, to be held in trust for them by my executors, and paid them, with the accumulations of interest, as they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years."

The testator was a British subject, who, for many years, had resided in the city of Charleston, in this State, where he carried on the business of a merchant, and where he accumulated most, if not all, of the property

he left at the time of his death. About *the beginning of the late civil war between the States—the exact time does not appear—he went to Leamington, in England, where he died before the war ended, on March 31st, 1865, leaving a will which bears date June 27th, 1862, and of which Maria Torrens Graveley, his widow, was named executrix, and Cowlam Graveley, of Charleston, executor. The beginning of the will is in these words: "This is the last will and testament of me, John Graveley, late of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, but now of Leamington Priors, in the county of Warwick, England."

The will was admitted to probate at Birmingham, England, on May 27th, 1865, and letters testamentary granted to Maria Torrens Graveley, power being reserved of making the like grant to Cowlam Graveley, the other executor, who by formal deed, renounced and disclaimed the "office of trustee," and declined to accept the devises and bequests made to him by the will upon certain trusts thereby declared; but he has not renounced the "office of executor," either here or in England. On April 3d, 1872, Mrs. Graveley also qualified as executrix in this State. In the application for administration in England, the executrix stated that the value of the estate was under £9,000; and it appeared by the inventory and appraisement in 1872, when she qualified in South Carolina, that the property in this State amounted to the face value of $53,212, of which $19,000 was stated to be doubtful, showing, it would seem, that much the larger part of the estate was at that time in South Carolina.

On February 6th, 1873, according to the answer of the executrix, she invested for the plaintiff, in three per cent. consols of England, such a sum of English money as would, on March 31st, 1866, have purchased $2,000 of American currency, then greatly less valuable than gold, £327 11s. 5d., and added thereto £90 5s. 2d. for interest thereon from March 31st, 1866, to February 6th, 1873, being at the rate of four per cent. per annum. According to this statement of the executrix, the legacy of $2,000, "with accumulations of interest" from March 31st, 1866, to September, 1879, when the plaintiff became of age, a period of more than thirteen years, amounted to something less *than $2,500, which she offered to the plaintiff as his legacy. He declined to accept this result, and, after some correspondence, this action was commenced December 20th, 1879. The executrix being in England, an order of publication was made against her, and copies of summons and complaint served on her January 15th, 1880.

The defendant executrix answered to the merits, claiming, among other things that, as executrix, she had paid the legacy to herself as trustee; that she was no longer liable as executrix, and the plaintiff was bound to accept the results of the investment which she had made for him in England; stating in the last paragraph of her answer that "these defendants [her daughters, as legatees, had been impleaded with her,] deny the right of the plaintiff to institute suit in this court against them, or any of them."

The cause came on to be heard by Judge Hudson, who held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this jurisdiction against the executrix; and gave judgment for the amount of the legacy, $2,000, in American money, and interest thereon from one year after the testator's death, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, amounting to $4,198. From this decree the defendant executrix appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "That a foreign executrix who has administered the general estate of her testator in the jurisdiction in which her testator died, where his will was proved and registered, and where his executrix qualified and is accountable for such administration, cannot be sued in the jurisdiction of her ancillary administration generally, but can only be sued therein 'in respect of such assets' of her testator as may be held by her within such ancillary jurisdiction.

2. "That when such general executrix is resident beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of South Carolina, she cannot be made a party defendant to a suit in South Carolina by publication and service of summons at her home in a foreign country.

3. "That to make such non-resident executrix a party defendant to a suit in the jurisdiction of her ancillary administration in South Carolina, process against the assets of her testator, *which may be alleged to be held by the executrix in South Carolina, should be prayed.

4. "That an executrix holding ancillary administration cannot be held liable to a legatee upon a money demand only, in a suit, as upon contract, with no allegation of assent by the executrix to the legacy here, nor allegation of assets in her possession, nor charge of maladministration, nor of neglect in respect of such assets.

5. "That where, to a suit by a legatee generally demanding judgment of a specified sum of money as his legacy, the foreign executrix answers, objecting to the jurisdiction, and shows that she has administered the general estate of her testator in the original jurisdiction, where the will was admitted to probate, and where she is accountable for such administration; that out of the estate so administered abroad, she had, under the advice of learned counsel, laid aside and invested a fund in trust for the legatee, in pursuance of the terms of the will, and offers the legatee the results of that trust, so arising and so executed; and the plaintiff does not deny, but admits the facts, the complaint should be dismissed and the legatee be left to his remedy against the defendant for an account of her trust, or for a breach thereof.

6. "That an executrix is not liable to judgment for a sum of money claimed by a legatee, with damages, as for a wrongful detention, except upon allegation and proof of assent of the executrix to such legacy, from which assent a promise can be implied, and upon allegation and proof of the breach of such contract to pay, or upon allegation and proof of such wrongful detention.

7. "That for the proper exercise of the jurisdiction of the court against an executrix in a suit by a legatee, the allegations necessary to a suit for an account of such assets, and for enforcement of the trust involved, must be made, and the proper relief should be sought against the executrix in her character as trustee, and not as executrix.

8. "That a judgment against an executrix as for a devastavit cannot be rendered where no devastavit has been alleged or proven, and still less where the record shows that none has been committed.

*9. "That a legatee (unlike a creditor) is bound by the will of a testator who gives him the legacy, and if the will directs the executrix to raise a fund out of the general estate, and to invest such fund and hold it in trust for the legatee, the will binds the legatee to seek the enforcement or execution of such trust against the executrix as trustee.

10. "That if the legatee, as cestui que trust to the executor under the will, could ask the courts of South Carolina to enforce a trust against an English executrix, holding in England a trust fund arising out of an administration of an estate in England, or if such legatee could complain in the courts of South Carolina against such executrix, domiciled in England, such executrix-trustee could only be brought into court to answer for a breach of trust by process of attachment against her own property here.

11. "That in such case the judgment could only be against her own property, and would not go against the assets of her testator.

12. "That upon the complaint in this case, his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in admitting testimony going to show the existence of assets within the jurisdiction, for the introduction of which testimony, either as to the fact of the existence of such assets, or their character or amount, no foundation had been laid in the pleadings, and for which plaintiff was necessarily unprepared.

13. "That his Honor erred in admitting testimony on the question of domicil as affecting the character of the administration held by defendant as executor in South Carolina, which question had not been put in issue by the pleadings."

At the threshold it is objected that the court has no jurisdiction of the case. If so, that should be an end of it. In order to pronounce an effective judgment, it is necessary that the court should have jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and of the person, which are distinct, and one may exist without the other.

The first question is, whether the court has jurisdiction of the person of Maria Torrens Graveley, as executrix of the will of John Graveley, deceased. She is the qualified executrix of his will in this State as well as in England; but being personally absent in England, the usual publication against absent defendants was made against her, and she was then served with copies of the *summons and complaint, informing her of the nature of the action. She did not make objection to the service, that she was sued as executrix and beyond the limits of the State, but, through her counsel, appeared, and "in her own right, and as executrix of the last will and testament of John Graveley, deceased," answered fully the allegations of the complaint, stating in the last paragraph of her answer that "the defendants [including her daughters] deny the right of the plaintiff to institute suit in this court against them, or any of them."

For manifest reasons, it is the policy of the law that an executor should be a resident of the State, or at least always ready to discharge here the duties voluntarily assumed, and to account, if so required, at least in respect to the assets, which may be located in the State. If a continuous absence of ten months can be shown, "such failure shall be received as a formal renunciation of the office of executor." Gen. Stat., § 1892. It cannot be that an executor shall be allowed to hold his office under the law of the State, and yet disclaim all power on the part of the courts of the State to hold him to account as such executor. There can be no doubt, if the executrix had been here in person, that she could have been sued here—that is to say, brought into court as a party. The objection, then, must be as to the means—the process by which she was brought into court. It is not necessary to consider that subject; for it seems to us that, by answering to the merits, she properly submitted herself to the jurisdiction of the court, and the matter stands as if she accepted service or authorized her attorney to do so for her. State v. Sarratt, 14 Rich. 29; Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. 331 [9 L. Ed. 1093].

This last case was foreign attachment in the United States Court, and it being decided that the publication was void on the ground that the United States Court had no right to issue such a process, it was yet held, that the defendant having appeared and pleaded to the merits, the judgment was valid. In delivering the judgment, Judge Barbour said: "The next inquiry is, whether, the process of attachment having issued improperly, there has anything been done which has cured the error. And we think there is enough apparent on the record to produce that effect. It appears that the party appeared and pleaded to the *issue.

Now, if the case were one of a want of jurisdiction in the court, it would not, according to well-established principles, be competent for the parties, by any act of theirs, to give it. But that is not the case. The court has jurisdiction over the parties and the matter in dispute; the objection was that the party defendant, not being an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, nor found therein, personal process could not reach him; and that the process of attachment could only be properly issued against a party under circumstances which subjected him to process in personam. Now, this was a personal privilege or exemption which it was competent for the party to waive. * * * After appearance and plea the case stands as if the suit was brought in the usual manner." &c.

We do not, however, think that becoming a party, either by process or consent, deprived the executrix of the right to make any objection to the jurisdiction of the court as to the subject-matter, and we understand that to be the intent of her answer, denying "the right of the plaintiff to institute suit in this court against her," which was equivalent to a plea to the jurisdiction on the subject-matter in controversy, and so we shall consider it.

Considering the defendant as executrix in this State before the court, we do not lay much stress upon the objections of want of form in the complaint and prayer. The spirit of the code is in favor of amendments, and of having all cases, which have a status in court, tried and decided upon their merits. In most cases, where it can be done without surprise or injustice to the defendant, leave will be given to amend. We think the law upon the subject properly stated by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Remedies, § 580: "The prayer for relief is generally regarded as forming no part of the cause of action, and as having no effect, and as furnishing no test or criterion by which its nature may be determined. * * * The fact that, after the allegation of the facts relied upon, the plaintiff has demanded judgment for a sum of money by way of damages, does not preclude the recovery of the same amount upon the same state of facts by way of equitable relief." See Wait Ann. Code 325; Hammond v. N. E. R. R. Co., 6 S. C. 130 [24 Am. Rep. 467]; Childers v. Verner, 12 S. C. 1.

But considering the defendant as in court, and the cause of *action to be one for equitable relief, with proper prayers to charge the executrix, she still interposes what may be considered as a plea in bar to the jurisdiction of the court, viz., that as to the legacy claimed by the plaintiff, she is not liable as executrix, either in this court, or, indeed, in any other, in England or America, (for the objection goes to that extent,) for the reason that the legacy has already been paid by her as executrix to herself as trustee, and she can only now be made liable for the amount in her hands as such trustee, or, as stated for her at the bar, her conclusive answer to the plaintiff is, "that your legacy was not left to you, or to be paid to you, but it was left to the executor of your uncle, to be held by him or her in trust, to be invested, and with the accumulations of interest, to be so held until you should attain the age of twenty-one, when the investments or their proceeds were to be paid over to you by your trustee as the result of the trust. The legacy, as bequeathed, was paid by the executrix when she set apart, under the advice of counsel, a fund to be invested for you. The will placed your money in the hands of the executor without security, confiding in the honesty and fidelity of your trustee, and only by impeaching her action as your trustee, by specific allegations and proof of violation of duty, or breach of her trust, can you hope to recover money against her in this or any other court of equity."

We do not clearly see what difference it can make whether the defendant is held liable as executrix or as trustee, but as the point has been strongly pressed, and the ground of liability may have some bearing upon the right of the plaintiff to be paid out of assets as such, let us look a little into the matter. The clause of the will, under which this legacy is claimed, is as follows: "I give and bequeath two thousand dollars each to John Graveley and Francis Porcher Graveley, the sons of my nephew, Cowlam Graveley, to be held in trust for them by my executors, and paid them with the accumulations of interest as they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years." Do these words create two offices—that of trustee as separate and distinct from that of executor? It seems to us that the intention was only to impose a particular duty on the executors as such. It will be observed that the legacy is not given to the executor in trust for the *legatee, as in the case of Anderson v. Earle, 9 S. C. 461, where it was given "to my executors in trust for Henrietta and Eloise, to be invested in slaves for them, with ample power to sell and re-invest."

An executor is personally liable in "equity for all breaches of the ordinary trusts, which, in courts of equity, are considered to arise from his office. And it may here be observed, that when personal property is bequeathed to executors as trustees, the circumstance of taking probate of the will is, in itself, an acceptance of the particular trusts. Therefore, when the will contains express directions what to do, an executor who proves the will must do all which he is directed to do as executor, and he cannot say that, though executor, he is not clothed with any of these trusts." 3 Wms. Ex., p. 1894, and authorities in note (6 Am. Ed.).

But, even if there were two separate and distinct offices, would the alleged transfer by the executrix to herself as trustee be absolutely conclusive against the legatee, so that when he comes of age he would be bound to take, without challenge, what was offered to him and characterized as his legacy under his uncle's will, without any reference to the amount set apart, or to the currency, the interest, or the country in which it was invested? We cannot think so; that would be giving to the act of the executrix the force of a judgment, the effect of which would be to allow her, and not the testator, to fix the amount of the legacy and the manner of its payment. It may be that the purpose of the executrix was good, and that, in the operation of setting apart and investing a certain amount of English money, she had the assistance of an able solicitor and of counsel learned in the law, yet that was no more than her own act, the result of her own volition, ex parte, purely private, being neither "authoritative" nor "notorious," without the direction or sanction of any public authority, or having in it any of the elements of a matter res adjudicata. See Newcomb v. Williams, 9 Metc. 534, and other authorities in note to 3 Wms. Ex., supra.

Suppose that an executor, under like circumstances, should put down a legacy to himself, as trustee, at half its true amount, could it be claimed for an instant that such transfer would con*clude the legatee? In such case, surely, he could go behind the transfer and investment and have the true amount ascertained, and this proceeding would not be against the party as trustee to charge him; for that would be an admission that the right amount had been transferred; but, on the contrary, the proceeding would be against him as executor, for not properly executing the will and paying the legacy in pursuance thereof. That is precisely the character of the plaintiff's claim. He does impeach the propriety and legality of this alleged transfer and investment. He says, in substance, that he has not received the legacy given to him by his uncle's will, properly construed; that he gave him an American legacy ($2,000 in American money) which, of course, meant coin; but that the executrix, construing the will as giving an English legacy, payable in American paper currency, much less valuable than gold, which currency was not even in existence when the will was executed, now claims upon this basis to have transferred and invested his legacy in England, and at English interest.

We think the plaintiff has the right to have the fairness of that alleged transfer and investment inquired into by a proceeding in equity against the executrix as such in any court where the executrix is amenable to account, in this country or in England.

That brings us to the question, whether the defendant, as executrix, is amenable in the courts of South Carolina for the legacy of the plaintiff, an American citizen, who was born and has always lived here. She insists that she is not liable to account here, for the reason that her administration in South Carolina must be regarded only as ancillary to that in England, where the testator died, and that the estate, so far as legatees are concerned, must be, and, indeed, has already been settled there. The question is somewhat intricate, and the authorities not in accord. Its solution must, to a large extent, depend upon two facts: First. Where was the domicil of the testator at the time of his death? and, second, whether there were assets of the estate still remaining here at the time the action was brought. And we think that these points do not appear with sufficient clearness, *either in the pleadings or proof, to enable us now to decide the question satisfactorily.

In regard to the question of domicil, there is, in the pleadings, no reference whatever, and the only evidence which could be considered as bearing upon the subject was the circumstances, and what fell out incidentally in the progress of the case. It did not appear at what precise time, or under what circumstances, the testator left Charleston—whether he intended only a temporary or permanent absence, or whether he left undisposed of any tangible property there, except, as appeared from the will, his "wines, liquors and plate." The defendants complain, as no such issue was made, that they were taken by surprise, and did not offer their evidence on the subject. The Circuit judge adverted to the question; but he did not base his decree in whole or in part upon it. He says: "I do not find it incumbent on me to determine the question of domicil thus raised; for the case can now be decided on other issues. This I do not regret, as the defendants claim that the question is not presented in the pleadings, and that the raising of it at the hearing has, in some degree, operated as a surprise to them. I avoid, therefore, resting the decree on this issue. But were it necessary to decide it, I should hold that the question of domicil was properly raised, and that from all the facts before me, the domicil of the testator at the time of his death was in Charleston."

In regard to the other fact mentioned as important, the matter stands in this way: The complaint did not expressly charge that there were assets of the estate remaining in the State at the time the action was brought, but such charge was made in the reply. The code, section 189, provides, that "every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, as provided in section 170, and every material allegation of new matter in the answer constituting a counter-claim, not controverted by the reply as provided in section 174, shall, for the purpose of the action, be taken as true. But the allegation of new matter in the answer, not relating to a counter-claim, or of new matter in a reply, is to be deemed controverted by the adverse party as upon a direct denial or avoidance, as the case may require," &c. The answer of the defendants did not set up a counter*claim; but was in the nature of a plea in bar, and, therefore, we cannot say that the very important fact in question may be considered as proved by the pleadings.

There was no actual proof upon the subject, except the record of administration papers from the office of the judge of Probate, in which was an inventory of the South Carolina property, consisting of notes, choses, stocks, &c., filed in 1872. This action was brought in 1879, seven years after, and we are not informed whether anything, and, if so, what had been done with said bonds, stocks, &c., during that long interval of time. The judgment below without regard to the question of domicil, proceeded solely upon the view that there was property of the estate of the testator still within the State, when the action was brought in 1879, and that fact was presumed from proof of assets in 1872. Without now making any ruling upon the subject, we think the principle involved is too important for the decision to rest entirely upon such presumption of a jurisdictional fact, and that, before deciding the question, in case it should become necessary, it would be safer to have proper allegations, and positive proof.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside without prejudice; and the cause remanded with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to amend his complaint by making proper allegations, so as to make the question of the domicil of the testator at the time of his death, and as to the existence of assets, their character and amount of the estate of John Graveley, in the State of South Carolina, where the action was commenced.

TUTT v. PORT ROYAL AND AUGUSTA RAILWAY COMPANY.

(April Term, 1883.)

In a case at law, this court has the right to affirm a judgment of non-suit ordered by the court below, although basing their conclusion upon a ground other than that taken by the Circuit judge.

[3. Trusts ⇐147.]

*The trustee, under a trust deed, which gave to one C., for life, the possession and use of a tract of land, cannot, during C.'s life-time, recover from a railroad company a strip of land granted to it by C. for a road-bed until C.'s right of possession has been adjudged forfeited, which can only be done in a case to which he is a party.

Before Pressley, J., Aiken, February, 1883.

This was an action by C. G. Tutt, trustee of Helena H. M. Cook and Horatio R. Cook, and their children, against the Port Royal and Augusta Railway Company, for the recovery of the possession of a strip of land used by the defendant for a roadbed, and for $2,500 damages. The plaintiff claimed as substituted trustee under a deed of trust from John Miller to George W. Miller, in trust for the use and benefit of Helena H. M. Cook and Horatio R. Cook, her husband, for their joint lives, with remainder to the survivor, and then to their children, &c.; "and upon this further trust and condition that during the life of the said Horatio R., the said property, real and personal, shall remain in the possession and under the control and management of the said Horatio R., who shall be free from accountability for the annual rents, issues and profits thereof over and above the support of the family, provided he shall abstain from waste and destruction thereof."

The defendants claimed the strip of land in controversy (which is a portion of the land granted by the deed above mentioned) under a paper from Horatio R. Cook—in form a deed, but without seal—conveying it to their vendors for the use of a railroad track. Helena H. M. Cook and her husband, and three children are living. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for appellant.

October 25th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This is the second time this case has been before the court, and reference must be had to the former decision, as reported in 16 S. C. 365, for a history of the case.

*After that decision, the plaintiff amended his complaint by alleging that H. R. Cook was entitled to the possession of the land, of which the strip in controversy is a part, so long as he abstained from waste and destruction thereof, or so long as he maintained his wife and children from the proceeds of the plantation; that the said H. R. Cook permitted the Port Royal Railroad Company to take possession of the said strip of land, and waste and destroy the same, by reason whereof the said plantation has failed to yield a sufficient support for the wife and children of said H. R. Cook, and the defendant corporation, who claim under said Port Royal Railroad Company, is in possession of said strip of land, using it as a track for their railroad, and committing great damage to the same and the plantation adjoining. Wherefore the plaintiff demanded judgment for possession of the said strip of land and for damages.

At the trial below the plaintiff offered testimony tending to prove these allegations and closed. The defendant then moved for a non-suit, but upon what particular ground is not stated in the "Case." The non-suit was ordered, the Circuit judge stating his reasons as follows: "This action, originally based on the title of the plaintiff to the land held or used by the defendant, has, by leave of the Supreme Court, been changed into an action to enforce an alleged forfeiture of H. R. Cook's right to possess and control the said plantation during his life. Whatever may be the form of plaintiff's allegation, that is its substance, and he cannot recover, unless, under the rulings of the Supreme Court, H. R. Cook has done that which forfeits his right of possession. Admitting that there is sufficient testimony on that point to justify my sending the case to the jury; and, further, admitting that they would find that there had been waste or destruction by H. R. Cook, nevertheless, when the facts are not disputed on the question of the waiver of that forfeiture, it is my duty to decide whether they amount in law to a waiver. The proof is that the former trustee of this estate lived on the adjoining plantation; that he gave the defendants right of way through his own lands; that he knew when defendants were making their railroad through this plantation; that Mrs. Cook also knew it; that said trustee lived for several years after the road was made *there; that plaintiff, successor of the former trustee, after his death, permitted H. R. Cook to remain in possession and control of said plantation under the trust deed; that he is still in such possession, and that no procedure has ever been instituted against him to establish a forfeiture of his possession. In this state of the case, I hold that the parties interested in this action have clearly waived such forfeiture, if any, and they cannot recall said waiver."

The plaintiff appeals from this judgment of non-suit upon the following grounds: First. Because the Circuit judge erred in excluding certain testimony offered by the plaintiff for the purpose of showing "the decreased value of the plantation in question; also the decrease in the income; also its present condition as compared with its condition when the road first ran through; and in holding that the testimony must be limited to facts tending to show, either that H. R. Cook's license to the Port Royal Railroad Company was a reckless act, or that said act was voluntary waste." Second. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding "that if there had been a forfeiture on the part of H. R. Cook and those who claim under him, the plaintiff cannot enforce said forfeiture because it had been waived by the trustee, Miller, the predecessor of the plaintiff, and by Mrs. Cook, and because H. R. Cook has been permitted to remain in possession of the remainder of the place after said alleged forfeiture. Whereas, it is submitted that waiver is a question of fact, and should have been submitted to the jury; and, further, it is submitted that a trustee, such as Miller was, and Tutt is, without power to sell, could not waive a forfeiture prejudicial to the trust-estate, especially when such forfeiture was committed by strangers to the trust-estate who had notice of equities of the cestuis que trust."

The defendant also, according to the proper practice, gave notice that, if this court should be unable to sustain the judgment of non-suit upon the ground upon which it was based by the Circuit judge, defendant would ask that it be sustained upon sundry other grounds set out in the "Case," amongst which is the following: "Because forfeiture against the railroad company *cannot be enforced unless it be enforced against H. R. Cook also; and it cannot be enforced against him in this action, because he is not a party hereto."

We are entirely satisfied that the judgment of non-suit was properly granted; but we prefer to rest our conclusion upon a different ground from that taken by the Circuit judge. Our right to do this, in a case at law, seems to be questioned by the appellant in his argument; but we have no doubt at all upon the point. What we are called upon to review is the judgment—not the reasons which may have been given for such judgment. Hence, if, in our opinion, the judgment appealed from is right, we are bound to affirm it whether we concur in the reasons given for it or not.

It seems to us that the following points were settled by the former decision in this case: First. That H. R. Cook was entitled to possession of the plantation, of which the strip of land in controversy is a part, not under or by permission of the trustee, but under the terms of the deed of trust. Second. That, by virtue of this right of possession, Cook, while he could not convey the title of the land to the railroad company, could license them to use the right of way over it; and, having done so, no one could object to this easement thus conferred by Cook to the railroad company as long as Cook's rights to the possession of the plantation continued. Third. That Cook still retained his right, under the deed, to the possession of the entire plantation, including the strip of land in controversy, the defendant being only entitled to the right of way under the license from Cook. Fourth. That before appellant could interfere with this license to the company from Cook, it must be made to appear that Cook had forfeited his right to possession under the trust deed by a failure to comply with the conditions upon which his right to possession was assured.

The language of the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court at the former hearing, is as follows: "All the right which the defendant obtained was the right of way. The tract of land through which it ran was rightfully in the possession of Cook, and it is still in his possession, subject to this easement of appellant [the defendant]; and we do not see that the *respondent [the plaintiff] can legally claim the possession because Cook has consented to this easement. Before the appellant, as trustee, could interpose, Cook's acts should amount to a forfeiture, either because he had diminished the capacity of the land to afford his wife and children support and maintenance out of the rents and profits, or because he had committed waste or destruction."

It follows from this that the plaintiff has no right of action to recover the possession of any part of the lands until Cook's right of possession, which he holds under the deed of trust, has been adjudged forfeited; and, certainly, this can only be done in a case to which Cook is a party. For even if it should be established beyond controversy, in this case, that the acts done and permitted by Cook would work a forfeiture of his right of possession, this would not be binding upon Cook, he not being a party, and he would still retain his right of possession; and, if so, certainly the plaintiff would not be entitled to judgment for the possession. It is clear, therefore, that upon this ground, if no other, the non-suit was properly ordered.

The other question raised by this appeal, as to the rejection of the testimony referred to in plaintiff's first ground of appeal, becomes wholly unimportant in this view of the case. Indeed, this, as well as most of the other questions presented in the argument, cannot now be properly considered, inasmuch as in our judgment the proper parties for their adjudication are not now before the court. Cook, whose right of possession is assailed, has, undoubtedly, the right to be heard on these questions; and it would be not only premature but unjust to discuss or decide them now. Whether Cook can be made a party to this case jointly with the defendant, or whether a separate action should not first be brought against him for the purpose of having his right of possession under the deed adjudged forfeited, and whether to such action all the beneficiaries under the deed should not be made parties, are all questions which it would be premature to discuss or decide in this case.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*YOUNG v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

[1. Municipal Corporations ⇐755.]

One injured in his person and property by a decay in a drain, which had been constructed across one of its streets by a municipal corporation charged by its charter with the duty of keeping its streets in proper repair, has no right of action for damages against such corporation, there being no statute authorizing it.

There is no distinction in this respect between municipal corporations and such other public bodies, or quasi-corporations, as are charged with like duties; there is no liability to civil action unless imposed by statute.

[This case is also cited in Matheny v. Aiken, 68 S. C. 181, 47 S. E. 56, without specific application.]

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, February, 1880.

This was an action by Henry E. Young against the city council of Charleston, to recover damages for injuries sustained in his person and property, caused by a defect in a drain across one of the streets of the city of Charleston. Plaintiff was riding his horse on Sunday afternoon along a street or highway in the upper portion of the city, when the horse was thrown down, and horse and rider were both severely injured. The horse's fall was caused by a hidden hole in a trunk or drain, which had been put there some years before by the city council, and had decayed. The case is otherwise stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. A. M. Smith and B. H. Rutledge, for appellant.

A municipal corporation is responsible for an injury to an individual for non-feasance or failure to keep the streets in repair. Quasi-corporations generally are not liable. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., §§ 996–1000; 2 T. R. 667; 91 U. S. 552. Municipal corporation liable at common law. 2 Dill. §§ 980, 983; 91 U. S. 552; 4 Law Rep. (App. Cas.) 263 (33 Moak R. 173). There is nothing decided in the South Carolina cases to the contrary; but obiter dicta may be found in 2 Hill 571; 2 Nott & McC. 537; 12 Rich. 82; 14 S. C. 290. Obiter is not controlling. 102 U. S. 307; 15 S. C. 372. See Dill. Mun. Corp., § 957, note 1. Fowle v. Alexandria has been virtually overruled in 91 U. S. 552. It was the duty of the city to keep their streets in repair. 2 Bay *65. But the city is at least liable for an injury caused by the direct act of the agents of the corporation in making the street unsafe—for misfeasance. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1024; 122 Mass. 358.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, occasioned, as was alleged, by a defect in one of the streets of the city of Charleston. The defense was—First. That, in the absence of a statute making a municipal corporation liable to an action for damages so occasioned, such an action could not be maintained. Second. That the place where the damages were sustained was not one of the streets of the city which it was required to keep in repair. Third. That the plaintiff, being engaged at the time the injury was sustained in a violation of law, by taking a pleasure ride on Sunday, could not maintain the action.

The issues of law and fact were referred to a referee, who found all the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and fixed the damages at $990. To this report exceptions were filed, which need not be specifically stated here; and the Circuit judge, who heard the case upon the report and exceptions, not being satisfied with the sufficiency of the evidence as to the question, whether the place where the injury was sustained was such a public street as the defendant was bound to keep in repair, recommitted the report to the referee "for such further testimony as plaintiff may offer on said question."

From this order both parties have appealed; but as we think the whole will be concluded by the proper solution of the question raised by the defendants' first ground of defense, it is unnecessary to state the various exceptions of the parties. That question is, whether a municipal corporation, charged by its charter with the duty of keeping in proper repair the streets or public highways within the corporate limits, is liable to a civil action for damages at the suit of an individual who has sustained *an injury, either in person or property, by reason of a failure on the part of the corporation to perform such duty in the absence of a statute imposing such liability. This question has been the subject of no little conflict of discussion in the courts of this country; but we think it has been settled in this State adversely to the claim of the plaintiff. As far back as 1820, it was decided in the case of Young v. Commissioners, 2 Nott & McC. 537, that the board of commissioners of roads was not liable to such an action; and the authority of that case was subsequently recognized in White v. City Council, 2 Hill 575, decided in 1835, and again in McKenzie v. Chovin, 1 McMull. 222, decided in 1841. The same principle was recognized and reaffirmed in Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 291, and in Black v. City of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412 [45 Am. Rep. 785].

The true theory upon which these cases rest is that a municipal corporation is a mere governmental agency established for public purposes, and stands upon a very different footing from that of private corporations organized for private gain, or for the special benefit of the corporators. As characterized by Marshall, C. J., in Fowle v. Alexandria, 3 Pet. 398 [7 L. Ed. 719], it is "a legislative corporation, established as part of the government of the country;" and by Chancellor Harper, in White v. City Council, supra, as "the agent of the legislature for the purposes of government." This distinction is fully recognized in Main v. Railroad Co., 12 Rich. 82 [75 Am. Dec. 725]. A municipal corporation, thus being a part of the government of the State, is not liable to a civil action by an individual for any damages which he may sustain by reason of its failure to perform any of the public duties imposed upon it, unless the legislature sees fit to provide by statute for such right of action; and as it is conceded that there is no statute giving any such right of action in this case, we do not think that the action can be maintained. Although we are satisfied that the law is thus firmly settled by the authorities in this State, yet, in deference to the earnest and able argument submitted in behalf of the plaintiff, we have been induced to examine the question in the light of the authorities elsewhere.

First, it is contended that the rule in this State rests ultimately upon the case of Young v. Commissioners, supra, in which the *question was as to the liability of a board of commissioners of roads, which was at most only a quasi-corporation, and that the rule is different as to a municipal corporation proper. It is not to be denied that such a distinction has been recognized and established by many cases in other States. See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., ch. XXIII., where the authorities are fully stated; but, as is said in section 785 of that valuable work, it is difficult to see the ground for such distinction; and we find it not only difficult, but absolutely impossible to perceive any good reason why a person who sustains an injury by reason of a defect in a highway just beyond the corporate limits of a city or town has no right of action against the public authorities charged with the duty of keeping such highway in repair, while such person would have a right of action if the injury he sustained had been received within the corporate limits of such city or town.

The duty of establishing and keeping in repair the public highways, whether within or without the corporate limits of a city or town, is a public duty, and whether such duty is imposed upon one set of public officers or another cannot make any difference in this respect. The character of the duty imposed in both cases is the same, the result to the injured party, of a failure to perform such duty, is the same, and we are unable to see why the liability should not be the same. The public, generally, as well as the individuals composing the public, have the same, and perhaps a greater interest in having the public highways outside as well as those within the limits of incorporated cities or towns kept in good repair; for if an injury should be sustained in a remote or unfrequented part of the public highway, the consequence might be much more serious than if the same injury were sustained within the corporate limits of a city or town where relief could readily be obtained. It will not do to say, as was intimated by Earle, J., in McKenzie v. Chovin, supra, that this distinction rests upon the fact that a municipal corporation has a corporate fund while these quasi-corporations, like boards of commissioners of roads, had no such fund: for such was not the fact. These boards had the same if not greater powers of taxation that municipal corporations usually have, besides other sources of revenue arising from licenses and fines *for the violations of the law in reference to retailing spirituous liquors. And, as Judge Dillon says, in sections 761, 762 and 785, the distinction is recognized even where these quasi-corporations are invested with the taxing power.

Inasmuch, therefore, as we are unable to discover any good reason for this distinction between the liability of these quasi-corporations and that of municipal corporations proper, and as no such distinction has ever been recognized in this State, we are unwilling now to recognize it, notwithstanding the fact that it is well established in many of the States, though, in at least two, the doctrine has been pushed to its logical conclusion, and quasi-corporations, as well as municipal corporations proper, have been held liable to such an action.

The cases principally relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiff are Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540 [23 L. Ed. 440], and Bathurst v. McPherson, 4 Law Rep. (App. Cas.) 256 (33 Moak Eng. Rep. 173,) decided by the judicial committee of the privy council. In the former the decision was by a divided court—a bare majority; and it is quite manifest, from an examination of the case, that the question now under consideration was not so fully considered as its importance demands. The question which seems to have engrossed the minds of the court was whether the municipal corporation could be made liable for the negligence of the board of public works, inasmuch as the members of that board were appointed by the president of the United States and not by the municipal corporation; and the opinion is mainly devoted to the discussion of the question, whether the fact that these officers received their appointment from the president, and not from the municipal corporation, would relieve the corporation from liability; and from the conclusion reached upon this question, two of the justices dissented, while two others dissented generally. The point which we now have under consideration was dismissed with the single remark that the authorities establishing the doctrine that a municipal corporation is liable to a civil action for its mere negligence "are so numerous and so well considered that the law must be deemed to be settled in accordance with them," followed by a long list of cases, many of which do not at all sustain the doctrine for *which they are cited, as is most fully and clearly shown in the elaborate opinion of Gray, C. J., in the case of Hill v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 344 (23 Am. Rep. 332), where he comments at length upon the case of Barnes v. District of Columbia, and the cases cited to sustain it.

But more than this; although the learned justice who delivered the opinion in Barnes v. District of Columbia expressly recognizes the distinction hereinbefore mentioned between the liability of quasi-corporations and municipal corporations proper, as so well established that it cannot be disturbed, which distinction, however, he seems to think is not founded upon any sound principle, yet among the cases cited by him to establish the liability of a municipal corporation, are several from those States where the doctrine has been carried to its logical conclusion, and no distinction between the liability of municipal corporations proper and quasi-corporations is recognized.

In Bathurst v. McPherson, the court seems to rest its decision mainly upon the ground that the defect in the highway which caused the injury complained of in that case, was the result of an act of the corporation, and declined to decide the general question whether the corporation was bound to keep all the roads in the municipality in good repair, and therefore liable for an injury sustained by reason of any defect in such roads. It is true, that in this respect the case we are considering is like the case of Bathurst v. McPherson, for here as well as there the corporation had originally constructed the drain which caused the injury complained of, by being allowed to get out of repair. But we have not been able to find any other case in which such a distinction has been adverted to, and we see no reason why a corporation should be any more liable for an injury caused by a defect in a street at a point where the corporation had previously constructed a drain, than it would be for an injury sustained by a defect at any other point on such street.

It is true that there are cases in which a distinction is drawn between cases of misfeasance and non-feasance—a distinction, however, which is repudiated in Bathurst v. McPherson—in which it has been held that while a corporation might not be liable for mere non-feasance, in neglecting to perform its duty *in keeping streets in repair, yet it would be liable for positive misfeasance, as for placing an obstruction in the street or cutting a ditch across it and leaving it open, by reason of which an individual sustains an injury. But the same obligation rests upon the corporation to keep every part of its streets in repair, as to keep a drain or bridge previously constructed by it in proper repair; and whether an injury is sustained at one point or the other cannot possibly, upon any sound principle, make any difference as to the rule of liability.

But again, this case of Bathurst v. McPherson seems also to be based upon this idea, that because a corporation is liable to an indictment for not keeping its streets or highways in repair, it is therefore liable to a civil action for damages at the suit of an individual who has sustained an injury by reason of a defect in one of its streets. This doctrine certainly cannot be sustained in this country, as it would entirely overthrow what is conceded to be the well-settled rule here as to the distinction between the liability of a quasi-corporation and that of a municipal corporation proper; and we know of no case in this country where it has been recognized. But even granting to the case of Bathurst v. McPherson all that has been claimed for it, as establishing a doctrine contrary to that which we have adopted, we cannot regard it as sufficient to warrant us in overthrowing the well-settled rule in this State, sustained, as we believe it to be, by reason as well as by high authority.

Our view is fully sustained by decisions in Massachusetts and Michigan, two amongst the ablest courts in the Union. Hill v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 344 (23 Am. Rep. 332), recognized and affirmed in French v. City of Boston, 129 Mass. 592 (37 Am. Rep. 393); Detroit v. Blackeby, 21 Mich. 84 (4 Am. Rep. 450), recognized and affirmed in McCutcheon v. Homer, 43 Mich. 483 (38 Am. Rep. 212). In these two cases of Detroit v. Blackeby and Hill v. City of Boston, the question is so fully and ably discussed, and the authorities, both English and American, are so fully and satisfactorily reviewed that it would be a work of supererogation to attempt to add anything to what is there so well said.

tion in this State, *that the view which we have adopted has apparently been assumed by the legislature to be the correct one and acted upon as such. Soon after the adoption of the present constitution, the legislature passed an act constituting each county in the State a body politic and corporate, (act of 1868, 14 Stat. 134,) and yet they deemed it necessary to provide specially by statute that any person sustaining an injury by reason of a defect or want of repair in a highway should have an action for damages against the county, (act of 1871, 14 Stat. 669,) and this special remedy by statute has been retained in all the subsequent legislation upon the subject. Now it must be assumed that the legislature was aware of the law as settled in this State, that the board of commissioners of roads, the officials previously charged with the duty of keeping the public highways in repair, were not liable to a civil action for damages sustained by an individual by reason of the neglect of this duty, and if they had supposed that the several counties in this State, who, through their agents, the county commissioners, are now charged with this duty, would become liable to such an action by reason of the fact that they had been erected into corporations proper, there would have been no necessity for passing an act providing specially for such liability.

Under the views herein presented it is clear that the action cannot, under any state of the facts, be maintained, and the other questions presented cannot arise.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed and that the complaint be dismissed.

20 S. C. 123

MILLER v. NEWELL.

[1. Specific Performance ⇐76.]

The Court of Equity could not decree specific performance of an agreement between the plaintiff in a slander case and his attorneys, that he would pay to them a part of his recovery out of the verdict when obtained, or a portion of the verdict itself.

If, in such case, the verdict, when obtained, was satisfied through collusion between plaintiff and defendant to the injury of plaintiff's attorneys, the court would not order the satisfaction to be vacated, as specific performance of such agreement between plaintiff and his attorneys could not be decreed.

*A proceeding by rule, on the motion of plaintiff's attorneys, to require the defendant in such slander case to show cause why a satisfaction of the verdict should not be vacated, is in the nature of a bill for specific performance and cannot be entertained.

The attorneys, as creditors of the plaintiff, could not proceed against the defendant for an alleged fraud in the satisfaction, until they had exhausted their legal remedies against their debtor.

[5. Assignments ⟸24.]

A chose in action arising out of tort strictly personal, as slander, is not assignable. After verdict in slander, but before judgment entered thereon and while appeal is pending, the claim for damages continues to be a chose in action.

[6. Assignments ⟸34.]

An assignment may be made by parol, but doubted whether the mere declaration "I do assign," in the absence of the subject-matter, constitutes an assignment.

The facts and circumstances of this case did not give defendant knowledge of the plaintiff's intended fraud upon his attorneys, nor were they sufficient notice to put defendant upon the inquiry. The findings of fact by the Circuit judge on the return to the rule, not concurred in. McGowan, A. J., dissenting.

[When circumstances are offset by the positive testimony of a witness, which, in the opinion of the appellate court, outweighs such circumstances, and renders the appellate court unable to concur with the finding of the circuit judge, his judgment will be reversed.]

Before Cothran, J., Anderson, October, 1882.

The order of the Circuit judge, discharging the rule in this case, was as follows:

This is proceeding by rule upon the defendant to show cause why the entry of satisfaction on the sheriff's book of a certain execution in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, for the sum of $2,000, should not be held to be satisfaction only pro tanto—that is to say, to the extent of $1,000, the sum actually paid, besides costs; and the sheriff required to enforce the execution for the balance thereof against the defendant for and on behalf of the plaintiff's attorneys in said cause. The respondent (defendant) made return to the rule, and upon this and certain affidavits in support of it, and upon affidavits submitted in behalf of the actors, the cause came on to be heard by the court at the Fall Term, 1882, for Anderson county.

The following brief history is deemed necessary for a proper understanding of the questions involved: The main cause, which was an action for slander, was tried at the October Term, 1881, of the court, and resulted in a verdict of $2,000 for the plaintiff. The defendant's counsel moved upon the minutes of the presiding judge for a new trial, which was argued and refused *during that term of the court, to which refusal the defendant, by his counsel, excepted. Within ten days the defendant's counsel served upon the plaintiff's counsel their notice and grounds of appeal, addressed only to the plaintiff's counsel—no copy of which was served upon the presiding judge within thirty days from the service of that notice, to wit, on November 22d. By means of the intervention and efforts of "mutual friends," and with the aid of the senior counsel of the defendant, who prepared the papers, but who had no further participation in the matter or knowledge of the negotiations, the defendant and the plaintiff effected a settlement of the controversy between them by the former paying to the latter the sum of $1,000, in full discharge and satisfaction of the said verdict. It was agreed at the time, and by all the parties to this settlement, and by those who were present, excepting J. B. Watson, who did not so understand it, as he says, that this settlement was to be kept secret from that day, Tuesday, November 22d, until Saturday, November 26th. On the day last mentioned, the defendant's counsel served upon the plaintiff's counsel a written notice, stating that the matter in controversy between plaintiff and defendant had been adjusted and settled by them; that no judgment or execution should be entered upon said verdict, or any portion of it, and that the whole case should be discontinued.

On November 30th the counsel for the plaintiff procured an order from the clerk of the Supreme Court dismissing the appeal in the cause, for failure on the part of the appellant to serve the presiding judge with notice of the appeal and grounds, and for failure to file the return with the clerk of the Supreme Court within the time required by law. On December 2d, judgment was entered up by plaintiff's counsel upon the verdict and execution lodged with the sheriff; and on January 9th following, the defendant, by advice of his counsel, paid to the sheriff the taxed costs of the case, and produced the plaintiff's receipt, purporting to be in full satisfaction of his entire claim, which was duly entered on the execution, or upon the execution book of the sheriff. In the meantime—that is to say, between November 22d and 26th, 1881, the plaintiff Miller fled from the State, and has not since returned. At the next term of the court the actors *herein applied for and obtained the rule which, with the return thereto and the various affidavits in the cause, are now under consideration.

The issues involved are both difficult and delicate, but they may be justly determined by answering correctly the three following questions: 1. Was there any appeal pending in the cause on November 22d, 1881? 2. Was there such an assignment by the plaintiff to Orr, Wells & Allen of one-half of the recovery of $2,000; or such an agreement to pay them that sum out of the recovery, as to give them an enforceable lien for the same? 3. Was there such actual notice given to the defendant of this assignment or agreement; or did he have such knowledge of facts concerning it as should have put a reasonable man upon inquiry, whereby, in disregarding the one or failing to follow up the other, he has become legally liable for actively or negligently causing the actors here to lose their debt?

First—as to the appeal pending. After some possible contrariety of decision in the batch of cases reported in 12 S. C. R., beginning with Rogers & Nash, p. 559, and Sullivan & Speights, p. 561, and Lake & Moore, p. 563, with the case of Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C. 491, the true rule seems to be adducible from the case last cited, and is, that the first section of the act of 1878, 16 Stat. 698, was only meant to cover the case where no exceptions were taken at the time. If they were so taken, then service of copy of exceptions under the act was unnecessary. Did the defendant at the time except to the rulings of the presiding judge? To make objections sufficient to sustain an appeal, it is not necessary that the word exceptions should be used; the better practice undoubtedly is, to give the court information at the time the party excepts, and have it noted on the record, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it; but it has been held that when it appears from the record that the judge was apprised of the intention to rely on the propositions advanced by way of exception, that is sufficient to constitute an exception, though there is no formal request to note an exception. Many cases cited. Continuing, the court says: "Here the propositions by way of exception were positive and unmistakable.

* * * We think it appears from the *record that the judge was apprised of the intention to rely on the propositions advanced by way of exception, and that is sufficient to constitute an exception, although there was no formal request to note an exception." The motion to dismiss the appeal was refused.

Here no exception by the defendant's counsel appears upon the record nor upon the calendar, where the notice of motion on the minutes is entered; but it is admitted that the motion was made, that it was refused, and that the defendant's counsel excepted. The grounds of exception, as afterward served upon plaintiff's counsel, but not upon the presiding judge, are, in substance, as follows: 1. For excessive damages. 2. For admitting incompetent testimony. 3. For excluding explanatory testimony. 4. For a variance between the allegata and probata. 5. For refusing to grant a non-suit. True, it does not satisfactorily appear that these propositions were "advanced by way of exception," at the time the motion was made and refused. It is more probable that they were enlarged when afterwards formulated and served upon the plaintiff's attorneys within ten days after the refusal of the motion.

The question, however, as to the appeal pending in the cause is in my opinion, incidental and collateral, and only material to the inquiry here, as furnishing reasonable inducement to the alleged compromise. Its only value is in aid of motive, and the belief of the fact by the defendant's counsel, as shown by his affidavit, and the deposition of J. C. Milford, that pending the negotiations the defendant, Newell, said he would not give $1,400 to compromise—"that he would take the case to the Supreme Court first,"—satisfy me that both counsel and client believed that the appeal was pending, and whether it was technically so in fact or not was not material.

Second. As to the assignment and lien, and first as to the lien. An attorney's lien, as now generally recognized, is of two kinds: The one a general lien upon the papers in his hands belonging to his client, which is a mere right to retain until his bill is paid; all deeds, vouchers, &c., upon which, or in connection with which, he has rendered professional services, or made disbursements in the cause. It confers no active right; it is passive, *enabling the attorney to hold for whatever may be due to him, and although dismissed from the cause, if without fault on his part, he may retain the papers in his possession until his professional services and disbursements are paid and refunded. In re Paschal, 10 Wall. 483 [19 L. Ed. 992]; Ex parte Nesbit, 2 Sch. & Lef. 279; Ex parte

The other kind of lien is that which an attorney has upon a judgment recorded or money payable thereon, or upon a fund in court. This is not merely passive, but authorizes the taking of active steps. It did not exist at common law. In 1 Douglass 104, it is said by Lord Mansfield not to be very ancient. It is founded upon the first rule of ex æquo et bono, and is invoked by the courts for the protection of attorneys, as its own officers, by taking care that a "party should not run away with the fruits of the cause, without satisfying the legal demands of the attorney by whose industry and, in many cases, by whose expense those fruits are obtained." Read v. Dupper, 6 T. R. 361. It is true that Lord Kenyon in this case makes the validity of the payment depend upon the bona fides with which it was made—that is to say, upon the absence of notice or knowledge on the defendant's part of the claim of the plaintiff's attorney; and this, I take it, is the main inquiry in this case, which will be considered hereafter.

This lien, from its very nature, is equitable, and not legal. It is bottomed upon the equitable consideration that by the attorney's skill and labor the judgment has been recovered, which being within the control of the court, and the parties to it within its jurisdiction, the court will see that no injustice is done to its own officers. The very recent New York decisions sustain this doctrine to its utmost limits, under the provisions of the new code (1879), which have extended this lien to any deserved or agreed compensation, to be recovered upon a quantum meruit, or by enforcing the express agreement. I do not understand by the provisions of our code that such lien extends beyond the taxable costs and disbursements, and the rule laid down in Scharlock v. Oland, 1 Rich. 207, is still the law in this State.

Was there a contract of assignment between the plaintiff, *Miller, and his attorneys of one-half the damages recovered by the verdict, or a mere agreement by which they should have from him one-half of the same upon its recovery? Whichever it was, it rests altogether in parol, and, in the view which I take of the case, it is not as vital a question as counsel seemed to regard it in the argument. If it was an assignment by the plaintiff, without the knowledge of the fact by the defendant, or of such facts in relation to it as should have put him upon inquiry, and he, in good faith, satisfied the plaintiff's demand, he would be entitled to the protection of the court, except as to the matter of costs and disbursements.

If it was an agreement by which the plaintiff was to pay his attorneys one-half of the verdict, and the defendant had no knowledge of such agreement, or of such facts in relation to it as should have put him upon inquiry, and he, in good faith, satisfied the plaintiff's demand, he would in like manner be entitled to the protection of the court except as to the matter of costs and disbursements. But under the principle laid down in the case of Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. 324, if the payment was made to the plaintiff, with knowledge either of the assignment or agreement, and the defendant thereby intentionally enabled the plaintiff to defeat the claim of his attorneys, such payment cannot be sanctioned by the court beyond the number of dollars actually paid, and as an attempt to satisfy the whole demand it is vain and futile. The law upholds assignments of and agreements in relation to personal property by parol. Bulkley v. Howell, 1 Nott. & McC., 249; Briggs v. Dorr, 19 Johns. 95.

The proof, however, satisfies me that this was an assignment. The deposition of John E. Allen, an honorable counselor, is distinct and positive upon this point. He says (paragraph IV. of his affidavit), "that said plaintiff, after the said notice of appeal, assigned by parol one-half of said verdict to his said attorneys for their compensation in said trial," &c. He was one of the active parties to the contract of assignment—the other party to it, Miller, has run away with the fruits of the cause; and although others have alluded in their depositions to this matter as an agreement, repeating the alleged declarations of the *plaintiff, Miller, I am constrained to hold that there was an assignment of one-half of the verdict, and not a mere agreement to pay that sum.

I have now to consider the last and most important inquiry in the case: Did the defendant have knowledge of the assigned claim of these parties, or knowledge of such facts in relation to it as should have put them upon inquiry? After a careful review of the testimony, and the circumstances of this transaction, I am constrained to hold, in the language of Mr. Justice Bradley in In re Paschal, 10 Wall. 495 [19 L. Ed. 992], "that the defendant could not safely settle with the plaintiff, without paying" this claim. I am much impressed by the nature of this transaction, and the circumstances attending it—the long and bitter controversy between the parties, their hostile attitude towards each other, the protracted negotiations by "mutual friends," chief amongst whom was J. C. Milford, evidently more the friend of the defendant than of the plaintiff; his reluctant appearance before the master, being brought up by subpœna; his gingerly deposition; the proof by Walters that defendant asked him to see the plaintiff, and ascertain if the matter could be compromised and settled, that he wanted Miller to get the benefit of what was paid in the compromise; could arrange it without going to town, &c. What possible benefit was contemplated here, save to the prejudice or injury of another? Why give the benefit of what was paid to Miller? They were more than at arms-length; they were not in speaking distance of each other; they were enemies. The strange coincidence, too, of paying to Miller exactly the amount that he was entitled to under the assignment; and, more than all, the four days of secrecy imposed—secrecy so significant of the end accomplished, so readily acquiesced in, and so faithfully observed. Secrecy, from the time of Lord Coke, who denounced it as 'a mark of fraud,' down to the present day, is that detestable thing which courts of justice despise. Secrecy is a badge of fraud, because it tends to deceive creditors, and is not in the course in which honest men ordinarily transact business. Dona clandestina sunt suspiciosa. The secrecy which constitutes a badge of fraud, is not a mere want of notoriety, but a concealment, or an attempted concealment." Big. Fraud 81.

*From these considerations, I hold that this transaction was fraudulent, and my conclusion may be well stated in the words of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in the justly celebrated case of Lowry v. Pinson, supra: "There is perhaps no principle of more universal application than that fraud avoids all contracts between parties themselves if one imposes on the other, and between them and third parties where they conspire to defraud others. And cases might arise where they could as readily be effected, where a full and fair price is paid. One rich in lands, houses, or other permanent property, resolves not to pay his debts, and another, knowing this, treats with him, and purchases his whole estate at a fair and full price, and thus enables him to fly from the claims of his creditors. Now, although the purchaser has gained no advantage, he has enabled the debtor to evade the payment of his debts, and the effect upon the creditor is precisely the same as if nothing had been paid." The case at bar is stronger, for the defendant, Newell, would gain an advantage in being discharged from the payment of one-half of the verdict against him, and has enabled the plaintiff, Miller, to fly from the just claim of his creditors.

The conclusion thus attained, might find just and valuable support in considering the relation between the defendant and J. C. Milford, the mutual friend or agent, through whose active intervention, at the request of the defendant, those negotiations were carried on and consummated. Milford deposes that Miller said to him (in the very midst of the negotiations), that "he had agreed to give his attorneys a certain per cent. of the amount recovered, and if it was known that he was going to make a compromise, his lawyers would not let him make the compromise." "It is not essential that notice be given to the party himself, but notice to his counsel, solicitor or agent is sufficient, whether given in the same or in another transaction, provided there be adequate reasons to conclude that the facts continued in remembrance." Ad. Eq. 157. Can it be conceived that this matter, which was the very gist of the settlement, and the direct cause of, and reason for, the imposition of the desire of secrecy, should not have continued in "the remembrance of the *agent," even if they were not in fact communicated to the principal. I hold not.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed: First. That the rule herein be and the same is hereby made absolute. Second. That the alleged satisfaction or receipt given by W. B. Miller, the plaintiff, to Newton J. Newell, the defendant, and entered in the sheriff's book as satisfaction of said judgment and execution be and the same is hereby held to be satisfaction only pro tanto; and that the sheriff for Anderson county do enforce the said execution against the said defendant for the balance due thereon, according to the force, form and effect of said judgment and execution for, and in behalf of, the plaintiff's attorneys in the said cause, who are the actors in this proceeding.

From this judgment, the defendant appealed.

Messrs. Murray & Murray, for appellant.

October 25th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, Miller, brought action against the defendant, Newell, for slander, and recovered a verdict for $2,000. The defendant moved upon the minutes of the court for a new trial, which being refused, defendant excepted, and, within ten days after the rising of the court, served upon plaintiff's counsel notice of his intention to appeal, also his grounds of appeal. No copy of this notice and grounds of appeal was served on the presiding judge.

The verdict was obtained at the October Term of the court at Anderson in 1881. A short time after the notice of appeal had been served, to wit, on November 22d, 1881, the parties, plaintiff and defendant, at the instance of and through mutual friends, as it is said, effected a settlement of the controversy between them by the defendant paying to plaintiff $1,000 in full discharge and satisfaction of the verdict, which sum being paid, a receipt and discharge under seal was executed by the plaintiff, in which it *was stated to be in full of all claim against the defendant, except defendant's costs; and further, that no judgment or execution upon the verdict for $2,000, or any part thereof, should be entered.

On November 26th, notice of this settlement was served by defendant's counsel upon the plaintiff's counsel. On November 30th, which was after the settlement, plaintiff's counsel procured an order from the clerk of the Supreme dismissing the appeal for failure on the part of the appellant to serve the judge with the notice and grounds of appeal within the required time. On December 2d, 1881, plaintiff's counsel entered judgment upon the verdict and lodged execution with the sheriff. Within a few days thereafter the defendant paid the tax costs of the case, and produced plaintiff's receipt in full of the verdict, which receipt was duly entered on the execution. In the meantime the plaintiff had fled the State, as is stated, and has not since returned.

At the next term of the court the plaintiff's attorneys upon affidavits applied for a rule against the defendant to show cause why the entry of satisfaction, which had been made on the execution by virtue of plaintiff's receipt and discharge, should not be held as satisfaction only to the extent of the amount paid, to wit, $1,000 and the costs, and the sheriff be required to enforce the execution for the balance thereof. This rule was applied for on the ground, as appeared in the affidavit of one of plaintiff's counsel, that said plaintiff, when he employed his counsel, in addition to a retaining fee promised as further compensation to assign one-half of the recovery in the case to them, and that after the verdict and notice of appeal the plaintiff had, by parol, assigned one-half of said verdict to said attorneys for past services in said case, and also for additional services to be rendered in the appeal; that these facts were known to the defendant, or at least that he had sufficient information to put him on the inquiry, yet, notwithstanding this, that he procured his attorney, J. S. Murray, Esq., to draw up the agreement and discharge, and had it consummated in fraud of the rights of said attorneys.

In answer to the rule, the defendant, Newell, denied unqualifiedly the charges upon which the rule had been issued—denied all knowledge of the alleged agreement as to the fees of plaint*iff's counsel or the assignment of the verdict, and repudiated the charge that it was his purpose in making the settlement to defraud said counsel. On the contrary, that knowing no one in the transaction but the plaintiff, he made the settlement because he had the right to do so, as he thought, and because he believed it was the best thing for him under the circumstances.

The rule and answer with the affidavits for and against were heard by Judge Cothran, at the October Term, 1882, who, regarding the following to be the issues involved, discussed and passed judgment thereon: "1. Was there any appeal pending in the cause on November 22d, 1881? 2. Was there such an assignment by the plaintiff to Orr, Wells & Allen of one-half of the recovery of $2,000; or such an agreement to pay that sum out of the recovery as to give them an enforceable lien for the same? 3. Was there such actual notice given to the defendant of this assignment or agreement; or did he have such knowledge of facts concerning it as should have put a reasonable man upon inquiry, whereby, in disregarding the one or failing to follow the other, he has become legally liable for actively or negligently causing the actors to lose their debt?"

As to the first question, to wit, the pendency of the appeal at the time the settlement was made of the verdict, his Honor reached the conclusion that both counsel and client believed that the appeal was pending, and whether it was technically so, in fact, was not material. This appeal does not involve the correctness of this conclusion, so that this question may be dismissed from our consideration. As to the other two questions, his Honor found that an assignment of the verdict had been made by plaintiff to his attorneys before the settlement; that the defendant had knowledge thereof, and that the transaction was fraudulent. He therefore made the rule absolute.

The defendant has appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the right of recovery in this case, which was grounded on a tort, could, in law, be assigned before judgment entered and during an appeal to the Supreme Court.

2. "Because his Honor erred in holding that a verdict pend*ing an appeal to the Supreme Court, upon which no judgment had entered, could be assigned by parol alone.

3. "Because his Honor erred in holding that an agreement to pay the plaintiff's attorneys a part of the recovery gave them an enforceable lien.

4. "Because his Honor erred in decreeing that there was an assignment for half of the verdict, when the proof shows that if there was an assignment it was conditioned to secure services of counsel in the pending litigation in the Supreme Court, and being for these services, which were not rendered, was certainly invalid for a part of the sum pretended to be assigned.

5. "Because his Honor erred in holding that Newell's secrecy for four days as to a fact which the law did not require to be published, was a fraud, and at the same time holding that the plaintiff's failure to make known his assignment, which the law required to be made known or recorded to bind the parties, was valid and gave them an enforceable lien.

6. "Because his Honor erred in holding J. C. Milford to be an agent of Newell.

7. "Because his Honor erred in holding that Newell had notice when it is nowhere proved by the testimony.

8. "Because his Honor erred in holding that Newell had such notice as to make him responsible.

9. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the settlement in this case was attended with such suspicious circumstances as to charge Newell with fraud.

10. "Because his Honor erred in holding that J. C. Milford was a reluctant witness, when there is not a scintilla of proof as to such fact.

11. "Because his Honor erred in holding that Newell would gain an advantage in the compromise, thereby deciding against Newell without any hearing of the case pending in the Supreme Court at the time the compromise was made."

The Circuit judge bases his judgment upon two legal propositions, under one or both of which he thought the facts brought the case. These propositions are—First. If there was an assignment by the plaintiff without the knowledge of the defendant, or of such facts in relation to it as should have put him upon *inquiry, and he, in good faith, satisfied the plaintiff's demand, then he should be protected by the court, except as to the matter of costs. Second. If there was an agreement by which the plaintiff was to pay his attorneys one-half of the verdict, and the defendant had no knowledge of such agreement, or of such facts in relation to it as should have put upon him upon inquiry, and he, in good faith, satisfied the plaintiff's demand, he would, in like manner, be entitled to the protection of the court, except as to the matter of costs and disbursements. The converse of both propositions being that if the defendant had the knowledge, &c., he should not be protected.

No doubt both of these propositions are sound. They are not only founded in natural justice, but they are fully sustained by authority. The question is, do the facts of this case bring it under either one of them; and, if so, can the actors invoke their application in this proceeding of a rule to show cause?

On this point we will take up the second proposition first. Suppose that there was an agreement, and nothing more than an agreement, between Miller and his attorneys that they should be paid one-half of the recovery in the slander case, either out of the verdict when collected, or that the verdict should be assigned to them to that extent, and Miller, at the close of the case, had refused to comply, what would have been the remedy for the counsel? Could they have gone into the Court of Equity for a specific enforcement? We think not, as this agreement was not one of a character which entitles parties to specific performance. It was not an agreement in reference to land, nor in reference to a jewel, an heir-loom or family relic, or anything else having an artificial value on account of which the old Court of Equity would decree specific performance. Nor was it an agreement the breach of which could not be compensated in damages. The only remedy in reach of the counsel would have been an action for breach of contract.

Now, admit that there was collusion between Miller and Newell to breach this contract to the injury of the attorneys by marking the verdict satisfied on the payment of the $1,000, which was paid. This would be a fraud, and a gross one; but would this fraud give the attorneys the right to go into equity to *have the entry of satisfaction vacated so that they might ask a specific performance of the agreement? Certainly not, if, after having vacated the entry, the case was found to be one in which the court could not decree a specific performance. It would be idle to declare the entry of satisfaction a nullity when the court could proceed no further. The verdict would still be Miller's, and the court would have no power to decree that the attorneys should be paid out of it, or that one-half thereof should be assigned to them, because attorneys in this State have no enforceable lien for their fees resting alone in contract. Scharlock v. Oland, 1 Rich. 207. Courts do not sit simply to adjudge acts fraudulent. They are not public censors organized simply to censure vice and to mark immorality, but it is their end in part to afford relief and redress to the consequences of such acts. Where, then, such relief is sought as the court can give for a fraudulent act, then the court can take cognizance. But where the court can give no relief, however fraudulent the act may be, the court is without jurisdiction.

Now, this rule, so far as it proceeds upon the alleged agreement of Miller that his counsel should be paid out of the verdict, or that one-half of it should be assigned to them, is in the nature of a bill for specific performance against Miller by his attorneys, and yet Miller is no party. Such a proceeding, as we have seen, could not have been entertained in equity by bill against Miller himself, and, consequently, we think, could not be entertained here by rule.

It may be contended, however, that while this is true, yet that the attorneys were creditors of Miller, and this collusion between him and Newell was a fraud intended to delay and hinder them in the collection of their debt, and under the rule of Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140], and numerous other cases to the same point, that the settlement of this verdict should be set aside. The principle is well established, that where a debtor disposes of his property, even for a valuable and full consideration, yet for the purpose of defeating, delaying or hindering one or more of his creditors, the act of disposition is fraudulent, because not bona fide, and may be vacated in behalf of the credi-

certain steps for the creditor to take. *He must have his claim against the debtor adjudicated and established, and he must then exhaust the other property of the debtor. A debtor has a right to dispose of a portion of his property so that he leaves enough for his creditors. The act is not fraudulent unless it results in injury to some one. Where a debtor disposes of his property, a creditor, who feels that he has been injured, after establishing his demand to judgment and failing to find other property of the debtor sufficient to satisfy his debt, may then move to set aside the conveyance which, in his judgment, is fraudulent, but not before.

Now, here, Miller, in effect, transferred to Newell a portion of his claim of $2,000, supposing it to be a valid claim, which he had a right to do, but not to the prejudice of his creditors. The court will not, however, assume that one man is the creditor of another, or that he has been prejudiced by the transfer of property by the alleged debtor. These facts must be proved. In other words, the creditor must obtain judgment on his claim, and show in some way that all of the other property of the debtor has been exhausted, and that it is necessary for him to resort to the property thus disposed of, so that his claim may be paid. These facts did not appear in this case, and we are of opinion, therefore, that the second proposition of law mentioned above could not be invoked for the actors in the rule.

Next, there is no doubt, as we have already said, of the correctness of the first proposition. But did the facts of the case make it applicable? Was there a valid assignment, and did the defendant have knowledge of this assignment, or of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry? These involve both questions of fact and of law. As to what occurred, I mean the facts as proved, there is no dispute, especially in reference to the assignment. The testimony on that subject appears in the affidavit of Mr. Allen, one of Miller's attorneys. He states that when the attorneys were employed, Miller promised, "as a further compensation beyond the retaining fee, to assign to them one-half of the recovery," and also, that after the verdict and notice of appeal Miller did assign by parol one-half of said verdict to said attorneys. He does not state how this assignment was made, except *that it was by parol, but whether there was any delivery of the verdict, actual or symbolical, does not appear.

Now assuming that these facts occurred as stated by Mr. Allen, the questions of law arise, could this verdict in its then shape, being a verdict for damages in an action of tort to the character of Miller, with an appeal pending, be made the subject of assignment? and, if so, whether a statement by a witness that it had been "assigned by parol," without stating the circumstances of delivery, actual or symbolical, is sufficient evidence of an assignment? It will not be necessary to trace the law of assignments of choses in action back to its original source, or to discuss the various modifications and enlargements of this doctrine, which have subsequently taken place under the demands of commerce and trade. It is sufficient to say that nearly all choses in action founded on contract may be assigned, whether they be notes negotiable or unnegotiable—bonds, judgments, decrees, or evidenced in any other way, and they may be assigned either in writing without seal or under seal or by verbal parol. But it is not necessary to pursue this discussion, as the matter involved here is not a chose in action arising on contract. On the contrary it is a chose in action arising in tort. It may be called a chose in action, as those terms taken in their broadest latitude comprehend not only a demand arising on contract, but also a wrong or injury done to person or property. People v. Tioga C. P., 19 Wend. 75.

Can choses in action on torts be assigned? Torts, in their effects, may be divided into two classes, to wit: those which affect injuriously the estate, real or personal, of a party, and those which cause injuries strictly personal; those which survive to the administrator and those which die with the party injured. It appears that those which affect the estate may be assigned, but those of a personal character cannot. Neither can a contract, in which the personal acts and qualities of one of the contracting parties form a material ingredient, in general be assigned. 2 Chit. Cont. 1364. In reference to torts, Mr. Chitty says: "A distinction has, however, been taken between different classes of torts—those which cause injuries strictly personal being regarded as furnishing no assignable claim for damages; while the con*trary is held as to those from which special loss has arisen to the estate of the assignor." Gardner v. Adams, 12 Wend. 297; 2 Story Eq. Jur., § 1040, g; Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193 [7 L. Ed. 108]; People v. Tioga C. P., 19 Wend. 75; McKee v. Judd, 2 Kernan 625–6.

Now was the matter involved here a chose in action arising in tort of a strictly personal character? It was an action at the beginning for slander. This was certainly of a personal nature entirely and strictly, and it arose in a tort. Has its character changed in the progress of the suit? Has it passed beyond the condition of a chose in action, and become an adjudicated right to so much money—evidenced by a judgment, which in some sense might be regarded as a contract and therefore assignable. It is very certain that no judgment had been entered, when the alleged assignment was made. But had Miller the right to enter an unalterable judgment at that time? Had the amount of his damages become an established and an accomplished fact? This must depend upon the further fact, was the appeal pending? The Circuit judge did not pass upon this question definitely. He seemed, however, to be under the impression that it was pending. In this we concur. We think that Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C. 491, is conclusive of the question. Under this case the appeal was pending, and such being the case the rights of the parties had not been determined. The matter was still a chose in action arising on tort of a strictly personal character and therefore not assignable.

We find in Bliss Code Pl., § 38, the following: "That not even in equity was an assignment allowed of a right of action arising from a mere personal wrong, as libel, slander and injuries to the person. The injury must be to the estate, otherwise there is nothing assigned. A mere personal wrong will entitle the sufferer to redress, but his right to redress is not deemed property so as to survive." Again, at section 44, he says: "A judgment, upon whatever founded, is everywhere regarded as a debt which does not abate by death, and which is transferable like an ordinary contract. But the character of the demand is not changed until judgment, and an action based on a cause of action which would not survive will abate by death during any step of the proceeding, and the demand cannot be assigned after verdict *merely," citing Crouch v. Gridley, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 250; Charles, in re, 14 East 197; Kellogg v. Schuyler, 2 Den. 73.

We might stop here, as this disposes of the case. It would be more satisfactory, however, to discuss the other questions. Was there a legal assignment of the verdict?—admitting it to be assignable. The only testimony upon this subject is found in the affidavit of Mr. Allen. He says, that after the notice of appeal the plaintiff "assigned by parol." We have already seen that an assignment may be made by parol, that it need not be in writing. But it is not certain that a mere verbal declaration that "I do assign," without more and without the matter assigned being present and without delivery, will amount to an assignment. Mr. Chitty says: "That it is now established that no particular form is necessary in equity to constitute an assignment of a debt or chose in action; any order, writing or act which makes an appropriation of a fund, amounts to an equitable assignment of that fund. An assignment of a debt may be made by parol as well as by deed. And where an assignment has been executed by a delivery of the evidence of the contract, no writing is necessary to its validity. If the case is such that an actual delivery cannot be made, a symbolical delivery seems to be sufficient. An equitable assignment of a judgment may be made by parol; and a delivery of the execution is a sufficient symbolical delivery of the judgment on which it issued." 2 Chit. Cont. 1365–6. Mr. Allen, however, says that there was an assignment, and although he does not detail the circumstances or state the manner in which it took place, the Circuit judge was perhaps warranted in inferring that the requisite formalities were observed.

Next, was this assignment brought home to Newell, or was he in possession of such facts as should have put him on the inquiry? There is no dispute or controversy as to what the different witnesses testified, and the question at issue must be determined by inferences drawn from the testimony given. There is no positive testimony that Newell was ever distinctly informed of the assignment before or up to the compromise. The facts from which it is said this knowledge must be inferred are three: 1. Walters, one of the witnesses, said that Newell asked him to *see the plaintiff and ascertain if the matter could be compromised; that he wanted Miller to get the benefit of what was paid in the compromise. 2. That when the settlement took place Miller stated that he desired the compromise kept secret until the Saturday following, three days; and 3. That Milford, one of the parties negotiating the compromise, was informed by Miller that the reason he wanted the matter kept secret was that he had paid Captain Allen about $200, and had agreed to give his attorneys a certain per cent. of the amount recovered, and if it was known that he was going to make a compromise, his lawyer would not let him make it.

Now according to the testimony no one knew of the fact of the assignment but Miller and Mr. Allen. Even Mr. Tribble, one of Miller's attorneys, does not appear to have known it, because he states that some time about November 1st, 1881, (this was after the verdict,) Miller informed him that Messrs. Orr, Wells & Allen were to be paid for their services out of the judgment, that this was the agreement with them." He does not state that anything was said about the assignment. So it appears that no one positively knew of the fact of the assignment but Miller and Mr. Allen; or rather, it does not appear from the testimony that any except these two knew of it. There was certainly no notice given to Newell or to his attorneys. Under these circumstances can it be legitimately inferred from the facts stated above that Newell had the information? We think not.

The matter that excites some suspicion was the fact that the compromise was to be kept secret. That proposition, however, came from Miller. Newell does not seem to have been at all concerned whether it was to be kept secret three days or not. Miller desired it, and Newell made no objection.

But it is said that Milford knew it, and that he was the agent or friend of Newell. It does not satisfactorily appear that Milford was the agent of Newell. He did bear a message in the first instance to Miller from Newell to know if he, Miller, would compromise. Miller refused and the matter was dropped. Afterwards, in conversation with Miller, he said he would compromise for $1,400. This Milford reported to Newell, who de*clined it, but said he would give $1,000. This Miller agreed to take, saying that he would take it provided it was kept secret until Saturday, or at least he is certain that this was said the day the compromise took place; and during this conversation Miller gave the reason why he wanted the matter kept secret. Milford does not say that he informed Newell of this conversation. We do not see such agency here as that Newell was bound to know all that Milford knew. Newell had not constituted Milford his agent to compromise the case, but in reply to propositions from Miller of $1,400, he returned a message that he would give $1,000, and received one in reply, that it would be accepted.

These facts, without regard to the opposing testimony, seem to us altogether insufficient to warrant the inference that Newell knew of the assignment, nor were they enough to put him on the inquiry. The first duty of the assignee, after the assignment was executed, was to give notice to the debtor, if he desired to cut off any dealings between said debtor and the assignor; but here there was no notice, nor was there any indorsement made on the verdict or the judgment by which Newell could have obtained notice. The fact that Miller wished to keep the settlement secret for three days was hardly sufficient to make Newell infer that Miller was attempting to cheat and defraud his attorneys. The character of Miller had just been vindicated by the country to the cost of Newell, and no doubt he was unwilling to interfere with that character further.

While these facts seem to be insufficient in themselves to support the inference drawn by the Circuit judge when considered alone, this insufficiency is much stronger when they are considered in connection with the opposing testimony, to wit, the affidavit of Newell. He denies most positively and emphatically that he knew anything whatever of the arrangement made by Miller to pay his attorney's fee, or that there was any collusion between himself and Miller to defraud said attorneys, and states that he did not know that Miller owed said attorneys anything. Newell stands unimpeached before the court. True, he was a party and his testimony was in his own favor, but this is not sufficient to destroy the credit of a man whose character is unimpeachable. With this positive testimony of Newell, met only *by the circumstances which we have already discussed, we are unable to concur with the Circuit judge in his finding of fact as to this point.

No doubt the attorneys of Miller rendered valuable service to him. No doubt they are entitled to the compensation which they demand, and no doubt their client has perpetrated upon them a gross and most ungrateful fraud; and while our sympathies and feelings, so far as we are entitled to indulge sympathy as individuals, are all with the attorneys in this case, yet as a court, solemnly adjudicating the rights of parties, we must be governed by the law and the facts as we understand them.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit judge be reversed, and that the rule should be discharged.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I incline to think that there was enough to put Newell on the inquiry as to the intended fraud, but in other respects concur.

Before Wallace, J., Edgefield, March, 1882.

A very full statement of all the facts of this case will be found in the report of the first appeal, 11 S. C. 122. See, too, 15 S. C. 615. To the statement here made in the opinion of the court, it will be proper to add only that portion of Marshall Frazier's will nominating his executors, and the requests to charge made by defendants and refused by the presiding judge, and forming the grounds of their exceptions, numbers 6–12.

The extract from the will is as follows:

"Fifth. I appoint my son, William H. Frazier, my executor, to carry out the provisions of this, my last will and testament, and in the event of his death or refusal to qualify, I appoint my son-in-law, Sheppard Spencer, of Alabama, and my son-in-law, William A. Sanders, joint executors of this will."

The requests to charge were as follows:

"That plaintiffs must prove that they sold the cotton, when they sold it, and the prices for which they sold it, and the expenses of shipment and sale in Liverpool, England, where it *is alleged in the pleadings that it was sold." His Honor did not charge this request, but marked on the margin—"Cannot be charged without qualification."

"That there can be no proof of an overdraft by Frazier on his cotton until it is shown by proof that the cotton was duly sold, and what it brought, and that the charges made for expenses and advances upon the same must be proved to have been actually paid, and that they were reasonable and proper charges against the same." His Honor did not charge this request, but marked it on the margin—"Refused for same reason."

"That plaintiffs must prove each and every item charged and claimed by them against Marshall Frazier for advances to him on his cotton, and for all charges for the shipment of the same, both in Columbia, Charleston, New York and Liverpool, to show that he made any overdraft on his cotton." His Honor did not charge this request, but wrote on the margin—"Refused; cannot be charged without qualifications."

"That plaintiffs must prove that they advanced the $990.82 charged by them in their account rendered to Frazier, or that they paid out the same for him; and they must also prove for what it was paid, so as to show that it was a reasonable and proper charge against him." His Honor did not charge this request but wrote on the margin—"Refused for the above reason."

"That the charges in the account rendered Frazier of $429.52 and $267.67 entered as charges of Marshall, Beach & Co. on seventy-two bales cotton, and thirty-seven bales cotton, must be proved by plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs must prove for what purposes said charges were made, so that it can be ascertained that said charges were reasonable and just and legal." His Honor did not charge this request, but marked on the margin—"Refused for same reason."

"That plaintiffs must prove that the drafts of Solomon Root & Co., referred to in the accounts rendered Frazier must be proved by the plaintiffs, and that it must be proved that they were paid." His Honor did not charge this request, nor mark it refused.

*"That the drafts of Solomon Root & Co. were not Frazier's drafts if actually drawn and paid, and that they are not proper charges against him." His Honor did not charge this request, nor mark it refused.

The appeal was heard on December 11th, 1882, and being ordered for re-argument on the question of the statute of limitations, was again heard May 21st, 1883.

Messrs. A. J. Norris, L. F. Youmans and Pringle T. Youmans, for appellants.

November 12th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In August, 1871, the plaintiffs, respondents, instituted the action below against William H. Frazier, one of the defendants, as executor of Marshall Frazier, deceased, demanding judgment for the sum of $5,099, with interest thereon from December 10th, 1866, less $120, admitted by plaintiffs to be due the said Frazier, said amount being due them, as alleged, for so much paid by them to Marshall, Beach & Co., of Charleston, on account of an overdraft of the said Frazier on a lot of 212 bales of cotton, shipped by the said plaintiffs for the said Frazier, through Marshall, Beach & Co., to Liverpool. The defendant Frazier answered the complaint denying the indebtedness of the estate, and also suggested that W. A. Sanders had qualified as one of the executors of Marshall Frazier. This answer seems to have been put in in November, 1871.

In March, 1872, the plaintiffs obtained an order "That they have leave to amend their summons and complaint by adding the name of William A. Sanders, one of the executors of Marshall Frazier, deceased, as a defendant to the action." It appears that no action was taken under this order, or at least there is nothing in the brief showing action. In October, 1873, a second *order was passed by Judge Carpenter, "That the case be withdrawn from the jury, and that plaintiffs have leave to amend their complaint within thirty days by making as a party defendant, William A. Sanders, as co-executor of William H. Frazier, of the last will and testament of Marshall Frazier, with apt words to charge him." January 14th, 1874, the summons and complaint, as amended, were served on W. A. Sanders, and on W. H. Frazier on March 27th, 1874. To this amended complaint, Frazier and Sanders answered separately; Frazier submitting, in addition to his former answer, that the complaint of plaintiffs had not been amended within the thirty days allowed in his order, and the said amended complaint and summons had not been served on the said William A. Sanders as required by law; and he claimed the benefit of this non-compliance. Sanders, in his answer, denied the debt, plead the statute of limitations, and, also, that the amended complaint and summons had not been served on him in the manner as required by law, or within the time specified in the order.

The case was heard at the May Term, 1876, of the court of Richland county, with verdict for the plaintiffs. A new trial, however, was granted on appeal to the Supreme Court. 11 S. C. 122. It was then transferred to Edgefield county, where the defendants resided, and in 1879 it came up for trial before Judge Wallace, who, upon motion of the defendants, ordered a non-suit. This order was set aside by the Supreme Court and a new trial granted (15 S. C. 615); which trial was had at the March Term of the court, 1882, for Edgefield. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $5,000; and the present appeal is from the judgment entered upon this verdict.

The appeal is based upon fourteen exceptions; but, as is usual where exceptions are so numerous, many of them rest upon the same alleged error presented in a different form. The first involves nothing more than a question of fact, and, as the case below was a jury case, we do not understand how it could be relied on here as a ground of appeal, in view of the emphatic provision of the constitution, that in such cases the jurisdiction of the court is limited to the correction of errors of law, and *also the often-repeated announcement of this court that it has no appellate jurisdiction except in cases of chancery.

The second charges error to his Honor in permitting "the account of sales submitted by the plaintiffs to go before the jury without any proof as to the charges and statements contained therein." It is stated in the brief, that his Honor, in allowing this account of sales to go to the jury, said that "it was not to be regarded as evidence in itself, but was allowed to go to the jury, like a note or other paper requiring proof, to give opportunity to prove them;" and further, "that if the declarations, acts and conduct of Marshall Frazier, connected with the account of sales referred to and the reclamation made upon him by Beach, Root & Co., were such as to have induced a reasonable man to believe that he (M. Frazier) recognized such an account-sales as correct, and if the plaintiffs, Blakely and Copeland, acting in good faith and under such belief, were induced thereby to pay such reclamation, then it would be competent for the jury to regard said account-sales as proved, at least as against M. Frazier and the defendants, his executors." This account of sales, admitted under these circumstances, we think, was properly admitted. The judge seems to have fully explained to the jury that the introduction of the account was not intended as evidence of the items embraced therein, but as containing the debt in an itemized form, subject to proof, by the admission, conduct or acts of Marshall Frazier in connection therewith, or otherwise. Thus explained, there can be no valid objection to its admission.

The third exception alleges error, "because his Honor permitted the 'award' to go to the jury it having been heretofore decided in this case to be incompetent evidence to prove the overdraft by Frazier on his lot of cotton." It is not necessary now to construe the former opinion of this court on the subject of this award; but admitting that the appellants' interpretation of it is correct, to wit, that the award in itself was incompetent to prove the overdraft by Frazier on his lot of cotton, yet this would not exclude the award entirely from the case. This award was a part of the history of the case. It was one of the facts by which the plaintiffs became connected with the transaction, and the case could not be understood well without its introduction. *It does not appear that it was introduced by the plaintiffs, or was admitted by the court as competent evidence in itself, of the fact that Marshall Frazier had overdrawn to that extent on his cotton; but as a part of the transaction in which the plaintiffs had paid the money, which they were claiming, and also as a basis upon which to found the introduction of evidence of the acts and conduct of Marshall Frazier in reference thereto. We see no error in its admission.

The fourth and fifth complain, that the verdict of the jury is not in accordance with the charge of the judge in regard to the value of gold and exchange, and as to the amount which Frazier was entitled to in U. S. currency on that account as the proceeds of his cotton, and that such being the fact, his Honor should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial as moved for by appellant. The Circuit judge does not state fully the reasons of his refusal to grant the new trial. He does state, however, that it appeared to his satisfaction, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and that there was not proper ground for the new trial; and, therefore, he refused the motion. The verdict was for a good deal less than the amount claimed. How the jury reached the verdict of $5,000, is not for this court to inquire. It may possibly have been capricious and unsupported by the evidence. If so this was a matter to be corrected on the motion for a new trial. It does not appear that it was reached by a disregard of the legal propositions charged by the judge in the matter, which constitutes the foundation of these exceptions, and, therefore, said exceptions are untenable.

The sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh and twelfth exceptions involve alleged errors of omission in refusing to charge as requested therein. These requests seem to have been intended to intensify the legal principle, that it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prove the correctness of their demand, and that this could only be done in a certain way. The sixth exception is an illustration, in which his Honor was requested to charge, "that there could be no proof of an overdraft by Frazier on his cotton until it was shown by proof that the cotton was duly sold, and what it brought, and that all charges made upon it for ex*penses must be proved to have been actually made, and that they were reasonable and proper charges against the same."

The plaintiffs' cause of action was founded upon an allegation that they had paid for Marshall Frazier, and at his special instance and request, a certain sum of money, on account of an overdraft of his on a lot of 212 bales of cotton consigned through Messrs. Marshall, Beach & Co., to Liverpool. The judge charged, in general terms, that to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they must prove their demand. He did not undertake to specify the different links so to speak, in the chain of proof; nor would he have been warranted in doing so. Nor was he required to confine the plaintiffs to one mode or channel of proof. Suppose it had been possible for the plaintiffs to prove that Marshall Frazier had admitted in terms that he was indebted to them in the sum mentioned, and for the consideration mentioned. In such case it would not have been necessary for plaintiffs to have gone into the items demanded by the defendants. All that would have been necessary, would be proof simply of the general admission, and the defendants upon such admission would have been liable, whether the different items embraced in the account were correct or not. If the plaintiffs, at the instance and request of Marshall Frazier, paid a sum in gross for said Frazier, which he at the time recognized as a valid claim against him, it would be a very hard rule against the plaintiffs to require of them in a suit against Frazier, to prove that the debt in all its items was really a valid debt; and that Frazier had made no mistake in acknowledging it. We think the judge's charge was sufficiently comprehensive on this point, and that he was not bound to charge as requested in these different requests.

The thirteenth exception need not be considered, as it is on appeal from the facts.

The fourteenth, which is the last, presents the only difficult question in the case, to wit, whether the action was barred by the statute of limitations? It was on account of this that a re-argument of the case was ordered for the last term of this court. The argument upon which the statute is invoked by the defendants is as follows: It is said that there were two executors of *the will of Marshall Frazier and that no action could be regarded as having commenced against the estate, until process had been issued against both; that the estate was one, and that the two executors represented that unity, and, therefore, process had to issue against both before the estate could be said to be sued. This is the principle of law for which the appellants contend, which no doubt is correct. Hopkins v. Admrs. McPherson, 2 Bay 194.

Then it is contended, as matters of fact, that while process was issued in time against W. L. Frazier, one of the executors, to save the statute, yet that the other executor was not made a party until long after the statute had run out, and that inasmuch as the estate was not sued until both executors were impleaded, that the statute could be invoked for the benefit of the estate, when the second executor was brought in.

There is no dispute as to the facts. It is admitted that the action was not barred when W. L. Frazier was sued, and it is also admitted, that the statutory period had elapsed, when the process was lodged for Sanders. The facts of the case, bearing upon the question of the statute, are as follows: The right of action against the estate of Marshall Frazier accrued to the plaintiffs on December 10th, 1866. Frazier died August 5th, 1870. Had he lived, the statute would have been completed as a bar on December 10th, 1870. Summons was lodged against defendant Frazier, as executor, August 25th, 1871, but not served until November 6th, 1871. At the time the summons was lodged giving the plaintiffs the benefit of the nine months after the death of Marshall Frazier the action was brought in time; as adding the nine months the time did not expire until September 10th, 1871, whereas the summons against the defendant Frazier, as executor, was lodged, as we have said, August 25th, 1871. Frazier having suggested that Sanders was also executor, the plaintiffs obtained leave from Judge Melton, March 2d, 1872, to amend their summons and complaint by adding the name of Sanders, one of the executors, as defendant to the action. At that time the statute had run out and if the estate was not already sued, the statute was a bar. Nothing seems to have been done under this order. On October 25th, 1873, after the case had *gone to the jury, it was withdrawn, and Judge Carpenter, presiding, gave leave to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint within thirty days by making William A. Sanders, as co-executor, a party defendant with apt words to charge him. The complaint was thus amended November 22d, 1873, which, with summons against both Frazier and Sanders, as executors, was lodged in sheriff's office in Edgefield county, January 7th, 1874, and in sheriff's office Greenville, March 24th, 1874, and served on Sanders, January 14th, 1874, and Frazier, March 27th, 1874.

Now the first question which arises upon these facts is, Has Sanders ever been made a party to the action commenced originally against W. L. Frazier? The appellants contend: First. That new parties cannot be brought in until, under the order of the court, the summons has been amended; and, Second. That when leave has been obtained to amend either the summons or complaint, one or both, the order granting the leave must be strictly complied with or the step taken will be a nullity. These two propositions seem to be sustained by the authorities cited and relied on by the appellants. They embrace matters of practice under the code, and we think appellants' construction is supported by the following cases and authorities: 2 Wait Pr. 504; Follower v. Laughlin, 12 Abb. 105; Walkenshaw v. Perzel, 32 How. Pr. 310; 5 Rob. 648; 7 Rob. 606; 1 Wait Pr. 490; 2 Wait Pr. 508–9; Kelly v. Downing, 2 Brev. 302.

Now, in March, 1872, the plaintiffs obtained leave to amend their summons and complaint, but no action was taken under this order, and it expired. Nearly two years after this, to wit, on October 25th, 1873, they obtained a second order granting leave to amend the complaint within thirty days, but this order was not complied with strictly, the plaintiffs not having lodged for service any paper until January 7th, 1874—more than thirty days, as allowed by the order. The defendants, in their answer, set up this non-compliance and claimed the benefit thereof. In other words, they substantially raised the question of jurisdiction over the defendant Sanders on the ground that he was not properly in court; and they have continued to claim that benefit throughout, and have pressed their right to it on this appeal. A *question of jurisdiction may be raised at any time, and being raised, the court must pass upon it.

We think, upon the authorities cited, that appellants' position must be sustained, and that Sanders has never been legally made a party defendant to the original action; and, therefore, so far as he is concerned, the judgment below must be reversed. What effect will this have as to W. L. Frazier? This must depend upon the fact whether Sanders was a necessary party. If not, it is admitted that the action as against W. L. Frazier was within time, and the plea of the statute, therefore, could have no avail. Now, was Sanders a necessary party? This must be answered by determining whether Sanders was one of the executors of Marshall Frazier. The object of plaintiffs' action was to recover a claim on the estate of said Marshall Frazier; and no one but the legal representative of said estate was a necessary party defendant.

The question whether Sanders was one of the executors of Marshall Frazier, it is true, has been much complicated in the progress of the case. We learn from the evidence that the Probate Court of Edgefield county granted letters testamentary to him in 1871; that afterwards, to wit, April, 1875, on petition of the plaintiffs, these letters were revoked; and upon appeal to the Circuit Court a consent order was passed by Judge Carpenter November 19th, 1875, reversing this revocation. We do not know upon what ground the parties consented to the order of Judge Carpenter. It may have been upon the ground that the plaintiffs had no legal right to institute proceedings by petition or otherwise before the Probate Court to revoke Sanders' letters; that they were strangers, and had no cause of action in that regard, and, consequently, could have no status in court on the subject; or it may have been upon some other ground. We do not know; but whatever may have been the ground, we do not see that this should preclude this court from examining the question whether the Probate Court exceeded its jurisdiction in granting letters testamentary to Sanders.

While it is established as a general doctrine that the judgment of a court of record, or at least of a court of general jurisdiction, is to be held binding until vacated by a proper proceeding *to that end, yet this does not legitimize a judgment which is patently outside of the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing it. Moore v. Smith, 11 Rich. 569 [73 Am. Dec. 122]. Now, jurisdiction involves two elements—the subject-matter and the parties. If either of these elements are wanting the judgment is null and void, and may be disregarded wherever met with. No doubt the Probate Court has "jurisdiction in matters testamentary and of administration;" and no doubt this includes the appointment of administrators in case of intestacy, and the granting of letters testamentary in cases of testacy. But this jurisdiction is not unlimited in either case as to the appointment of administrators; the power conferred is subject to the limitation made by the law, that the appointment should be made in a certain order. The judge of Probate has no power to step beyond or outside of this order in opposition to the wish of the parties entitled; and the appointment of a stranger to the estate over the widow, the children, the next of kin, or creditors, would be beyond his jurisdiction, and therefore null. It may be that in such case of intestacy the appointment should be revoked by a direct proceeding.

So, too, the Probate Court has jurisdiction to grant letters testamentary; but this is not an unlimited power. He has no authority or jurisdiction to nominate and appoint an executor. This power belongs alone to the testator. The Probate Court has power to clothe the executor appointed by the will with legal authority to act; but to allow him to disregard the nomination in the will, and upon his own motion to make a new appointment, would be monstrous; and wherever he attempts to do such a thing, it should be utterly disregarded as an unwarranted assumption of power. Perry v. St. Joseph and Western R. R. Co., 29 Kan. 420, and the cases there cited; Ford v. Travis, MS. Dec., Court of Appeal of S. C.; Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch 9 [3 L. Ed. 471]. Under these principles, we think that the Probate judge in Edgefield transcended his jurisdiction when he attempted to grant letters to Sanders. The will need not be recited here; it will be found in the brief. But it is perfectly apparent from the terms of the will that Sanders had no right whatever to the letters granted, and that he has really been appointed executor of Marshall

Frazier—not by Frazier him*self, but by the Probate judge. And no one will contend that because the Probate judge has jurisdiction in matters testamentary and of administration, that he also has jurisdiction to appoint executors other than those nominated in the will.

This brings us to the conclusion that Sanders was not a necessary party to the action below; and further, that the estate of Marshall Frazier was in court when the summons was lodged for service upon W. L. Frazier, as executor thereof. And such being the fact, the statute of limitations was properly overruled. See this case, 11 S. C. 122.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be affirmed as to W. L. Frazier, executor; and that the case be dismissed as to Sanders, who, in our judgment, is not only an unnecessary but an improper party.

A petition for rehearing was filed in this case, but the court, by its order of December 8th, 1883, refused to grant a rehearing.

20 S. C. 156

McKAY v. BEARD.

After the legislature has duly chartered a corporation, which is composed of only two persons, and the corporation has entered upon the work for which it was established, appointed an agent, expended large sums of money and done acts which are lawful only by virtue of its charter, it is too late to say that such corporation had never accepted the charter or been organized as such, even though it does not appear that there was ever any formal organization by a meeting of the corporators and an election of the usual officers.

[2. Corporations ⟸56.]

Where an agreement was entered into by two persons constituting a corporation, that each was to contribute one-half of the expense incurred in carrying on the work, the profits of which were to be divided equally between them, but no debts to strangers were to be contracted without the consent of both corporators, it did not constitute the by-laws of the company, but a contract under which one would be personally liable for half of the excess furnished by the other under such agreement.

The refusal of one of the parties to be any longer bound by such agreement, did not work a dissolution of the corporation.

[4. Corporations ⟸592.]

For necessary work done for the corporation by one of the corporators after the abrogation of this agreement, the corporation itself would be liable, *but not its members individually; and for the payment of such indebtedness, the property and franchises of the company should be sold, and not simply the interest therein of the other corporator.

[5. Corporations ⟸189.]

The corporation as such, should be a party to this action.

Before Kershaw, J., Kershaw, September, 1882.

Action by J. W. McKay against W. J. Beard, commenced June 8th, 1881. The opinion states the case, but it will be proper to add to that statement a copy of a notice published once a week for three weeks, commencing May 20th, 1880, in the "Darlington News," as defendants, in their argument, laid stress upon this notice. It was in testimony that the defendant assented to the publication. The notice was as follows:

Legal Notice.—For the information of all interested, we would state that although W. J. Beard has sold and conveyed to the undersigned, J. W. McKay, one-half interest in the "Lynch's Creek Navigation Company," yet said company has not been formally organized; neither is there any copartnership existing between the said Beard & McKay; consequently neither of said parties, their agents, clerks, or any one else, has any right or authority to make or assume any contracts or liabilities in the name, for the use, or on account of said Lynch's Creek Navigation Company, without the approval in writing of each of the said parties. J. W. McKay.

By the consent and approval of W. J. Beard.

The Circuit decree was as follows, omitting its statement of facts:

In the complaint it is alleged that the company was never organized under the charter, and this is admitted by the answer; but as this allegation and admission can amount to no more than a legal deduction from the acts of the parties, the court must look into the facts and declare whether or not that was a proper deduction, and determine whether, as matter of law, the company did not go into operation under the act, in order properly to determine the rights of the parties resulting from the actual law *of the case, rather than from the relations which they supposed to exist between them.

There was no formal act of organization, but the agreement between the parties to do the work required of them by the charter, in order to secure the privileges granted, which were highly valuable (if the enterprise should succeed) and very unusual and important, may have had the effect of an organization of the company, whether or not it was so intended. If there was no corporation in existence, every step taken by the parties to deepen the channel of the creek, blasting, digging the soil, cutting out the timber, &c., to remove the obstacles to navigation, was a trespass against the riparian proprietors without warrant of law.

I must consider that those acts were done under the charter, and by virtue of the authority therein conferred. It seems to be well settled that "if the persons or association to whom a grant of corporate privileges is tendered, proceed to act under it, this is an acceptance of the charter, and the contract between the State and the corporators is complete, and the doing of acts by persons acting in the usual way of corporate agents, and which would not be consistent except upon the theory of acceptance, would be evidence of it." So, likewise, the exercise of powers granted by an amendment of a charter of a corporation is evidence of an acceptance of the amendment by a corporation. And when a charter, or amended charter, is once accepted, no subsequent withdrawal of the corporators therefrom, can affect the obligations imposed thereby. Field Corp., §§ 29, 30, 32.

But we are not left to inference from the acts of the parties under the charter; for the deed assigning one-half interest in the company to the plaintiff, makes it manifest that these parties dealt with it as an existing corporation. The defendant in said deed conveys one-half interest "in the property, rights and franchises which were granted to me, and such other persons as I may associate with me, my or our successors as a body, corporate and politic, by the name and style of The Lynch's Creek Navigation Company, together with all the powers, rights and privileges connected therewith and incident thereto, and I do hereby associate the said John W. McKay with me as a member of said company, with one-half interest therein from and after the date *of these presents, free and clear from any and all incumbrance whatsoever." The plaintiff had no rights under this deed, but as a member of the company and upon his acceptance thereof he became a corporator with the defendant, and the law of their relation as such attached to them. The agreement they entered into was entirely consistent with this view of the subject, and necessary and proper under the charter.

Regarding them as corporators, it will follow that the defendant is not liable personally for any expenditures or work done under the charter not authorized, or consented to, by him as he would have been had they been copartners. The money expended on the work is to be considered as having been contributed to the capital stock of the company, for stock is the money or capital invested in the business of a corporation. Whenever payments are required to be made to the stock of a company, if the charter is silent, it must be authorized by a majority of stockholders or the members will not be responsible for their proportions thereof. "No act can be directly done by a corporation, except through the voice or vote of its members, who, in this respect, by a fiction of the law, are supposed to represent the ideal and fictitious corporate body of which they are members." Field Corp., § 184.

The expenditures up to April 18th, 1881, appear to have been made with the consent of both parties, and having been therefore duly authorized, the defendant is liable for his share of the same. And it is understood that his liability to that extent is not denied. But the expenditures upon the work after that time were made by the plaintiff without the consent of the defendant. The work appears to have been not only proper, but necessary in order to secure the privileges granted by the charter and to render the enterprise profitable. Under these circumstances, while the defendant cannot be held personally liable for his share of those expenditures, yet it would be inequitable to permit him to enjoy equally with the plaintiff the benefit derived from them by the corporation, and at the same time relieve him from all liability. They constitute an equitable charge upon his interest in the company, and that interest will be appropriated to re-imburse the plaintiff for those expenditures to the extent of defend*ant's proportion thereof, but beyond this plaintiff can have no relief against defendant in this regard.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the defendant pay the plaintiff the sum of $926.69, and that plaintiff have leave to enter a judgment therefor, and to enforce the same by execution; that the interest of the defendant in The Lynch's Creek Navigation Company, being one-half thereof, be sold by the master. * * * That out of the proceeds of such sale, he do pay the costs and disbursements of both parties herein, to be adjusted by the clerk, first deducting the costs and expenses of sale; next, that he pay plaintiff from the remainder of the proceeds of said sale the sum of $3,605.44, with interest from the date of this decree; next, that he do pay from said proceeds of sale, if any remain, the sum of $926.69 upon the judgment hereinbefore authorized to be entered against the defendant, and if any balance remain, that he pay the same to the defendant. That if the plaintiff become the purchaser of said interest of defendant, the master do take his receipt for so much of the purchase-money as may be payable to him under this decree, the plaintiff paying the remainder in cash.

Messrs. Kennedy & Nelson and W. H. R. Workman, for appellant.

November 2d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On March 1st, 1878, the legislature granted a charter to "William J. Beard and such other persons as he may associate with him, their successors and assigns," who were constituted a body politic and corporate by the name and style of "The Lynch's Creek Navigation Company." 16 Stat. 382. The object of said company was to improve the navigation of said creek by clearing out obstructions and to carry on a general transportation business on its waters.

Some time in October, 1879, the said Beard, the defendant in this action, by a formal deed

sold and conveyed to the plaintiff *a one-half interest in the franchises and property of said corporation, and associated the plaintiff with him as one of the corporators. On the same day the plaintiff and defendant entered into a special verbal agreement, by which each was to contribute one-half of the expenses incurred in carrying on the work, the profits of which were to be divided equally between them; but no debts to outside persons were to be contracted without the consent of both of said parties. It does not appear that any formal organization of the company was ever effected by the election of officers, adoption of by-laws, &c., as is usually done by incorporated companies; but they appointed one E. H. McNeill agent and treasurer, who kept the books and credited each of the said parties with the money and supplies furnished by them respectively for the purpose of carrying on the work, and no debts to outsiders seem to have been contracted.

The business was carried on in this loose way until some time in April, 1881, when, the defendant becoming dissatisfied, the special agreement hereinbefore referred to was abrogated, but no steps were taken by either party towards a formal dissolution of the corporation or winding up its affairs. On the contrary, the business was still carried on up to the time of the commencement of this action and afterwards, McNeill continuing to act as agent and treasurer, keeping an account of the receipts and disbursements. It appears that up to April, 1881, when the special agreement was terminated, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff under that agreement in the sum of $926.69, and that the balance due for money and supplies furnished by the plaintiff after that time and up to August 21st, 1882, when the last report of the master was made, after allowing all credits for freights received and correcting certain obvious errors in the calculation of the freight on staves transported for Webb & Davis, and for Commander, was $7,-210.88, for one-half of which it is claimed that defendant is liable.

The Circuit judge held that, while there was no formal organization of the company, yet the conduct of the corporators, in going to work under their charter, and especially the terms of the deed by which the defendant associated the plaintiff with him *as a member of the company, amounted to an acceptance of the charter, and was a sufficient organization of the company to constitute the relation of corporators between them, and that the special agreement by which the work was to be done at the joint expense of said parties, each being liable for one-half thereof, was entirely consistent with such relation. He, therefore, held that the defendant was personally liable to the plaintiff for the said sum of $926.69; but that for all expenditures made after the termination of the special agreement, he could not be made personally liable, and that one-half of such expenditures, to wit, the sum of $3,-605.44, was an equitable charge upon the share of the defendant in the company, to the payment of which such share should be subjected. Accordingly, he rendered judgment against the defendant personally for the said sum of $926.69, and ordered that the interest of the defendant in said company be sold, and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of the costs of these proceedings, as well as the expenses of such sale; next, to the payment of the said sum of $3,-605.44 to the plaintiff; next, to the payment of the aforesaid judgment for $926.69; and that any balance that may remain should be paid to the defendant.

From this judgment defendant appeals upon the following grounds:

1. "His Honor erred in his finding that a corporation was organized between plaintiff and defendant under the charter granted defendant.

2. "If his Honor is correct in his conclusion that a corporation was formed, then he should have found that the agreement between them constituted the only rules or by-laws by which they were to be governed.

3. "His Honor erred in not finding that, by this agreement, when defendant dissented from a further continuance of the work on said creek after April, 1881, it was a dissolution of said corporation, and all work done by plaintiff subsequent to that date was done at plaintiff's own risk; and defendant's share in said franchise is not chargeable therefor.

4. "His Honor erred in giving personal judgment against defendant for the sum of

$960 (?)—amount found to be due *April, 1881. It should have been made an absolute and not contingent charge on defendant's share on final settlement between them.

5. "His honor erred in not ordering a sale of the shares of both parties instead of defendant's share alone.

6. "His Honor erred in not decreeing, in order that an equitable settlement might be effected, that the enhanced value of the said stream for navigable purposes, if any, between April, 1881, and the date of the charge made by plaintiff for the work put on it subsequent to that time, be ascertained, and the share of defendant for such enhanced value, together with amount due plaintiff up to April, 1881, be deducted from the sale of the entire property, and the balance of amount realized from the sale should be divided equally between them."

The first ground of appeal is, we think, sufficiently answered by the reasoning employed and the authority cited by the Circuit judge, to which, however, we may add a reference to Ang. & A. Corp., § 83. After a corporation, duly constituted by act of the legislature, which corporation is composed of only two persons, has entered upon the work for which the corporation was established, appointed an agent, expended large sums of money on such work, and done acts which it would not have been lawful to do but for the charter granted by the legislature, it is too late to say that such corporation had never accepted the charter, or been organized as such, even though it does not appear that there was ever any formal organization by a meeting of the corporators and an election of the usual officers.

The second and fourth grounds of appeal, which may be considered together, rest upon a misconception of the scope and effect of the special agreement entered into by the parties after the plaintiff had been, by the formal deed of the defendant, admitted as a member of the company, which the act of legislature had declared should be a body politic and corporate by the name and style of "The Lynch's Creek Navigation Company." The corporation thus created having no cash capital, it was necessary that the money required to carry on the work should be obtained in some way. This could have been done either by borrowing it on the credit of the corporation from some third person or *from the individual corporators. The former mode was not, and perhaps could not have been pursued, as the corporation, having no cash capital and no property, except its franchises, would not be likely to have any credit. Hence, the other mode was resorted to; and the special agreement was entered into whereby the work was to be carried on at the joint expense of the parties, each being liable for one-half of such expense. This amounted, practically, to the same thing as if the money necessary to carry on the work had been borrowed from a third person on the individual credit of the parties, and their joint note had been given for the amount borrowed, each being liable as between themselves for one-half thereof.

This, it seems to us, is the true view of the scope and effect of the special agreement; and we are unable to see how it can be regarded as constituting the by-laws of the corporation. There is nothing whatever in the nature of the agreement, or in any of the evidence offered, which shows that such agreement was ever designed to constitute the by-laws of the corporation; but, on the contrary, we think it plain that the sole purpose of the agreement was to raise the means necessary to carry on the work without contracting any liabilities to outsiders. This being so, the effect of the agreement was the same as if the parties had given their joint note to a third person for the amount furnished by him to carry on the work, upon which each of the said parties, as between themselves, should be liable for one-half. Now, if such note had been given, and the whole amount of it had been paid by the plaintiff, could it, for a moment, be questioned that the defendant would be personally liable to the plaintiff for one-half of the amount so paid? And, in our judgment, there is as little doubt that he is personally liable to the plaintiff for one-half of the excess furnished by plaintiff under the special agreement for the purpose of carrying on the work. The second and fourth grounds of appeal cannot, therefore, be sustained.

It is very difficult for us to understand, with our view of the scope and effect of the special agreement, how it can be contended that when such special agreement was abrogated by the refusal of the defendant to be any longer bound by its terms, a dissolu*tion of the corporation was thereby effected. As we have seen, the agreement was a matter outside the corporation and altogether a private and personal arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant; and therefore, even if a corporation could be dissolved in this way, we do not see how the abrogation of such an agreement could possibly have any effect whatever upon the corporation as such, except, perhaps, by crippling its means of carrying on the work for which it was constituted; and, as the event has proved, even that effect was not experienced. We are unable to see, therefore, how the third ground of appeal can be sustained.

The sixth ground of appeal is manifestly based upon the theory that the corporation was never actually established, and that the parties stood toward each other in the relation of tenants in common, and, hence, a rule supposed to be applicable to that relation is sought to be applied here. But, as we have seen, this is an entire misconception of the relations of the parties, and, hence, there is no basis upon which to rest this ground of appeal.

The fifth ground of appeal presents greater difficulties. After the abrogation of the special agreement in April, 1881, the corporation was thrown upon its own resources; and if the work was to be continued, as it should have been under the charter, it must have been carried on upon the credit of the corporation. The amount furnished by the plaintiff after that time for carrying on the work, as the corporation in good faith was bound to do, constituted a debt of the corporation for which neither of the corporators could be held individually liable, and the plaintiff's claim, therefore, was against the corporation as such, and not against the defendant individually, or against his interest in the company. It seems to us, therefore, that for the payment of such claim, the whole property and franchises of the corporation, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose, should have been ordered to be sold, and not merely the interest of one of the corporators. For, besides the fact that an undivided interest in property of this kind would not be likely to bring its full value at a public sale, the debt which has rendered the sale necessary is, as we have seen, the debt of the corporation, and not of the individual member whose interest has been ordered to be sold, and, hence, for the enforcement of *the payment of such debt the property of the corporation should be sold.

The rights and interest of the plaintiff can be and should be fully protected by providing, as the Circuit judge did provide, that if the plaintiff becomes the purchaser the master shall take as cash his receipt for so much of the purchase-money as he may be entitled to under the decree that shall be made, he paying in cash a sufficient amount to satisfy the costs of these proceedings and the expenses of the sale. The proceeds of the sale should be applied, first, to the payment of such costs and expenses; next, to the payment of the amount due to plaintiff for money and supplies furnished to carry on the work since the abrogation of the special agreement in April, 1881, and the balance, if any, be equally divided between the plaintiff and defendant, the share of the defendant in such balance to be subjected to the payment of the personal judgment against him for $926.69 hereinabove mentioned.

It may be that the work has been continued since the last report of the master, and that the corporation has incurred further liabilities to the plaintiff, and has received further income from the transportation of freight and passengers, and that it may be proper to have a further reference to adjust these matters; but as the case must go back to the Circuit Court, we do not decide anything on these points, but leave them for that court to determine.

Although all persons interested in the corporation are now before the court, yet they are parties only as individuals; and under the view which we have taken it will be proper, in order to have the record technically correct, that the corporation as such should be made a formal party. Leave is therefore granted to the plaintiff to amend accordingly.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, except as modified herein, be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

*DIAL v. TAPPAN.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐444.]

An averment in the complaint that the plaintiff had been appointed by the Probate Court administrator with the will annexed, included an averment of the proper probate of the will, and of all else that was necessary to warrant such an appointment.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇐444.]

Where the allegations of the complaint show that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the bond and mortgage in suit, not in his own right but in his capacity as administrator, the complaint will not be held bad on demurrer for a failure to state that the plaintiff sues as administrator.

[This case is also cited in Elliott v. Pollitzer, 24 S. C. 85, without specific application.]

Before Cothran, J., Richland, October, 1881, and Witherspoon, J., July, 1882.

Action by George L. Dial, administrator of Asa Burke, against Henry L. Tappan, commenced June 6th, 1881. The opinion states the case.

The order of Judge Cothran overruling the demurrer was as follows:

It appears that these parties, in the same relation of plaintiff and defendants, and upon the same causes of action, have heretofore been in this court and in the Supreme Court. See 14 S. C. 573 [37 Am. Rep. 737], and also Ex parte Dial, 14 S. C. 584. At the conclusion of the opinion of the court in the case last referred to, Simpson, C. J., says: "We may be permitted to say, that while the question *is not properly before us for adjudication, yet we have looked into the petition and we are unable to discover any sufficient reason for a change of the opinion already pronounced; that administration in this State is necessary to enable the party to foreclose the mortgage set forth in the complaint, and that we see no insuperable difficulty in the way of foreclosing the same after the will of Asa Burke, deceased, shall have been admitted to probate and letters of administration, with the will annexed, shall have been properly granted in this State."

The plaintiff, inspired perhaps by this suggestion, has renewed his suits, and now claiming to be properly qualified by the grant of letters of administration from the proper office, presents himself as rectus in curia. To each of his complaints, however, the defendants have interposed a demurrer upon several of the grounds recognized by the code of procedure, as appropriate for such form of defense. The legal effect of a demurrer is to admit the truth of every statement well pleaded in the complaint or answer, as the case may be. Amongst other allegations of these complaints is an averment of the indebtedness of the defendants in the manner set forth and stated therein. The admission of the demurrer then is of indebtedness on the part of the defendants to some one having the right to demand and have payment. I can conceive of no other right that a debtor has who acknowledges his debt, than to require of the court to see to it that he pay to the rightful claimant and to no other.

Howsoever beautiful may be the divine precept of forgiving our debtors their debts, courts of justice have never adopted it as a rule of action, but rather that of the exacting servant to whom a thousand talents had been forgiven by his master, and who straightway went out and seized by the throat a fellow-servant who owed him 100 pence, saying unto him, "Pay me that thou owest." The indebtedness of the defendants upon the several causes set forth in the complaints being conceded to Asa Burke in his life-time, shall they be required to pay the same to the plaintiff, who claims to be his legal representative?

Adopting the order in which the learned counsel for the defendants presented his argument upon the several demurrers, I shall consider as his first objection—the failure of the plaintiff to *sue as administrator. This hyper-technical objection has been recognized in some of the New York decisions as a good ground of demurrer, but more recent (and I think more rational) decisions hold that the defect is cured if it can be gathered from the averments of the complaint that the plaintiff sues in the capacity of administrator.

The plaintiff's complaints certainly exhibit a conspicuous absence of the most ordinary averments, such as (1) that as administrator he is the owner and holder, &c.; (2) that the deceased died possessed of the choses in action; and (3) to whom the money claimed and sued for is now due. Extraordinary omissions. It is averred, however, that the evidences of debt herein were delivered to the plaintiff's testator in his life-time, and that the plaintiff is the duly appointed and qualified administrator of the will of the said Asa Burke, and in the peculiar circumstances of this case I shall give to this appointment and qualification the largest possible legal operation, even to the extent of holding that these cover this multitude of extraordinary omissions.

The second objection is to the plaintiff's legal capacity to sue; (1.) Because it does not appear that the estate of the testator in the said bonds and mortgages passed to the plaintiff; (2.) Because it has not been alleged that the said will has been admitted to probate.

These bonds being secured by mortgages of real estate in South Carolina, even if they have been specifically bequeathed to citizens of Massachustts, as has been suggested in argument, the legatees as such could not maintain their suits for foreclosure here, but would be compelled to come into the court for that purpose, through the Probate Court, as the plaintiff here has done. If this be true, and I take it to be undeniable, it is impossible for the defendants, after payment of their acknowledged indebtedness, to be again vexed upon the same causes of action, and this I hold to be the extent to which this court is bound to protect them.

As to the failure to allege probate of the will—the averment in the complaints is that the plaintiff, on May 11th, 1881, was duly appointed administrator, with the will annexed, of Asa Burke, deceased, by the Probate judge of Richland county.

*The Court of Probate is a constitutional court of record, "with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration," and when its proper officer, upon application made to him, grants letters of administration and the grantee qualifies and appears as such administrator in this court, it is but the exercise of common comity to presume that all of that officer's acts in this regard have been properly performed. "Omnia presumuntur rite." Upson v. Horn, 3 Strobh. 111 [49 Am. Dec. 633].

In the case of Abrams v. Moseley, the defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not appear from the complaint that the will in question had been admitted to probate in this State. The court say: "To sustain the demurrer would be an assumption that probate of the will has not been made in South Carolina, which would be equivalent to holding that the plaintiffs are obliged to set out in their complaint every element of proof necessary to sustain it. This would not be in accordance with any rule of pleadings with which we are familiar." Demurrer was overruled. 7 S. C. 151.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the demurrers to the said complaints be and the same are hereby overruled, and that the defendants have thirty days from the filing and notice of this judgment or decree within which to file their answers to the said complaints; and upon their failure to do so within the time prescribed, that the plaintiff have leave to apply for such orders as he may be advised are necessary to obtain the relief sought in the several complaints herein.

To this decision the defendants excepted as follows:

1. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the complaint contained facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action on the part of the plaintiff as administrator of Asa Burke, deceased. Whereas his Honor should have sustained the demurrer, on the ground that "under the peculiar circumstances of this case," such "a multitude of extraordinary omissions" furnish the strongest reason for adhering to the established principles of pleading, first that the complaint must show the capacity in which the plaintiff brings his action, and, secondly, that in such capacity he is the real party in interest.

2. Because his Honor erred in deciding that, to sustain this *action, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to aver in the complaint that the will of the testator had been admitted to probate.

The decree of Judge Witherspoon was as follows:

The history of a former suit on the bond and mortgage embraced in this suit will be found in the case of Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 573 [37 Am. Rep. 737], and Ex parte Dial, reported in 14 S. C. 584.

There being no question that the testator, Asa Burke, died in Massachusetts, leaving a will in which no executor was appointed, and that the defendant, the obligor and mortgagor, resides in Richland county, South Carolina, it would appear clear that the Probate judge of Richland county, South Carolina, had jurisdiction to admit to probate the will of Asa Burke, deceased, and to grant letters of administration, with the will annexed, upon his estate. Const., Art. IV., § 20. That the Probate judge of Richland county did exercise this jurisdiction is apparent from the records of the Probate Court and the testimony of the Probate judge introduced on the trial.

The letters of administration produced in evidence establish the representative character in which plaintiff sues. See Belden v. Meeker, 47 N. Y. 310. The bond and mortgage must be regarded and dealt with as assets to be administered in South Carolina, where the debtor resides. This debt can only be enforced and collected by the administrator, with the will annexed, in South Carolina. In Ex parte Dial, 14 S. C. 587, the court say: "That administration in this State is necessary to enable the party to foreclose the mortgage set forth in the complaint, and that we see no insuperable difficulty in the way of foreclosing the same after the will of Asa Burke, deceased, shall have been admitted to probate, and letters of administration, with the will annexed, shall have been properly granted in this State."

I find as matters of fact—

1. That on February 19th, 1873, the defendant, Henry L. Tappan, then and now a resident of Richland county, South Carolina, executed and delivered his bond to Asa Burke, conditioned to pay $2,500 one year thereafter, with interest at ten per cent. per annum. * * *

*4. That Asa Burke died in Massachusetts in 1879, where he then resided, leaving a last will and testament, in which he did not nominate an executor: that letters of administration, with the will annexed, were duly granted by the Probate Court of Suffolk county, Massachusetts, to Philip Sowden.

5. That an exemplification of the will of Asa Burke was admitted to probate in the Probate Court of Richland county, South Carolina, on March 26th, 1881, and that letters of administration upon the estate of Asa Burke, with the will annexed, were duly granted by the Probate Court for Richland county, South Carolina, on May 11th, 1881, to the plaintiff.

I find as matter of law—

1. That the above entitled action is properly instituted by plaintiff, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment of foreclosure.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the plaintiff do recover of defendant the balance of the principal and interest due on the bond sued upon, and that it be referred to N. B. Barnwell, master for Richland county, to ascertain the balance of principal and interest due upon the bond sued upon in the above entitled action, and that he do tax the costs and disbursements in the above entitled action; that the said master shall give the plaintiff's and defendant's counsel five days' notice prior to his ascertaining the balance of principal and interest due by the defendant, as well as the taxation of costs herein directed.

It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that unless the defendant, on or before January 1st, 1883, shall pay to the plaintiff the sum of money to be ascertained by the master as also the costs and disbursements to be taxed by the master as hereinbefore directed, that the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof, &c.

It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that plaintiff have leave to enter up judgment and issue execution against the defendant for any balance that may remain due by defendant to plaintiff after the application of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises as herein directed.

Defendant filed eight exceptions to this decree, but only the following were urged on the appeal:

*3. That his Honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding "that this action is properly instituted by the plaintiff;" whereas, he should have held that the plaintiff had no right, title or interest in the bond and mortgage, the subject-matter of the suit, and that he was not the real party in interest.

4. That his Honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding "that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure."

7. That his Honor, the Circuit judge, erred in directing the master "to tax the costs and disbursements in said action."

8. That his Honor, the Circuit judge, erred in adjudging "that unless the defendant, on or before January 1st, 1883, pay to the plaintiff the sum of money to be ascertained by the master, as also the costs and disbursements to be taxed by the master as hereinbefore directed; that the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to raise the amount ascertained to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff for principal, interest and costs, and disbursements, be sold at public auction at the court house at Columbia, county of Richland, by the master of Richland county, on the first Monday in February, 1883."

Messrs. Melton, Clark & Muller, for appellant.

November 2d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, a citizen of Richland county, in this State, on February 19th, 1873, executed and delivered his bond to Asa Burke, a citizen of Massachusetts, conditioned to pay $2,500, and on the same day executed a mortgage to Burke of certain real estate in the city of Columbia to secure the payment of said bond. Burke afterwards, to wit, in 1879, died testate in Suffolk county, Massachusetts, the place of his residence. In October, 1879, letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to one Philip Sowden, by the Probate Court of Suffolk county, Massachusetts. In May, 1881, the plaintiff, a citizen of Richland county, obtained letters of administration with the will annexed on said estate from the Pro*bate Court of said county, and in June thereafter instituted the above entitled action to foreclose the mortgage aforesaid.

The defendant demurred to the complaint: First. That plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue, because it does not appear that the estate of the testator in the said bond and mortgage passed to the plaintiff, and because it is not alleged that the said will has been admitted to probate. Second. That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was heard by Judge Cothran, who overruled it, giving leave at the same time to the defendant to answer over. In due time the answer was put in, the defendant, however, filing exceptions to the decree overruling the demurrer. The case was finally heard by Judge Witherspoon, who pronounced judgment in favor of the plaintiff. To that judgment several exceptions were filed, and now the appeal comes up upon these exceptions, and the exceptions to the decree of Judge Cothran, which decree the appellant seeks to review, with the final judgment of Judge Witherspoon.

The first matter before us, therefore, in order, is the decree of Judge Cothran. The defendant excepts to this decree upon but one ground—or rather his exceptions may be condensed into one—as they present substantially but one question, which is, Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? the specifications being, that the complaint failed to aver, that the suit was brought by the plaintiff "as," or in the capacity of administrator; also, that the deceased died possessed of the chose in action; also, that the plaintiff as administrator was the owner and holder thereof; also, to whom the money claimed or sued for, was due; also, that the will of the testator had been admitted to probate. It is apparent that the complaint was not framed with that precision and minute accuracy which perhaps the old form of pleadings required, and which it would be best to observe even under the new, so as to prevent delay, prolonged litigation and technical controversies, yet, under the liberal spirit of the code, which looks more to substance than to mere form, we think that the decree overruling the demurrer was free from error.

plaint in the inverse *order in which they are presented, the first to be considered is, the objection that there was no averment that the will of the testator had been admitted to probate. The averment on this subject was, that the plaintiff had been appointed administrator with the will annexed, by the Probate Court of Richland county. This we think includes an averment of all that was necessary to warrant the Probate judge to make this appointment; and no authority need be cited to the point, that Probate judge could not have granted the letters prior to the probate of the will before him. All that was necessary to entitle the plaintiff to exercise and be clothed with the rights and powers of administrator, was a legal appointment as such by the Probate judge. Of course the officer making the appointment had to be a Probate judge, and the will had to be proved before him, and the appointment could not have been made without these prerequisites. But, as well said by Judge Cothran, the Court of Probate is a constitutional court of record having jurisdiction especially as to the appointment of administrators, and when an appointment is alleged in the complaint, and admitted in the demurrer, the maxim omnia presumuntur rite applies. Upson v. Horn, 3 Strobh. 111 [49 Am. Dec. 633]; Abrams v. Moseley, 7 S. C. 151. This applies when there is nothing to show that the Probate judge has transcended his jurisdiction.

Next, it is objected that the complaint did not allege that plaintiff was the owner and holder of the bond, or to whom the money was to go when collected. The complaint did allege, however, that the bond and mortgage had been executed and delivered to the testator in his life-time; that said testator was now dead; that plaintiff was his administrator; and he prayed judgment of foreclosure, and that the proceeds of sale be applied to this bond. Upon the principle that where a certain status exists at one time, this is presumed to continue, until the contrary appears, the averments, that the bond and mortgage were executed and delivered to the testator in his life-time; that said testator was now dead; that these papers were executed by a citizen of this State covering real property in this State, and that the plaintiff had been appointed administrator in this State, carried with them prima facie the legal conclusion, that such administrator was the legal owner and holder thereof. Legal con*clusions are not expected to be alleged. In fact it is bad pleading to aver such conclusions. All that the complaint need contain is an allegation of the necessary facts leading to the conclusion. It is true, that it was essential to the maintenance of plaintiff's action, that he should be the legal owner and holder of the papers sued on, and, therefore, he should have alleged facts showing that he was such owner. This we think he has substantially done. Mr. Bliss says: "That an allegation that a bill or note is payable to or indorsed to the plaintiff, implies that he is the owner and holder, which need not be alleged." Citing Farmers and Mechanics Bank v. Wadsworth, 24 N. Y. 547. And further, "If the facts stated imply title, and he is still not the party in interest, it is matter of defense." Bliss Code Pl., § 176.

It is next objected that plaintiff did not sue as, or in the capacity of administrator. In the case of Bird v. Cotton, 57 Mo. 568, the learned judge who delivered the opinion said: "The capacity in which the plaintiff sued was not as clearly stated as should have been. But the petition styled the plaintiff as executor, stated that the note was made payable to their testator, averred his death, and then brought their letters into court and made profert of them. All these facts taken together showed unmistakably the capacity in which the plaintiff sued, and their right to sue, and enables any person to know what was intended." So we say here. "No form of words is absolutely essential to show the plaintiff's authority. The pleading is not demurrable if the facts appear substantially, or even obscurely, provided it appear. But the true way is to allege directly the death of the decedent, that letters of administration upon the estate, or testamentary, as the case may be, were issued to the plaintiff upon a day named and by a court named, and that he is still acting as such administrator or executor." Bliss, § 265.

No doubt it is necessary that the character in which the plaintiff sues should appear in the complaint, but it seems that so this appears substantially in the body of the complaint, or in the complaint taken as a whole, this will be sufficient. True, the defendant should not be taken by surprise. He has the right *too to know, whether he is called upon by the proper party, but it would be trifling with justice to permit a party to evade the payment of a just debt on the alleged ground, that his creditor has not stated in terms that he is the owner and holder of the note sued on, when all the allegations in the complaint show that he is such owner and holder; especially as the court no doubt will entertain a motion to make the complaint more precise where the defendant is doubtful on the subject.

The exceptions to Judge Witherspoon's decree raise two questions. 1. Has the plaintiff Dial in his representative character any title to, or interest in the bond in question? And 2. Whether the Circuit judge erred in directing the master to tax the costs and disbursements, and in adjudging a sale of the property, unless on or before January 1st, 1883, the defendant paid the debt as well as the costs and disbursements to be taxed by the master. We have no hesitation in affirming the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the first question. The testator died at his home in Massachusetts. At the time of his death he held this bond and mortgage on the defendant, at that time and since a resident of this State. The plaintiff has administered in this State with the will annexed. We hold that whosoever may be the real parties in interest as to said bond and mortgage, yet that this administrator may sue thereon. In fact the debt could not be collected in the courts of this State without administration. Ordinarily, it is true, that the real parties in interest must sue. But this does not apply to executors, administrators or trustees of an express trust. In every administration there are parties behind the administrator, who are more interested than he—creditors, distributees and legatees in case of will—and to require all these to be made parties in every suit by the administrator, besides destroying the symmetry and logic of the law in such cases, would also occasion interminable difficulties and delays in the settlement of estates.

As to the matter of taxing the costs and disbursements by the master under the order of the court, this presents some difficulty but we think the exception should be overruled. The act of assembly creating the office of master for Richland county, 16 *Stat. 609, invests the master with all the powers, &c., which formerly belonged to masters and commissioners in equity under the act of 1840, not inconsistent with the code. Now the sixth section of the act of 1840, provided, that masters in equity shall attend the sittings of the Court of Equity, &c., "and they shall also, without order, tax the costs of any suit in said court upon application of any party thereto, after due notice to the adverse party." The act creating the master for Richland was approved March 22d, 1878. At that time there was nothing in the code inconsistent with the above provision of the act of 1840.

It is true the code then provided by section 337 (old), that the clerk should insert in the judgment the costs and disbursements; and this section is still retained since the fee bill has been amended, or rather substituted, by a new one by the act of 1880, (17 Stat. 303,) but it is nowhere stated that the costs and disbursements shall be taxed by the clerk exclusively. The clerk is to insert in the entry of judgment, on application of the prevailing party, upon five days' notice, &c., the sum of the allowances for costs as provided in the code, the necessary disbursements, &c., and the clerk alone can insert in the judgment these costs; but there is nothing inconsistent with this duty of the clerk that the Circuit judge in an equity cause should, preparatory to an insertion into the judgment of the costs in such a cause, order the officer of the court created to aid the court in such cases, to estimate the costs and disbursements. In chancery cases the court has control of the question of costs. Code, § 323. Before judgment is entered for the costs the clerk would still have to insert them under the law prescribing his duty in that respect. All that can be said of the taxing by the master is, that it might be regarded as unnecessary work.

The point which is impliedly raised in the eighth ground of appeal cannot be sustained under the circumstances of this case. It is quite true that in actions for foreclosure, the proper course is to ascertain the amount due on the mortgage debt, either by a reference to the master, or other recognized "proper mode," before an order of sale is made, so that the defendant may have an opportunity of contesting the amount so ascertained.

*But in this case no issue was made in the pleading as to the amount due on the bond secured by the mortgage. The defendant did not deny his liability to some one for said amount; the Circuit judge might, therefore, without a reference to the master, have ascertained the amount; but regarding it doubtless as a mere matter of arithmetical calculation, he simply directed the master to make such calculation instead of making it himself, as he might have done. It is not like the case of Childs v. Frazee [15 S. C. 612] MS. Dec. No. 843, filed March 24th, 1880, where there was a failure to decide one of the issues made in the proceeding. We do not think, therefore, that this would furnish a sufficient ground for sending the case back, especially as it is not even now suggested that any error has been committed in making the calculation of the amount due on the mortgage debt.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Ex parte FISHER, Receiver.

GIBBES v. GREENVILLE AND COLUMBIA RAILROAD CO.

THE STATE, ex rel. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. SAME.

[1. Pledges ⊂⊃59.]

A corporation, S., lent $40,000 of its mortgage bonds to a corporation, G., to be used as collaterals for a note of G. in bank, and received $80,000 in mortgage bonds of G. as security for the return of such loaned bonds. Upon default in the payment of the note, the bank sold $35,000 of the S. bonds and canceled the note, turning over the other $5,000 in bonds, some coupons and a cash surplus, to the receiver of G. Afterwards S. sold the $80,000 G. bonds for a less amount than their own $35,000 bonds, sold by the bank, were worth. Held, that S. was the owner of the $5,000 of bonds, the coupons and the cash, and were entitled to recover them in specie from the receiver.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

It appears from the brief that the $35,000 of bonds of the South Carolina Railroad Company, when sold by the bank of Charleston in December, 1878, realized $10,787.48, less $29.83 expenses of sale, thereby extinguishing the note and interest, and leaving a surplus of $174.32. The $80,000 bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, were sold by Mr. Fisher, receiver, in February, 1881, for $22,580. It was in testimony that on December 31st, 1875, second mortgage bonds of the South Carolina Railroad Company were worth sixty-one and a half cents on the dollar; on February 25th, 1881, seventy to seventy-five cents; and that between those dates they varied in price from twenty-five cents to $1.20. During the same time, the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company's second mortgage bonds were not quoted, but a large quantity of them changed hands in April, 1880, at ten cents on the dollar.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

It would be well to determine in advance the issue before the court according to the pleading, and then consider the exceptions relating to the issue. The South Carolina Railroad Company, by the petition of Fisher, receiver, claims to be the owner of the bonds and coupons in controversy, and prays the order of court to have them delivered. There is no demand for the value of the bonds and coupons, or for a general accounting between the two corporations. The only issue is as to the ownership of the bonds and coupons in hands of the master. The South Carolina Railroad Company's claim to the bonds and coupons is *based upon a separate and independent transaction with the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, involving $40,000 South Carolina Railroad second mortgage bonds on the one part, and $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad second mortgage bonds on the other. I conclude and hold that any other transaction between these two corporations are matters outside the pleadings, and foreign to the issue before the court. Even if an accounting had been demanded, and the equities between the two corporations could be considered, the result would be unavailing, as both corporations are understood to be insolvent.

The receiver excepts to the master's report because the order of reference did not authorize the master to report his conclusions of law and fact. The order directing the master "to take testimony and report thereon to this court," certainly contemplated the finding of facts. Even if the master was not authorized to report his conclusions of law, such conclusions are not binding upon the court; and I cannot see how the receiver has been prejudiced.

Another ground of exception is, that the master erred in holding that he was limited to this transaction in excluding testimony as to other transactions, as well as the indebtedness of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to the South Carolina Railroad Company. This exception has been overruled, as it has already been decided that the only issue before the court is the transactions on December 31st, 1875, between the two corporations, involving $40,000 South Carolina Railroad bonds, and $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds. It does not, however, appear that the master considered himself so limited, or that he excluded any testimony offered as to other transactions between the two corporations. With all the testimony before him, the master says: "Although a great many interesting questions might arise as to how the whole matter should be adjusted so equitably as to affect unfairly interests of neither of the original parties to the transaction, I am unable to see why any of such matters should remain open for speculation or inquiry after the sale of the $80,000 of Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds by Receiver Fisher to Messrs. Bryan, Clyde and others."

*But it is claimed by Fisher, receiver, that in the sale of the $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds to Messrs. Bryan, Clyde and others, it was expressly stipulated that any controversy as to the claim of Fisher to these bonds, should be settled by due process of law, and it was well understood between all parties, that the ownership of these bonds was to be decided by the proceedings already instituted for that purpose. The petition of Fisher, receiver herein, was filed January 14th, 1881, and the memorandum of agreement and sale of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds was made February 26th, 1881. The agreement of sale states that the bonds and coupons were held for account of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad or its purchasers, and that a controversy was then pending as to the South Carolina Railroad bonds and coupons in the hands of the master. Neither party was willing to concede the right of the other, and it was agreed that the court should decide the ownership of the South Carolina Railroad bonds and coupons in this proceeding, then already instituted for that purpose.

In deciding the ownership, it becomes necessary for the court to determine the effect of said sale upon the claim of the South Carolina Railroad Company to the bonds and coupons in controversy. At the time the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company came into possession of the South Carolina Railroad bonds and coupons, Mr. Magrath was the president of both railroads. Mr. Magrath speaks of the loan of the $40,000 South Carolina Railroad bonds to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and that $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds were set aside and transferred to the sole control of the South Carolina Railroad Company, to be held until the South Carolina Railroad bonds were returned. These bonds were negotiable securities that pass by delivery. No time was fixed for return of the South Carolina railroad bonds, nor does it appear that the South Carolina Railroad Company ever made demand upon the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company for its bonds. I cannot see how, under the original contract between the two corporations, the South Carolina Railroad Company can claim the bonds and coupons in controversy without returning the $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds *held by it for the return of the South Carolina Railroad bonds. There being a claim on the one side in specie, in rem, there must be a return in specie. The South Carolina Railroad Company having exercised the right of ownership in the sale of the $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds, is now estopped from claiming or demanding the delivery of the bonds and coupons in the hands of the master.

It appears that the South Carolina Railroad Company realized from the sale of the $80,000 of Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds and coupons the sum of $22,580. This appears to be a great deal more than the market value of Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds at that time, and it is likely that the amount received induced Fisher, the receiver, to sell, leaving the effect of the sale to be decided by the court in this proceeding. I can discover nothing in the agreement of sale that can relieve the South Carolina Railroad Company of its obligation to return the $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad bonds before it can demand the return and delivery of its own bonds.

I find as a matter of fact, that on February 26th, 1881, John H. Fisher, receiver, sold to Messrs. Bryan, Clyde and others, $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company's second mortgage bonds and coupons held by the South Carolina Railroad Company for the return of $40,000 of its second mortgage bonds, loaned the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company December 31st, 1875.

I find as matter of law—

1. That by the sale of the $80,000 Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company's bonds and coupons, the South Carolina Railroad Company forfeited its right to the return of the South Carolina Railroad Company's bonds and coupons in hands of master, and is now estopped from claiming the same.

2. That the South Carolina Railroad bonds and coupons and cash in hands of the master, are assets to be applied to the mortgage debts due by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company according to priority.

It is ordered and adjudged that the exceptions of John H. Fisher, receiver, to the master's report, filed April 22d, 1882, *be overruled, and that said report be confirmed. It is further ordered that the petition of John H. Fisher, receiver herein, be dismissed with costs.

The petitioner appealed, but it is not necessary to state his exceptions.

Messrs. Mitchell & Smith and Melton, Clark & Muller, for appellant.

Messrs. Conner & Cheves, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. On December 31st, 1875, the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company borrowed from the South Carolina Railroad Company eighty of its second mortgage bonds of the face value of $40,000, and to secure the return of this loan the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company transferred to the South Carolina Railroad Company $80,000, face value, of its second mortgage bonds. This transaction was not evidenced by any formal written agreement, bond or other obligation; and its terms are only to be found in two letters—one of W. J. Magrath, who was at the time president of both companies, dated December 31st, 1875, addressed to J. H. Wilson, treasurer of the South Carolina Railroad Company, and the other, of C. H. Manson, acting treasurer of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, dated January 1st, 1876, likewise addressed to said Wilson.

In the letter of Magrath, he says: "In consideration of the loan this day made by the South Carolina Railroad Company of forty thousand dollars of the second mortgage bonds of said company, I hereby authorize you to set aside and transfer to the sole control of the said South Carolina Railroad Company second mortgage bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to the amount of eighty thousand dollars out of the securities of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad now in your possession. The same to be held by you until the second mort*gage bonds of the South Carolina Railroad are returned to the company." In the letter of Manson, he says: "I have yours enclosing copy of note of Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, $20,000, at thirty days from 31st ult., given to bank of Charleston, N. B. A. for loan, net proceeds, $19,725. For security for the collateral on the above—say $40,000 South Carolina Railroad second mortgage bonds, I observe, by authority of the president, you have laid aside $80,000 of our second mortgage bonds."

The testimony leaves no doubt on our minds that the object of this transaction was to enable the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to use the $40,000 of the second mortgage bonds of the South Carolina Railroad Company as collateral security for a note of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to the bank of Charleston for the sum of $20,000. Accordingly, they were so used; and the note of the bank having been reduced by successive payments and renewals to the sum of $10,000, and being past due and unpaid for some months, the bank, in December, 1878, sold seventy of the bonds held as collateral security for an amount which overpaid said notes by the sum of $174.32. This left in the hands of the bank, to the credit of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, ten of said bonds of the face value of $5,000, detached coupons to the amount of $8,175, and the small surplus of cash above mentioned.

After James Conner became receiver of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, he received from the bank these remaining bonds, coupons and cash; and being in doubt whether the same passed to the purchasers at the sale of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad, which had been previously made, or whether they belonged to the lien creditors of said company, reported all the facts to the court, when an order was passed directing them to be placed in the hands of the master, to be held by him subject to the further order of the court. Soon after, to wit, on January 14th, 1881, this petition was filed, in which Fisher, as receiver of the South Carolina Railroad Company, claimed the said bonds, coupons and cash as the property of said South Carolina Railroad Company.

*In the meantime, however, a controversy had arisen between Fisher, as receiver, and the purchasers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad as to the true amount of the bid of said purchasers, and while the same was pending in the Supreme Court of this State, to wit, on February 26th, 1881, an agreement was entered into whereby said controversy was settled, one of the terms of which settlement was that Fisher sold to the purchasers of said road, the said $80,000, of second mortgage bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, together with a large amount of other bonds of said company, of the same class, at a very full and fair price. In this agreement a stipulation was inserted that the present controversy, as to the ownership of the second mortgage bonds of the South Carolina Railroad Company, "is to be decided by the proceeding already instituted for that purpose," meaning the petition which is now under consideration.

It will be observed that the claim of the petitioner is not for a general accounting between these two corporations, but it is a claim for the specific bonds, coupons and cash which remained after the sale by the bank and the payment of the aforesaid note to the bank, as the property of the corporation of which he had been appointed receiver, which he, therefore, demands shall be delivered to him in specie. He is not suing for a debt, or for the value of property converted, but he is claiming the possession of certain specific property, of which he claims to be the rightful owner. The question, therefore, is as to the ownership of this particular property, consisting of bonds, coupons and cash, which, however, we will, for the sake of convenience, hereafter designate simply as bonds. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit judge that the various other transactions between these two companies have nothing whatever to do with the issue which we are now called upon to determine, but we cannot agree with him in the conclusion which he has reached as to the right of the petitioner to the possession of these bonds.

There can be no doubt that at one time the South Carolina Railroad Company was the owner of these bonds, and it is incumbent upon the respondents to show when and how this admitted title passed out of said company. It certainly did not *pass when the bonds were first delivered to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, for, by the express terms of the arrangement, they then passed as a loan, to be returned, and not by way of gift or sale. It is true that the purpose of the loan was to enable the borrower to use them in such a way as might necessitate the passing of the title out of the lender. But until they were so used, and the necessity for passing the title arose, the title remained in the lender. The mere fact of pledging the bonds to the bank could not pass the title out of the lender, for if the debt to the bank had been paid otherwise than by a sale of the bonds in question, unquestionably the bank would have been bound to return the bonds to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and that company would have been equally bound to return them to the South Carolina Railroad Company. That would not only be the legal effect, but it is manifestly what was intended by the parties, for it was understood by both parties at the time the bonds were borrowed, that they were borrowed for the express purpose of being pledged to the bank, and they were immediately so pledged.

Now if the effect of so pledging them was to be, or was intended to be, a transfer of the title, where would have been the necessity or propriety of the stipulation for their return? As we have said, there was a contingency upon which the title would pass, and that was when the necessity for it arose. But until that contingency did arise, the title never was intended to pass, and did not pass out of the lender. The South Carolina Railroad Company, knowing that the bonds were borrowed for the purpose of being pledged as collateral security for a debt of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to the bank, must be regarded as consenting that they should be so used; and further as authorizing the bank to take any steps that might become necessary to make the security available, by making an absolute sale of them, in part or in whole, whenever it became necessary so to do in order to effect the object for which they were loaned. The lender would, therefore, be estopped from disputing the title of the purchaser at such sale, made by its own authority, but where would be the ground upon which it could be said that the lender was estopped from claiming those of the *bonds which were not sold? The title to those which it was not necessary to sell to effect the purpose for which the loan was made, remained in the original owner, for, as we have seen, the mere fact of pledging the bonds to the bank did not affect the title.

It is said, however, that the petitioner is estopped from setting up a claim to the bonds in controversy by reason of the fact that he exercised the right of ownership over the $80,000 of bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company deposited with his company as security for the return of the $40,000 of bonds loaned to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, thus putting it beyond his power to return the $80,000 of bonds, which he is bound to do before he can claim the $40,000 of bonds or any part thereof; and this seems to be the ground upon which the Circuit judge rests his decree. According to our view of the matter the two companies stood towards each other in the relation of pledgeor and pledgee—the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company being the pledgeor and the South Carolina Railroad Company being the pledgee. The former, desiring to borrow the $40,000 of bonds, pledged to the latter $80,000 of second mortgage bonds to secure the return of the loan. Now what would be the rights and duties of the parties growing out of this relation? Suppose the loan had been of money instead of bonds, certainly the pledgee would have had the right, upon the non-payment of the money borrowed to have sold the things pledged, upon proper notice, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, and if such proceeds should have proved insufficient for the purpose he would have had a right of action for the balance left unpaid. It certainly could not be said that, by selling the things pledged he had forfeited his right to recover the unpaid balance. We do not see why the same principle should not apply to a pledge given to secure the return of borrowed bonds, as would apply to a pledge given to secure the return of borrowed money.

When, therefore, the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company failed to return the borrowed bonds within a reasonable time—no specific time being fixed by the contract—and certainly when it had become unable to do so, it was clearly the right of *the South Carolina Railroad Company, represented by the receiver, to sell the $80,000 of bonds pledged to it, and if the proceeds of such sale proved insufficient to re-imburse it for the value of so many of the borrowed bonds, the return of which, by the sale by the bank, had been rendered impossible, then it would have the same right to recover the remaining bonds, as it would have had to recover the balance of the money loaned, if the loan had been of money instead of bonds. The title to such remaining bonds never passed out of the South Carolina Railroad Company, and we are unable to see any reason why selling the thing pledged should operate as a forfeiture of such title, for, by selling, the pledgee did no more than it had a perfect right to do, so soon as the pledgeor had failed to return the thing borrowed within the time limited for that purpose, and, certainly, so soon as the pledgeor had put it beyond its power to return much the larger portion of the bonds which it had borrowed.

The testimony fully shows that the proceeds of the sale of the $80,000 of bonds was not sufficient to pay the value of that portion of the borrowed bonds which the borrower had put it beyond its power to return, and, therefore, the pledgee has, in our judgment, a perfect right to have the proceeds of the sale of the $80,000 of bonds applied to the payment of the value of that portion of the borrowed bonds which were sold by the bank, and such proceeds not being sufficient to pay the value of said bonds at the time of the sale of the $80,000 of bonds, it has a clear right to recover the possession of the bonds in controversy.

It is true that, properly, the sale of a pledge should be made at public auction, and after full notice, whereas the sale in this case was a private one; but the testimony leaves not a shadow of doubt that the sale was a most advantageous one, and that the bonds brought a much larger price than they would have done except for the peculiar circumstances under which they were sold, and while there was, perhaps, no formal notice to the pledgeor of the time and place of the sale, it is quite manifest that all parties really interested not only knew, and approved of the sale, but actually participated in it, either in person or by *attorney. Under these circumstances it would be idle to expect that any court would treat the sale as invalid, simply because certain formalities were not complied with, which, if they had been complied with, would, by the delays incident thereto, most likely have defeated the opportunity for making a most advantageous sale.

We are unable to see how the circumstance that the South Carolina Railroad Company was very largely interested in the stock of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, much relied upon in the argument for the respondents, can affect the question. That circumstance may have had, and doubtless did have very great influence in inducing the South Carolina Railroad Company to loan its bonds to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, but it cannot affect the legal relations between the two companies, growing out of this transaction. Though their interests were largely the same, yet they were not identical. They were, in law, two distinct persons, capable of contracting with each other just like any other two persons, and when they did so contract, their contract must be construed by the same legal principles which would govern in the construction of a contract between any two other persons.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect the views herein announced.

Before Aldrich, J., Aiken, September, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for appellant.

Messrs. Croft & Dunlap and W. T. Gary, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was commenced March 11th, 1878, to recover possession of twenty acres of land having upon it deposits of kaoline clay. Within the lines of the tract there is a small parcel of an acre and a half which was not claimed.

The question was one of title. Both parties claimed under one Edmund Morris. The plaintiffs' claim was as follows: (1) Deed from Edmund Morris to the Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Company, bearing date May 27th, 1857. This deed was not recorded until December 7th, 1877, and then without any indorsement of the auditor of the county upon it. (2) Judgment of Harrison, assignee, against the Porcelain Manufacturing Company, lodged in Aiken county, September 10th, 1877, and also that of H. W. & J. L. Addison against the same, October 4th, 1877. Under these judgments the land was levied December 11th, 1877, and sold by the sheriff of Aiken county *as the property of the said company on salesday of January, 1878, and bid off by the plaintiffs, to whom the sheriff executed a deed January 17th, 1878, which was recorded the next day.

The defendant Huckabee put in evidence a quit-claim deed for the premises from the said Edmund Morris, bearing date September 1st, 1877, which was recorded the first time, December 20th, 1877, without having the indorsement of the auditor upon it, and on the day of the trial of this case, September 21st, 1882, it was registered in the auditor's office and recorded again. The defendant Sharpton had himself made a party after the action had been commenced against Huckabee, and set up title to the premises under the statute of limitations; but he does not appeal, and it is not necessary to state particularly the nature of his claim.

The case came on for trial before Judge Aldrich and a jury. Besides the paper title of the parties above stated, it appeared that the defendant Huckabee had purchased the little parcel of an acre and a half, embraced within the lines of the twenty acres, from one Cliffe or his heirs, and his working it within the twenty acres, excited the attention of the officers of the Porcelain Company, and led to explanations. Schaub testified that, as superintendent of the company, he had, in 1875, "a conversation with defendant (Huckabee); said I understand you are digging on land of the company. He said he was not on the twenty acres, but on one and a half acres excepted; he was working on that parcel; but Huckabee was working on the twenty acres in the month of January, 1878." This witness also testified that he was superintendent of the Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Company for ten years, from 1867 to 1876; several times examined the twenty acres, which was seven or eight miles from the works of the company; bored for clay there in 1868; he got the deed from Morris and kept it in his desk until it was recorded; and never turned it over to Davies after he was elected president.

In the spring of 1877, Huckabee, by appointment, met Mr. Davies, the president, in Augusta, and proposed to refer the matter of title to Mr. Jenkins. On that occasion President Davies said that "the secretary, Schaub, had informed him that Huckabee was on the land of the company; but he had investi*gated, and finding no record he thought the company did not own the twenty acres." Davies had been elected president a short time before, and had not seen the papers, which, as before stated, were in possession of the secretary.

In August, 1877, John M. Cook, a civil engineer, was sent by the president to locate the land, who, taking with him Bauknight, the then superintendent of the company, went upon the land and informed Huckabee that they had come to make a survey of the twenty acres for the Porcelain Company. "Dr. Huckabee asked if they had any papers to make such survey by; and upon our saying no, Dr. H. (the defendant) refused to allow the survey to be made as a matter of business." It seems that soon after this incident, Huckabee went to Georgia, where Morris lived, and obtained from him for $40 the quit-claim deed above mentioned, of date September 1st, 1877. It also appeared that when the land was sold under the judgments against the Porcelain Company, and bought by the plaintiffs, in January, 1878, the defendant Huckabee caused public notice to be given that "he had a title to the twenty acres."

The plaintiffs presented a number of requests to charge, some of which were charged, and others refused or charged with modifications. Under the charge the jury found "for the defendant Huckabee the land in dispute." The plaintiffs appealed; but the parties, not being able to agree as to what was the charge, referred it to the judge to settle some particular point, and he reported his charge in full, embracing points upon which there had been no disagreement, as well as those specially referred to him. After the report of the charge, this court gave the appellants leave to file additional exceptions, made necessary, as was alleged, by the authentic charge as reported by the judge himself.

First. The plaintiffs' first request to charge was as follows: "That the deed from Morris to the Southern Porcelain Company [covering the land in dispute] being older than, and having been recorded before the deed from Morris to Huckabee, though recorded after the date of said last deed, takes priority in law over the same, which was recorded after the statutory time; and, *thence, that the plaintiffs have a better title to the said land than the defendant Huckabee, and must recover as against him." The judge charged: "This is good law if the deed to the company was recorded; but that is the very question of law submitted. Was it recorded? The requisites of the law were not complied with, and although the paper may have been placed in the record book, it is no record unless the prerequisites have been observed."

Second. The plaintiffs' second request to charge was "that the judgments under which Sheriff Holley sold the land in dispute to the plaintiffs, having become liens upon the said land before the deed of Morris to Huckabee was recorded, no subsequent laches of the Porcelain Company could defeat the lien of said judgments; and said sale transferred a title to the plaintiffs paramount to the title of the defendant Huckabee." The judge charged: "Admit this to be so; then the question for you is, Did the purchaser have notice of Huckabee's claim on the day of sale through Mr. Jordan? This becomes important in considering the question of notice. In addition, if the company's deed was not recorded, then there was no lien. If the deed of the company is not genuine, that is an end of the case. Did President Davies, by word or deed, induce or encourage the defendant to buy? If he did, defendant's title cannot now be disputed. Was the keeping of the deed so long from the record a fraud on the defendant?"

The plaintiffs' exceptions to the charge as settled, were: "1. That his Honor erred in modifying the first request to charge preferred by the plaintiffs by adding thereto. [See statement of charge, ante.] 2. That his Honor erred in modifying the second request preferred by plaintiffs by adding thereto, &c. [See statement of charge, ante.] 3. That his Honor erred in submitting to the jury this question: 'Was the keeping of the deed so long from the recording office a fraud on the defendant?' whereas, it is submitted that the non-recording of the deed cannot be termed fraud under the circumstances of this case. 4. That his Honor erred in settling his charge in this, that though the attorneys admitted that his Honor charged the plaintiffs' first request without qualification as stated in the *settlement, and refused to charge their second request in toto, yet his Honor, in settling the case, settles the same differently; whereas, said questions were not submitted to him for settlement."

In reference to the last ground of appeal, we need only say that we know of no authority for an appeal from the settlement of a case by the judge who heard it. The alleged error is certainly not one of law, of which we have cognizance. There must be some final arbiter, and an end of controversy. The judge who heard the cause must be supposed to know better than any one else what he charged. Rule 47 of the Circuit Court prescribes the manner in which a case shall be settled. The appellant must propose a case or exceptions, and serve a copy upon the opposite party. "And the party served may, within ten days thereafter, propose amendments thereto and serve a copy upon the party proposing the case, who may then, within four days thereafter, serve the opposite party with a notice that the case or exceptions with the proposed amendments will be submitted at a time and place to be specified in the notice to the judge or referee before whom the case was tried for settlement. The judge or referee shall thereupon correct and settle the case as he shall deem to consist with the truth of the facts." Shand's Manual 75.

These words would seem to give a more absolute discretion to the judge than is given by those in the corresponding rule (41) of the New York courts, which are as follows: "The judge or referee shall thereupon correct and settle the case according to the facts." And yet it has been held in that State that "a judge has the right to see that his charge, so far as it is necessary to be inserted in a case, is correctly presented, even though the parties have agreed upon it." Root v. King, 6 Cow. 569; Wait Anno. Code 842. We can only consider the charge as reported by the judge himself in settling the case.

As to the modification of the first request to charge. There is no subject upon which our law has been more confused and obscure than that of registry, both as to the effect of omission to record and of recording within the time as well as after the time prescribed by law. See the case of Steele v.

Mansell, decided in *the late Court of Errors by all the judges and chancellors of the State, 6 Rich. 437. As we understand it, that case finally settled that the old colonial registry act of 1698 and the forty-fifth section of the county court act of 1785 must be construed together, and that their joint operation produced three results: First. That a deed of land never recorded was not thereby absolutely void; but as between the parties was still good. Second. That if registered within the time prescribed by law, the registry had reference back to the date of the deed which took effect from its date; and, Third. That if registered after the time prescribed by law, it did not have reference back to the date of the deed, but took effect and was notice to all the world only from the date of its actual registry. See Barnwell v. Porteus, 2 Hill Eq. 219; Leger v. Doyle, 11 Rich. 118 [70 Am. Dec. 240]; Belk v. Massey, 11 Rich. 618; Youngblood v. Keadle, 1 Strobh. 121.

It is true that the act of 1843. "To amend the law in relation to recording mortgages," &c., contained no provision as to the effect of recording after the time required by law, but left absolute and unqualified the general enactment "That no mortgage of real estate shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, unless the same shall be recorded in the office of register mesne conveyances of the district wherein such real estate lies, within sixty days from the execution thereof." 11 Stat. 256. As might have been expected this act has received interpretation in accordance with its terms, making no provision for the registry after the time prescribed. See McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq. 223 [94 Am. Dec. 164], Williams v. Beard, 1 S. C. 322. Both of these were cases of mortgages. In the first the property was personalty and in the latter real estate. In that of McKnight v. Gordon, Justice Inglis pronounced a very full and carefully considered opinion, in the course of which he said: "But the positive rule of law established by this statute precludes the mortgagee, who has omitted to put his mortgage on record within the time limited, from interposing the estate which he acquired by it, in bar or derogation of the estate or claim for which one who is within the terms of its protection has paid."

But neither the act of 1843, nor its interpretation applies to *this case, which is in reference to absolute conveyances. That act dealt with the registration of mortgages only, and as we suppose is now absorbed into and repealed by the general registration act, passed December, 1876, of which we will speak hereafter. The case of Steele v. Mansell and those following it, cited above, were all in reference to absolute conveyances of land decided after the passage of the act of 1843, and with full knowledge of it. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Errors in Steele v. Mansell, Judge Wardlaw said: "Our registry law, before the act of 1843 concerning mortgages, was lamentably obscure and deficient, and that act has afforded no remedy in respect to absolute conveyances."

Taking then the law as to absolute conveyances to be as settled by Steele v. Mansell, and the other cases following it down to 1858, let us apply it to the paper title in this case, without at present any reference to the mutual allegations of actual notice.

The deed of Morris to the Porcelain Company was the oldest, having been executed in 1857, while that to Huckabee was not executed until 1877. The first was good against Morris without recording, but, as it was not recorded within the time limited, its operation as to third parties was in abeyance until registry, which was December 7th, 1877. But before that time, September 1st, 1877, Huckabee procured his deed from Morris, and if he had recorded it within the time limited (which was then forty days under act of 1876) he would have acquired priority over the deed of the company. It so happened, however, that he also was in default, and did not record his deed until December 20th, 1877, after the time limited by law; and applying the same rule to this deed, that was applied to the other, giving each vitality from its registry, the deed to the company had priority by thirteen days, this being recorded on the 7th and that on the 20th of December, execution of the second deed before the registry of the first, and recording after and out of time, being equivalent to execution after the first and recording within time as in Steele v. Mansell.

The exact point here ruled has never, so far as we know, arisen in the State before, but it seems to us to follow from the principles settled. The case of Steele v. Mansell differs from this *only in one particular; in that the second deed was executed after the first had been recorded, while in this it was made before, but not recorded until after and also after the time limited. The case which comes nearest to this, is that of Leger v. Doyle, supra. In that case the second deed was executed after the first deed was recorded, as in Steele v. Mansell, but the second deed was that of a sheriff under a sale which was made before the first deed was recorded. That comes very nearly to this case, and in delivering the judgment of the court Judge Wardlaw made a remark arguendo, which covers this case precisely. He said: "If the plaintiff (junior) had paid her bid, by giving her receipt to the sheriff or otherwise, and had taken the conveyance from him on the day of sale (before first deed was recorded), she could not have been hurt by the registration within six months thereafter, of any conveyance not executed within six months next preceding, provided the conveyance to herself had been duly recorded within six months." This was doubtless upon the principle announced by Judge Evans in the case of Barnwell v. Porteus, supra, as follows: "It is manifest that neither the plaintiff nor Rose has complied with the act of 1785, and but for the act of 1698, the unrecorded mortgage (senior) would take precedent of Rose's deed (junior); but as Rose has recorded his deed he has acquired a preference in pursuance of the act of 1698, * * * by which 'that sale, conveyance or mortgage of lands which shall be first recorded in the register's office,' &c., shall be taken, deemed, adjudged, allowed of and held to be the first sale, conveyance or mortgage, and be good, firm and substantial in all courts of judicature within South Carolina," &c.

The Circuit judge took this view, which was embodied in the first request to charge, but he made a modification. He said when the first request was read, "this is good law, if the deed to the company was recorded. But that is the very question of law submitted. Was it recorded? The requisites of the law are not complied with, and although the paper may have been placed in the record book, it is no record unless the prerequisites have been observed." Was this error? The question is, Was there wanting any indispensable prerequisite when the deed to the company was placed in the record book, on December 7th, 1877? It does *not clearly appear to what prerequisites reference was made by the judge. There is no doubt that the deed was not recorded within the time prescribed by law, but, as we have seen, that was not necessary to its validity from the date of registry. We hear nothing of any lack of proof as to its execution or probate.

It was, however, insisted at the bar that the deed was not legally admitted to record for the want of two prerequisites: First. That at the time it was spread upon the books of record, there was in force no law that authorized its registry; that the whole law of registration had been changed by the act of 1876, 16 Stat. 92, (re-enacted as section 1776 of the new general statutes,) which repealed all former laws upon the subject of registration. The view seems to be, that the act of 1876 does not provide for the registry of any deed in existence at the time it was passed, and yet repeals all other laws upon the subject, leaving the recording of such deeds entirely unprovided for. We cannot adopt this construction. The act of 1876, so far as it touches the point in question, is as follows: "That all deeds of land delivered or executed on and after January 1st, 1877, shall be valid so as to affect from the time of such delivery or execution the right of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only when recorded within forty days from the time of such delivery or execution," and went on to declare, "that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be and the same are hereby repealed."

This act, by its very terms, only relates to the registry of deeds executed after January, 1877, and as the deed to the Porcelain Company was executed long before that time, it is clear that its registry was not provided for by the act; but it is not at all clear that the act repealed generally all other laws on the subject. On the contrary, the repeal was expressly limited to such as were "inconsistent with it." The laws then in force providing for the registry of deeds executed before January, 1877, were not inconsistent with it, but by its very terms were outside of it, and therefore not repealed by it. There is nothing in the act of 1876 which made the registry in 1877 of the deed to the company executed in 1857 illegal and void. We may say in passing, however, that the deed from Morris to Huckabee, *having been executed after January 1st, 1877, did fall within the provisions of the act of 1876, and the proviso thereof, which, in harmony with the principles announced in Steele v. Mansell, provides "that the above-mentioned deeds or instruments of writing, if recorded subsequent to the expiration of the said forty days, shall be valid, to affect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, only from the date of such record," &c.

Second. But it is further contended that the deed to the company was placed in the record by the register in violation of this duty, because he did so before requiring the indorsement of the county auditor upon it, and therefore the registry was without authority and void. It is true, that at the time of the registry (1877), there was in the auditor's act a provision in these words, "And provided further, that each county auditor shall keep a record of all sales or conveyances of real property made in his county, in which he shall enter, in columns, the names of the purchaser and seller, the quantity of land conveyed, the location and price of the same, and therefrom correct the county duplicates annually; and, for the purpose of carrying out this provision, the clerks of court, &c., are required to have the indorsements of the county auditor on each and every deed of conveyance for real property that the same is on record in his office, before the same can be placed on record in the office of said clerk of court or register of mesne conveyances." There may be some doubt whether this provision was intended to embrace the registry of deeds executed before but recorded after its adoption; but, passing this, it is suggested that, rightly construed, it did not create a new and indispensable prerequisite to recording, so as to make registry without the auditor's indorsement absolutely void, but was rather directory—like the act of 1799, directing jury lists to be made out from the tax returns once in every three years in reference to which it was held that the requirement was purely directory to public officers in the discharge of their duty; and if the requirement was disregarded and the act was nevertheless done, such act was not thereby rendered void. State v. Massey, 2 Hill 379.

It is further urged that, as the provision

does not appear in *the act upon the subject of recording, but in that prescribing the duties of the county auditor, the manifest purpose of it, as the provision itself declares, was merely to assist the auditor in getting property correctly on the lists for the purposes of taxation. The argument is not without some force. The indorsement of the auditor has, so far as we can see, no connection with or effect upon the registry itself. But this is a new question, and as we do not think it necessarily involved in the decision of the case, we make no ruling upon it.

We find in the General Statutes, § 1778, among the requirements as to registry, another provision in these words: "All conveyances of real estate which have been recorded by the clerks of court and registers of mesne conveyances of the several counties since the fourteenth day of December, 1876, without the indorsement of the auditor of the county, are hereby declared to be as valid and binding, to all intents and purposes, as if the said conveyance had been indorsed by the auditor of the county thereon." This provision, as it reads, clearly dispenses with the necessity of the auditor's indorsement and legalizes the registry of all deeds without such indorsements, during the period from December 14th, 1876, to May 1st, 1882, when the general statutes went into operation; and that period includes the time of the registration of the deed to the company as well as of that to Huckabee.

It is, however, objected to this view, that the general statutes are only a codification of acts and joint resolutions previously passed; that the provision under consideration was only in another form the joint resolution upon the same subject previously passed by the legislature and approved June 9th, 1877, (16 Stat. 321,) and that therefore it must be construed, in respect to time, as if it had been passed at the date of the resolution (1877), and so construed does not cover the registry of deeds after June of that year. We do not feel authorized to make any such limitation as to time. The general statutes are more than a mere compilation of previous laws. They were passed by the legislature and approved by the governor in accordance with the requirements of the constitution as to the enactment of laws, and have the force of law then enacted. We can neither repeal *nor amend the provision nor fix a day for its operation different from that on which it became law. Its terms make no reference to the joint resolution or the date of its passage, but are general, and, speaking from the day the general statutes went into operation, cover the whole period back to "since 1876," the time indicated. We do not think that the registry of the deed from Morris to the Porcelain Company in December, 1877, was made void by the absence of the indorsement upon it of the county auditor for the time being.

The result is, no prerequisite to registry being wanting, that the paper record of the parties indicates priorities as follows: (1.) Judgment of Harrison, assignee, against the Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Company, September 10th, 1877. (2.) Deed of the said company from Morris, December 7th, 1877. (3.) Deed of Huckabee from Morris, December 20th, 1877. And (4.) Deed of the sheriff to the plaintiffs, R. McNamee, &c., purchasers under judgment of Harrison, assignee, and others, January 17th, 1878.

The case must go back for a new trial, and, as the point ruled will necessarily affect more or less the other questions in the case, we think it better that they should not be discussed at this time. Both parties should have an opportunity to have them considered without prejudice in reference to the conclusions herein announced.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside and the case remanded for a new trial.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, November, 1882.

This was an action by G. W. Dingle against David Mitchell, for the recovery of a house and lot in the city of Charleston. The opinion states the case, but as the case turned upon the alleged slavery of Mary Ann Conerway, the testimony upon this point, as found in the brief, is added. George H. Walter, witness for plaintiff, testified that "Mary Ann was free, I know; * * * knew her from childhood; always thought her free; does not know that her husband bought her." H. T. Graddick, for plaintiff, testified: "Have known her since the war; * * * do not know whether Mary Ann Conerway was a slave or not; always took her to be free."

Diana Murley, for defendant, testified that she was a sister-in-law of Scipio Stewart; "knew Mary Ann Conerway long before she was married; Mary Ann was a slave; she belonged to Mrs. Dibble; Scipio Stewart bought her."

The testimony also showed that Mary Ann lived upon the premises with her husband, Scipio, and after his death, continuously to her death, except possibly during the period of the war. There was no suggestion in the evidence, that her husband, Scipio, had taken her out of this State at any time.

The judge's charge was as follows:

If this property was Mrs. Conerway's, the plaintiff has a good title; if it was not hers, the plaintiff has not a good title. *The first title we have is in 1847, when it was bought by Scipio Stewart. There is no proof of a grant behind him, and without it that title cannot stand. But twenty years' possession is equivalent to a grant. I charge you that although that title is in the form of a trust deed, there being no trusts declared at all, except to Scipio Stewart, it was the same as a legal title to him out and out. It is a mistake to suppose that the trustee had any title at all. The statute of uses executed the use and vested the legal title in him; so that the legal title to that property was in Scipio Stewart, the very day the deed was delivered to Wilmot Walter.

His heirs-at-law are his widow and his son, William and Mary Ann Stewart, unless she was a slave. If she was a slave, she could not inherit. If you believe that she was a slave, her son William cannot inherit either. Neither of them could inherit, and it is perfectly clear that none of these parties could inherit, the proof being that all of his brothers and sisters were slaves; so that who were his legitimate heirs does not appear before the court. Their mother, Nancy, was a slave, but she outlived William, the son of Scipio, so that there can be no claim of minorities in the question at all, Nancy, his sister, being a slave alive until after William died. They were not the heirs even if they had been free, so long as the mother lived. If Mary Ann Stewart was a slave, neither she, nor her son William, nor any of these parties here could inherit, and the property belonged to any of his next of kin who were free, unless Mary Ann Stewart acquired title by possession. If she was free at the time the property descended to her she would receive one-third, and her son William two-thirds, and when her son died that property went to her. It would not go over to any of his kin, his mother living.

Was she free? According to the law of South Carolina, if you consider it proved that she was a slave, and that she was bought by her husband, then she could not be set free in this State. But if her husband bought her for the purpose of making her free, and if she enjoyed freedom for twenty years, then the law presumes that he did such acts as legitimately made her free. That is the presumption of the law.

If you believe that Scipio *Stewart bought his wife with the intention of her being free, and she enjoyed freedom for twenty years, the law presumes that he did all that would legitimately make her free, and he could have done so by taking her into another State. The law presumes that he did all those necessary acts after twenty years' enjoyment of freedom. If, therefore, you believe that he bought her with the intention of making her free, and that he carried out his purpose to make her free, then she could inherit the property. If that was not his purpose, and his purpose was to hold her as a slave, then she was still a slave, and could not have inherited from him at the time of his death.

After his death, we find upon record a deed, dated 1856, under which she claims that she holds that property in her own right. That deed did not give her any right at all, but it being put upon record, it was notice to all the heirs of Scipio Stewart that she was in possession of that property, holding it adversely. That is a deed declaring that she is in possession of the property holding it as her own, and in ten years from that time, under that deed, by her possession she would have lawful title against all the heirs of Scipio Stewart, unless minorities be proved. No minorities are proved in this case, because there is no proof here who are his heirs. The parties here before you are not his heirs under the law. If the children of slaves could inherit from him, then his son was his heir. I cannot see upon what ground they can claim to be heirs, when they claim that the son, who was a slave, could not inherit, when they were slaves themselves.

I charge you then that if there was any inheritance at all, that inheritance was in the son, and when he died the mother became sole heir and came into possession of all the property, and that the putting of that deed on record, in which she claimed title in herself to the whole property, was from that time notice of adverse possession to all the world. Under that notice the property would be hers in ten years, or in 1866, and a grant would be presumed in twenty years, or 1876. In any aspect of the case, the title as it now appears before the court seems to be a perfectly clear title in Mary Ann Stewart. Either as a free person she and her son inherited from Scipio Stewart, or, that not being the case, she has title by possession against his legiti*mate heirs whoever they may be. But the defendant alleges that there was a disability which would prevent the statute from running. He must prove the disability. He must prove that Stewart had heirs and that they were under disability all the time that Mary Ann was in possession.

From the facts now before me it appears that at the time of her death she had a perfect title to this property. As to the claim that she was not in possession all the time, she alleges in the deed that she was in possession, and all that knew her say that was where she lived up to the time of her death. There is no proof that that possession was ever broken. It seems to me that the plaintiff has a clear title to this property; that the defendant is not in lawful and peaceable possession as alleged, and that he is a mere trespasser, and that those who claim with him stood by and saw Mary Ann Stewart in possession of it and never interfered with her claim to the property until she disposed of it in a way that they did not approve of. If it was hers, she had the right to dispose of it as she saw fit. We have no right to interfere with that. The proof is that the defendant took possession about the beginning of this year; there is no proof as to what the premises are worth as rent during that time; you will have to determine that for yourselves.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for a lot of land on the west side of St. Phillips street, in the city of Charleston, known as No. 125. The question was purely one of title.

The plaintiff put in evidence: 1. A copy of deed of the premises from James K. Robinson to E. Wilmot Walter in trust for Scipio Stewart, his heirs and assigns forever, bearing date April 26th, 1847. 2. Copy of a deed of marriage settlement between Mary A. Stewart, widow of Scipio, with her second husband, Peter Conerway, which, after reciting that *George H. Walter, as trustee, was seized in fee of the lot, provided that he should still continue to hold the same "for the said Mary Ann, free from the control of any husband she may have, for the term of her natural life, and after her death then to her son William or his children, should he or any child of his be then living. But should he die before the said Mary Ann, then in trust for such uses and purposes as the said Mary Ann may by will or deed appoint." 3. Will of Mary Ann Conerway, December, 1881, giving her executors power to sell the lot—her son William having died before, in 1867, unmarried and without issue. 4. Deed of the executors of the will of Mary Ann to Dingle, as purchaser, April 7th, 1882.

Scipio Stewart was a free man of color, and lived with his wife, Mary Ann, who was also generally supposed to be a free person of color; but there was testimony tending to show that Mary Ann was originally a slave, and that many years ago (the precise time does not appear) she was purchased by her husband, Scipio. It is certain that as husband and wife they went into possession of the lot soon after it was purchased from Robinson, in 1847, and lived there as free persons of color until Scipio died intestate, in 1852, leaving as his widow the said Mary Ann, and her son William, who claimed the lot and occupied it until the death of Mary Ann, in 1881, William, the son, having previously died without wife or children. Mary Ann left a will, authorizing her executors to sell the lot, which they did, and at their sale the plaintiff, G. W. Dingle, became the purchaser and now claims the same through the said Mary Ann.

It seems that Scipio Stewart had sisters, who were slaves. The defendant, Mitchell, is one of the children of the sister Nancy, and he and his mother, now deceased, were both born slaves. The said Mitchell, after the death of Mary Ann, having in some way or other obtained possession of the said lot, now claims it as one of the heirs-at-law of Scipio Stewart, who died thirty years ago.

The case came on for trial before Judge Pressley, who refused a motion for non-suit, and, under his charge, the jury found for the plaintiff, Dingle. The defendant appeals to the court upon the following exceptions:

*1. "Because his Honor erred in admitting in evidence copies of the following deeds without proof of the loss of the originals, viz.: A deed from James K. Robinson to E. Wilmot Walter in trust for Scipio Stewart. A deed from Mary Ann Stewart and Peter Conerway to George H. Walter.

2. "Because his Honor erred in not granting a non-suit on the ground that the plaintiff had not traced his title back to a grant from the State nor to a common source, as asked for by the defendant.

3. "Because his Honor erred in ruling that Mary Ann Stewart had been in possession of the premises for twenty years when there was no evidence to prove the same.

4. "Because Mary Ann Stewart, if she had title at all, acquired it as heir of Scipio Stewart, and there was no proof that she was ever married to the said Scipio Stewart, and his Honor erred in not so ruling.

5. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury that if they believed Scipio Stewart was a free person of color and Mary Ann a slave, they could not find a verdict for the plaintiff, as a slave could not own property in his own right, nor could he hold adverse possession against the world.

6. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury that if they believed Scipio Stewart was a free person of color and Mary Ann a slave, William Stewart, their child, was illegitimate, and took nothing at his father's death.

7. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury that the Legislature of this State had made no provision for the issue of a free person of color and a slave; but that the Legislature has made provision for the issue of slaves, whereby they may inherit their ancestors' property.

8. "Because the plaintiff's case was fatally defective, in that Scipio Stewart was a free person of color; Mary Ann, who claimed to be his wife, a slave, and neither Mary Ann nor her son, William, could take property under the statute of distributions of this State. That the sisters and brothers of Scipio Stewart, at his death, were his next of kin and lawful heirs, and if at the time they were laboring under a disability, and died laboring under said disability, leaving children, from whom the disability *was afterwards removed, they (the children of such sister or brother) became the legal heirs of such intestate, deceased, and his Honor erred in not so ruling.

9. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury on questions of fact and giving them his opinion thereof.

10. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'His (Scipio Stewart's) heirs-at-law are his widow and his son, William and Mary Ann Stewart, unless she was a slave. If she was a slave she could not inherit. If you believe that she was a slave, her son William cannot inherit either. Neither of them could inherit, and it is perfectly clear that none of these parties could inherit, the proof being that all of his brothers were slaves.' "

Exceptions 1 and 2 complain that the judge erred in not granting a non-suit; first, because there being no evidence of the loss of the originals, it was error to admit in evidence the deed from Robinson to Walter in trust for Scipio Stewart, and the marriage settlement of Mary Ann Stewart and Peter Conerway; and second, for the reason that the plaintiff did not prove a perfect title or trace it back to a common source, from which the defendant also claimed. The objection as to the proof of the deeds does not touch the merits of the case, for we suppose there can be no doubt, that the deeds were executed as they appeared recorded. The presiding judge says "the deeds were put in evidence without objection at the time." The time to object was when they were offered and taken down by the judge as in evidence. If objection had been then made, we must assume that the proof of loss would have been made. This court has held that "what proof of loss of a written paper is sufficient to permit secondary evidence of its contents is, to a large extent, a question of fact to be decided by the judge, and his discretion will not be disturbed except in very rare cases." Oliver v. Sale, 17 S. C. 587.

As to the proof of title in Mary Ann, under whom the plaintiff claimed, the rule, as announced in the case of Young v. Watson, 1 McM. 449, is that "a plaintiff can only make out a perfect title by producing a grant or by proving such a possession as will give *title in himself or in some one from whom he derives title." The judge held that "she (Mary Ann) must trace title to a grant, but that twenty years' adverse possession, where there are no disabilities, is equivalent to a grant from the State, and the presumption is that the grant was at the beginning of her possession." Whether there had been such possession was a fact for the jury, and we cannot, therefore, say that the judge erred in refusing the nonsuit. We might add that the plaintiff did trace title to a common source. In our view of the case, certainly both Mary Ann and the defendant claimed by descent from the same person, Scipio Stewart, who undoubtedly had the legal title under the operation of the statute of uses.

Exceptions 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, in different forms, allege error on the part of the judge in refusing to charge as matter of law that plaintiff's title was fatally defective for the reason that Mary Ann, although purchased by her husband and living with him as his wife, continued to be, technically, a slave, and subject to all the disabilities of slavery, one of which was an inability to make a legal contract of marriage, and, as a consequence, to be either an heir herself or the mother of an heir. As the defendant suggests, suppose we assume this to be good law, the result would necessarily be that there could be no inheritance at all or title by the statute in this case, but the land would be forfeited to the State for the want of an owner. For it is undoubtedly true that the sisters of Scipio and their children, including the defendant, were also slaves and under the same disabilities.

It is replied, however, that there was a general emancipation of all slaves in 1865, and after that the legislature of the State passed certain laws legalizing the marriage of persons who were in bondage at the time they were contracted, and declaring that the issue of such marriage might inherit from their parents and from each other according to the statute of distributions (see Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 332). Taking then the statute of distributions as fixing the canons of descent applicable to these people, it is plain that the widow and child should inherit from Scipio in preference to his sisters or their children.

But it is earnestly insisted that the aforesaid enabling acts, when properly construed, refer to and embrace only marriages entered *into by parties who were at the time both slaves, and were not intended to include a marriage contracted between a female slave and a man of color who was at the time free, leaving such marriage, as in this case, illegal, and the issue thereof illegitimate. We do not so understand the acts referred to. The man Scipio, being a free man, was under no disability in respect to marriage. He had the right to make a legal contract of marriage and to have legitimate children, but upon the assumption that Mary Ann was still a slave, she was under a disability which touched Scipio's marriage with her, and made his child, William, illegitimate. But this was the very result the enabling acts were intended to prevent. No such distinction as that contended for can be found in the acts themselves, and such a narrow construction would violate their whole spirit and intent.

On the contrary, the terms of these acts show that they were intended to be as general as the mischief they remedied, and to apply as well to a marriage of a female slave with a free person of color as to cases where both parties were slaves. "Cohabitation, with reputation or recognition of the parties, shall be evidence of marriage in cases criminal and civil." * * * "Every colored child heretofore born is declared to be the legitimate child of his mother and also of his colored father if he is acknowledged by such a father," &c. 13 Stat. 291. As was said in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, supra: "This section is unquestionably retrospective, and applies to the dead as well as the living." In this view the enabling acts applied to the marriage of Mary Ann with Scipio even if she was a slave at the time, and made William the legitimate child of Scipio and capable of inheriting from him. At the death of Scipio, Mary Ann was entitled to one-third, and William, his son, to two-thirds of the lot. Upon the death of William, without wife or children, his mother inherited the whole interest, and the same passed under her will to the plaintiff.

But did Mary Ann necessarily remain a slave until the general emancipation of 1865, and under disability to take and hold property until the passage of the enabling act in 1872? Gen. Stat., § 2031. The judge charged the jury that if they believed "that Scipio Stewart bought his wife with the intention of her *being free, and she enjoyed freedom for twenty years, the law presumes that he did all that would, legitimately, make her free, and he could have done so by taking her into another State." Was this error? It is true that by the laws of force in this State in 1846 no slave could be emancipated in the State except by an act of the legislature. But it was held in the case of Willis v. Jolliffe, 11 Rich. Eq. 447, as late as 1860, "That there is nothing in the policy of the law of this State against a master taking his slaves to a free State and there emancipating them himself." It was not impossible, and the jury were told that if they believed that Scipio bought his wife with the intention of making her free, and she enjoyed freedom for twenty years, the law presumes that he did all that was necessary to make her free, and the presumption is that the grant was before her possession. We cannot say that this was error.

It was surely not error to leave it to the jury to decide whether the husband purchased his wife with the intention of making her a free woman. The court could not assume conclusively that he did the unnatural thing of buying his wife in order to keep her as his own property. It seems that at the very least, from 1846 to 1852, when Scipio died, Mary Ann lived with him as his wife, and thenceforward until she died, in 1881, being over thirty years, always treated and considered as a free person of color, and certainly after 1852 was in the quiet and exclusive possession of the premises in question. "After a lapse of twenty-eight years an executor's assent to a legacy of freedom to a slave was presumed." Bowers v. Newman, 2 McM. 486. "When a negro slave has been at large and acting as a freeman for more than twenty years a deed of manumission under the act of 1800 was presumed." "The court will presume whatever is necessary to give efficacy to long possession." Willingham v. Chick, 14 S. C. 103.

Considered with reference to the context, in which it was said, and without regard to the enabling act stated, we do not think the judge transcended the limit imposed by the constitution when he charged the jury as follows: "His (Scipio) heirs-at-law are his widow and his son William and Mary Ann Stewart, unless she was a slave. If she was a slave she could not inherit. If you believe she was a slave, her son William cannot inherit either. *Neither of them could inherit, and it is perfectly clear that none of these parties could inherit, the proof being that all of his brothers and sisters were slaves."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

GIBBES v. TOWN COUNCIL OF BEAUFORT.

[1. Ferries ⟸8.]

In action by the owners of a chartered ferry against defendant for damages for establishing another ferry, there being some evidence that the second ferry was within one mile of the first, the trial judge did not err in refusing a motion for non-suit based upon the want of proof of location.

[2. Action ⟸35; Penalties ⟸16.]

Where an act covers only part of a general subject and gives additional remedies by way of penalties in a particular case for the enforcement of an old common law right, such additional remedy is not exclusive, but the common law remedy still exists.

Quære. Where the legislature grants to a municipal corporation the usual powers and duties to make provision for the convenience and prosperity of its citizens, does a charter of a ferry granted to private individuals deprive such corporation of the right to establish a free ferry within a mile of the other, and how should the question be raised?

A municipal corporation is not liable to be sued in an action of tort for non-feasance or misfeasance of its officers, as e. g. for establishing a ferry to the injury of one already existing, unless expressly made so liable by statute.

Before Aldrich, J., Beaufort, October, 1882.

This was an appeal from an order refusing a motion for nonsuit. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. J. Verdier, for appellant.

Mr. W. J. Whipper, contra.

November 22d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

over Beaufort river known as "White *Hall ferry, leading from the town of Beaufort to Ladies island," and vested the same in Peter Gibbes and Peter Massay. The charter prescribes certain rates of toll, but there is nothing in it which indicates that the franchise was exclusive. 15 Stat. 523.

It seems that the ferry is within the corporate limits of the town of Beaufort, and in February, 1880, nearly a year before the expiration of the said charter, the town council of Beaufort, considering that "White Hall ferry is within the corporate limits of the town, and, therefore, a public highway of great importance to the business and property of the town and entitled to receive the same attention and expenditures as other highways created for the benefit of the public, and of right ought to be free for use and convenience without toll," &c., laid a tax for supporting a free crossing called "a free ferry" at that point, and established the same, limiting it, however, to passengers. The plaintiffs, considering this a violation of their chartered right, sued the town council for damages, in the nature of an action on the case for nuisance. The answer was a general denial of the plaintiffs' right to recover.

The case came on to be heard before Judge Aldrich, who refused a motion for a non-suit, and the case being submitted to the jury, they found for the plaintiffs $272.50 damages. The town of Beaufort appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. That the ferry established by the defendant being shown by the plaintiffs to have been a free ferry, it was not in violation of, or an infringement upon, the chartered rights of the plaintiffs. 2. That there being no evidence to show that the ferry established by the defendant was within one mile of the plaintiffs' ferry, the defendant's ferry was not an interference with the plaintiffs' chartered rights. 3. That the statute having prescribed a mode of redressing violations of plaintiffs' chartered rights, and having furnished a remedy, the plaintiffs were limited to that remedy and could not proceed otherwise. 4. That defendant being a municipal corporation, in the absence of a statute giving the action, the plaintiffs could not maintain their action of trespass against them.

eminent domain, *granted to the plaintiffs the franchise of White Hall ferry for seven years. That became a vested right—property. The utility of such a franchise lies in its exclusiveness, at least as against all unauthorized crossings within certain limits. The moment the right becomes common to all, the franchise substantially ceases to exist. Conway v. Taylor's Executor, 1 Black 623 [17 L. Ed. 191]. The question then arises, whether it was error of law on the part of the Circuit judge to refuse the motion for a non-suit; and upon that question the defendant makes the following points:

First. That the evidence was not sufficient to show that the passage, or free ferry across Beaufort river established by the defendants and complained of by the plaintiffs, was within the space of one mile from the White Hall ferry. Section 1124 of the general statutes is in these words: "If any person or persons, living within the space of one mile of any established ferry in any part of this State, shall, for any fee, toll or reward whatsoever, transport any person, goods or cattle from one side only to the other of that river, where any established ferry shall be kept, the person taking any such fee, toll or reward shall forfeit and pay to the proprietor of the ferry next adjacent to the place where such fare was taken up, treble the value of the fee, toll or reward given, paid or promised, to be recovered by warrant, under the hand and seal of one trial justice, or be imprisoned in the county jail for a period not exceeding thirty days, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided," &c.

The terms of this act would seem to indicate that the inhibition as to a mile, relates to the residence, and not to the act of the offending party; but it is a principle of the common law, that "if a ferry is erected on a river, so near another ferry as to draw away its custom, it is a nuisance to the owner of the old one." 3 Bl. Com. 310. The rule as to the sufficiency of evidence is, that if there is any evidence of a fact, the case must go to the jury, whose province alone it is to judge of its sufficiency. It is true that the evidence as to the locus of the free ferry, was not as clear as it might have been, especially as that allegation was the very foundation of the plaintiffs' claim. But we think there was some evidence in the town council records, which were *in proof that the free crossing was established at or near the White Hall ferry "connecting the town of Beaufort with Ladies island." The report of the finance committee, upon which the crossing was established, so states in terms. Upon this point there was no error.

Second. The appellant further urges, that the non-suit should have been granted, on the ground that this action was not a proceeding for the penalties allowed by the statute above cited; that said statute declares the law and furnishes the remedy, and as this remedy in its nature superseded all others, the plaintiffs were bound to pursue it, and not having done so, should have been non-suited. It is true that this court has held, in reference to the agricultural lien act, that being a new law, the courts can not, for its violation, go beyond the remedy afforded by it or enforce any other. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 548. But we do not understand that this principle applies to an act which only covers part of a general subject, and only purports to give additional remedies by way of penalties in a particular case, for the enforcement of an old common law right. Our present law giving a penalty for exacting tolls, cited above, is very nearly identical with the old act of 1741, which, as the preamble shows, was intended not to repeal the old remedy by action, but to give an additional remedy in a particular state of facts mentioned. See 9 Stat., § 9, p. 123.

This view is confirmed by the practice of the courts. This act was in force in 1818, when the case of McGowen v. Stark, was decided. That was not a proceeding for the penalties allowed by the act, but an action on the case for damages, brought by a grantee of the franchise of a ferry against the proprietor of another ferry set up without authority. No question was made as to the legality of the action, although the case was stoutly contested. The plaintiff recovered large damages, the court holding that "the owner of a ferry established by the legislature, is protected in his right by the common law; and, therefore, if another set up a ferry without public authority near to his ferry, he may maintain an action on the case for a nuisance against him." 1 Nott & M. 387 [9 Am. Dec. 712], and note. We do not think *that the act excluded the plaintiffs from all remedy except that afforded by it.

Third. But the defendant corporation makes still another objection: that, not being authorized by statute, the action on the case for damages as for a nuisance cannot be maintained against the town of Beaufort for the act of its officers in opening a free passage across the river within its corporate limits. It seems to us that there is force in this point. The peculiarity of the case arises from the fact that the legislature granted to individuals the franchise of a ferry, within the limits of a town, to which, in the act of incorporation, it had already given the usual municipal powers and duties, to make provision for the convenience and prosperity of its citizens. The policy of the law in granting the franchise of a ferry, is not so much to secure the tolls allowed to the grantees, as to facilitate commerce, and to provide certain and safe transit for the public; to promote and not to obstruct the general convenience; and it can hardly be supposed that the legislature intended, in chartering this ferry, to repeal by implication the municipal powers it had already given in the act of incorporation, and as to which the incorporation was merely the agent of the legislature in governing that locality.

The State, in the charter of the ferry, did not expressly grant any exclusive privilege, and if the plaintiffs are entitled to them, it must be implied simply from the nature of the grant, and cannot be inferred from the words by which the grant was made. Whilst, as we have seen, under the general law, individuals may thereby be restrained from drawing off the tolls by another unauthorized ferry within the disfranchised limits; yet it does not follow that the mere grant of the charter amounted to such a contract with the grantees, as to prevent the State itself from granting another one to the injury of the first. See the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 536 [9 L. Ed. 773]; The Turnpike Company v. The State, 3 Wall. 211 [18 L. Ed. 180]. The principle announced by these cases seems to have been adopted into the statute law of the State of force at the time this charter was granted. It was provided that "no grant of a bridge, ferry or turnpike road, shall prevent the legislature from making further *grants of ferries, bridges or turnpike roads, within any distance of the same, whenever the convenience of the community may require such further grants. But every grant of a ferry, bridge or turnpike road shall exclude all other persons from erecting and keeping up any bridge, ferry or road which may reduce the profits of such chartered bridge, ferry or turnpike road, except for the individual use of the person erecting and keeping up such unchartered bridge, ferry or road, without the authority of the legislature expressed by the act." See Gen. Stat., 1872, ch. LXIII., § 74.

If the State itself could have established this free ferry, without impairing the obligation of any contract with the grantees, could not the municipal corporation of the town of Beaufort, as governmental agent of the State, within its limits, do the same? It has been held that, what the State constitutionally empowers a municipal corporation to do, may be considered as done by the State. Do the words in the act above cited, "authority of the legislature expressed by act," embrace the "authority" given to the town of Beaufort "expressed" in the act of incorporation? As far as we know this is a new question, and it seems to us that the proper way to have had it decided would have been by proceedings on the part of the grantees of the ferry charter for an injunction against the corporate authorities, praying that they might be enjoined from operating the free ferry established by them. Turnpike Company v. The State, 3 Wall. 211 [18 L. Ed. 180], supra.

But be that as it may, without ruling anything upon that subject, it is clear that this action for damages can not be maintained against the town of Beaufort. We regard it settled in this State, that a municipal corporation, instituted for the purpose of assisting the State in the conduct of local civil government, is not liable to be sued in an action of tort for non-feasance or misfeasance of its officers in regard to their public duties, unless expressly made so liable by statute. White v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill 572; Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 290; Black v. City of Columbia, 19 Id. 412 [45 Am. Rep. 785]; Young v. City Council of Charleston, ante, p. 116 [47 Am. Rep. 827].

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit court be reversed, and the complaint be dismissed.

*RENNEKER v. SOUTH CAROLINA RAILWAY COMPANY.

[1. Carriers ⊂⊃323.]

If plaintiff was injured through the negligence of defendant, yet plaintiff could not recover damages for such injury unless he himself observed proper care and caution under the circumstances.

[2. Carriers ⊂⊃348; Railroads ⊂⊃278.]

In order to fix liability for negligence upon the person at whose hands an injury has been received, the party injured must have exercised the care and caution of a prudent, reasonable man in possession of the ordinary senses and capacities of mankind. Proper care does not vary with the varying capacities or infirmities of men.

Railway companies, though held to a high degree of care, do not insure, under all circumstances, the safety of passengers or those seeking to become passengers; their liability is conditioned on the exercise by them of reasonable and proper care and caution.

Before Pressley, J., Orangeburg, October, 1882.

Action by John H. Renneker against the South Carolina Railway Company. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. F. Izlar and Mitchell & Smith, for appellant.

No argument contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action against the defendant corporation for damages on account of personal injuries to the plaintiff from falling off the railroad platform at Orangeburg on the night of February 8th, 1882, when he was seeking to enter the cars for Charleston; which injuries he alleged were caused "by the negligence of the company in and about the arranging, making, procuring and keeping suitable platforms and conveniences for the ingress and egress of passengers on said road, and in and about the lighting up the said road and platform, and the said conveniences for the ingress and egress of passengers for transportation on said road," &c. The defendant answered, denying all allegations of negligence; and affirming that the fall of the plaintiff, and "any injury he may *have received, was not in any way caused by or due to the negligence of the defendant or any of its servants, agents or employés; but, on the contrary, that such fall, and any injury received therefrom, was wholly due to and arose entirely from the carelessness, negligence and fault of the plaintiff himself, and from no other cause whatever."

The case came on for trial before Judge Pressley and a jury. Much testimony was offered on both sides; but it is not necessary for our present purpose to do more than state the leading facts in a general way. The down train passed Orangeburg after dark; and the night was dark and drizzly. The plaintiff went to the station before the time for the arrival of the train, and waited in the telegraph office and the ladies' waiting-room. Having a thousand-mile ticket, and hearing the signal for the approach of the train, he left the waiting-room and started to walk—with the other persons about to board the train—up the outside platform, passed the express freight, in the direction of the approaching train; and, while walking with Mr. Wannamaker, fell off the platform and was injured. He was taken up and cared for before the train actually arrived. The case turned upon the questions of fact: 1. Whether the platform was properly lighted. 2. Whether the express freight was improperly allowed to incumber it, &c. 3. Whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in leaving the waiting-room before the proper time, or in not exercising the care required of a reasonable man in possession of all his senses.

The defendant tendered twenty different requests to charge, some of which were refused by the judge, and others charged in the whole, or with modifications; but we need only refer to such rulings as were excepted to. The jury rendered a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff for $1,500, and the company appeals to this court upon eight exceptions, of which the last is as follows: "8. Because his Honor charged: 'If plaintiff was walking along beside Mr. Wannamaker, using his senses—that is, his eyesight—and was going along with the ordinary care that a person would naturally use, and fell off by a stumble or by the passage-way being too narrow, or from want of light, or anything of that sort, then that is not lack of ordinary care, *because different persons have different temperaments, and one person may do a thing safely which another man cannot. One man may walk a narrow plank with perfect safety, while many others could not. The company has no right to require extraordinary care from any one;' whereas, he should have charged that the company is not bound to allow for individual temperament, but that the plaintiff was bound to exercise all the care and precaution that would be required by any ordinary, average reasonable man."

We have not found it necessary to consider any of the grounds of appeal except the last one. In the view which the court takes, that will dispose of the case. It is undoubtedly true that the action of the plaintiff rests entirely upon the alleged negligence of the company; but it is, nevertheless, incumbent on him to show that he has not been guilty of contributory negligence; that is to say, that he observed proper care under the circumstances. Even upon the assumption that the defendant was negligent, the plaintiff could not recover if he contributed to the misfortune by his own negligence or want of ordinary care and caution. "Two things must concur to support the action; an obstruction in the road on the part of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care to avoid it on the part of the plaintiff." See Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East 62; Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439 [24 L. Ed. 506], and authorities therein collected; Richardson v. W. & M. R. R. Co., 8 Rich. 126; 2 Red. Rail. 194 and notes.

The judge charged this principle correctly, but he added: "If the plaintiff was going along using his senses—that is, his eyesight—with the ordinary care that a person would naturally use, and fell off by a stumble, then that is not lack of ordinary care because different persons have different temperaments, and one person may do a thing safely, which another man cannot. One man may walk a narrow plank with perfect safety, which many others could not do. The company has no right to require extraordinary care from any one." Was this error? While the statement of fact made may be perfectly true in the abstract, we think in the connection in which it was made, it might have been misunderstood by the jury, as authorizing them to charge to the *negligence of the company the result of any casualty on their platform, only provided the party suffering it was at the time using his senses, good or bad.

Is there not such a thing as a pure casualty, accidental, fortuitous, and without fault on the part of any one, so far as imperfect human knowledge can discover. And besides, what is proper caution, and by what rule is it to be determined? The rule is plain and unmistakable, but its application is often exceedingly difficult and unsatisfactory.

As Mr. Pierce in his book on Railroads, at page 312, states it, "The standard of negligence is so variable and even intangible, and sentiment and caprice are so apt to disturb the verdict of juries in charges of personal injury, that the corrective function of the court in supervising verdicts in such cases is essential to the administration of justice." Does the term "ordinary caution" mean no more than the use of the senses, without any regard to the infirmities of temperament, which is defined to be mental or bodily constitution? It is certainly very vague and uncertain to make proper care vary with the varying capacities or infirmities of men. When the rights and obligation of one party are made to turn upon the proper caution of another, it would seem that there should be some common standard by which to test the fact, and we know of none practicable, other than that of a prudent, reasonable man in possession of the ordinary senses and capacities. When arrangements are made suitable and proper for such persons, nothing more should be required, and one falling below this standard, either physically or mentally, should be cautious and prudent in proportion to such defects.

Railway companies, though held to a high degree of care, do not insure the safety of passengers or those seeking to become passengers under all circumstances; their liability is conditioned on the exercise of reasonable and proper care and caution. "Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The essence of the fault may lie in omission or commission. The duty is dic*tated and measured by the exigencies of the occasion." Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439 [24 L. Ed. 506]; Lake Shore & M. S. R. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Whitacre, 35 Ohio St. 627; Pierce Rail. 345 and authorities. In the case from Michigan it was held that "absentmindedness" was not a legal excuse for failing to observe the precaution of looking and listening before crossing a railroad track.

Mr. Redfield says: "In a recent English case (Crafter v. The Met. Railway Co., 12 Jur. (N. S.) 272,) the question of the degree of caution required of passenger carriers, is carefully considered. It is here said that in determining whether evidence of negligence has been given before the jury, the court must use the ordinary experience of life and consider whether the evidence of negligence be reasonable. And in commenting on the case (which was where the plaintiff fell upon a staircase in going from the platform into the street, in consequence, as he alleged, of the stairs being rendered slippery by reason of brass upon the edge of the steps and having no hand-rail upon the top of the banisters) learned judges declare that passengers are not entitled to have every precaution to insure safety which is possible to suggest after an accident has occurred." 2 Redf. Rail. 201.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NELSON & CO. v. GOOD.

[1. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸132, 139.]

Insolvency of the vendor of personal property, pendency of suits against him, the sale of all his property, and retention of possession of the goods sold, to all appearances as owner, constitute such strong evidence of fraud that they will be regarded as conclusive unless explained by the most satisfactory testimony, but are not presumptions of fraud irrebuttable by any evidence. Before Cothran, J., Greenville, November, 1882.

This was an action by Samuel A. Nelson & Co. and William Bryce & Co., judgment creditors of Warren S. Good, against said Good and Williams Cox, to set aside a sale of a stock of goods by Good to Cox.

The master's report was as follows:

The master to whom it was referred to take the testimony in the above-entitled cause, and to report the same together with his conclusions of fact, begs leave to report that he has held references, and from the evidence adduced and herewith filed he respectfully submits the following as his conclusions of fact, to wit:

1st. That the defendant W. S. Good was engaged in the mercantile business and purchased goods of the plaintiffs, for which he gave the notes on which judgments were obtained against him, as set forth in the complaint herein.

2d. That on December 18th, 1879, the defendant Williams Cox became surety for defendant Good on two notes, payable to the order of Butler, Clapp & Co., one of which was for $322.16 and the other for $324.14. The first became due on November 1st, 1880, and the latter on December 1st, 1880.

3d. That on February 28th, 1880, defendant Good, who knew he was insolvent, disposed of his entire stock of goods (amounting in value, at actual cost, to $531.40,) to defendant Cox to secure him against loss on account of his suretyship on said notes to Butler, Clapp & Co., and on the same day executed and delivered to defendant Cox a bill of sale to said stock of goods with an inventory of the same attached, which bill of sale and inventory were duly recorded on said date in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for the county aforesaid. That defendant Cox did not know that defendant Good was insolvent when he bought said stock of goods, and he would not have bought them had he not been surety on said notes.

*4th. That defendant Cox never took possession of said stock of goods, but employed defendant Good, who is his son-in-law, as his agent to carry on and manage the business, and authorized him to sell said stock of goods and to buy other goods in order that he might close up the business without sacrificing the original stock, and agreed to pay defendant Good for his services a salary of $400 a year out of the proceeds of the sales of said stock of goods. That, in pursuance thereof, defendant Good remained in charge of said stock of goods, bought other goods on time as agent, sold and disposed of the same, and about the middle of April, 1881, closed out the business. That defendant Good, as agent as aforesaid, had sole charge of the business and never made any statements of the same to defendant Cox, nor did defendant Cox ever ask for or require of him a statement, and it does not appear that he took any interest in the same and knew nothing of the management thereof, nor of the profits or losses, nor of the debts incurred on account of the same, but left the whole matter to defendant Good, he, the said Cox, being a farmer, with very little business capacity and experience.

5th. That no notice was given by advertisement, or otherwise, of the change of the business, when defendant Good became the agent of defendant Cox. There was no sign then nor before over the store-house, and externally there was nothing to show that any change had been made. That on the ledger kept by defendant Good from 1876 to the time he closed out the business, as agent, as aforesaid, there is an account kept of goods purchased by defendant Cox, and various amounts of cash and cotton are placed to his credit, and there is no change in the mode of keeping said account after the stock of goods were sold to defendant Cox, from that prior to the same, nor are there any changes made in the mode of keeping said books as to the general business done before or after that time.

6th. That while defendant Good was acting as agent for defendant Cox, his clerk, Norman Good, signed two receipts dated September 7th, 1880, in the name of W. S. Good, for goods purchased on account.

7th. That on June 23d, 1880, defendant

Good made his return *under oath to the county auditor, in which he included among other items of personal property, by and with an understanding with defendant Cox, goods, merchandise, &c., to the value of $400, and on the same day, and at the same time, defendant Cox made his return to said auditor, and did not include any goods, merchandise, &c. That on June 21st, 1881, defendant Cox made another return under oath to said auditor, in which he did not include any goods, merchandise, &c.

8th. That on December 1st, 1880, the sheriff levied on said stock of goods, and about three or four weeks prior to that date, defendant Good said that said stock of goods were worth not less than $1,500, and spoke of them as his goods.

9th. That on December 12th, 1879, defendant Good purchased from his wife the house and lot in which they lived, and paid her $500 in cash for it, which he mortgaged to Ferguson & Miller, merchants in this place, (on the same day that he executed and delivered the said bill of sale of said stock of goods to defendant Cox,) for $475, to secure to them a debt of $326, and they were to pay him the difference in money, which they have not done.

10th. That on page 481, in the day book kept by defendant Good, while in business for himself, and as agent for defendant Cox, there is an entry made of "W. S. Good, Agt., commenced business at Marietta, S. C., February 28th, 1880," which has the appearance of having been originally 1881 and having been changed to 1880, and the same entry is made on the back of said book, the date and month of which appear to have been altered, and also another entry of "W. S. Good commenced business at Marietta, S. C., April 8th, 1876," which appears to have been originally 1879. The same entries are made in the back of said ledger, and they have not been changed.

11th. That on September 5th, 1879, defendant Good made and delivered to Johnston, Crews & Co. his two promissory notes, one for $283.88 and the other for $88.57; the first became due on November 15th, 1879, and the latter on January 15th, 1880, and on November 14th, 1879, he gave the said Johnston, Crews & Co. another promissory note for $211.22, payable sixty days after date. That no part of said notes were paid with the exception of $40, and suit was commenced on same on March 8th, 1880, *and judgment was obtained thereon by default against defendant Good on April 27th, 1880, for $556.63.

12th. That on September 17th, 1878, defendant Good made and delivered to William C. Browning & Co. his promissory note for $165.93, payable four months after date, on which he made sundry payments, but, failing to pay the whole amount due thereon, suit was commenced against him on February 21st, 1880, and judgment was obtained by default on March 15th, 1880, for $39.98.

13th. That defendant Cox has paid the said notes, for which he became surety, to the said Butler, Clapp & Co., out of the proceeds of sales from said stock of goods, with the exception of $110 paid out of his own money, and he also gave two notes to said Butler, Clapp & Co. on February 3d, 1881, for $250 each for goods bought of them by defendant Good, as his agent, which he has paid, and he has never received anything on account thereof from the sale of said stock of goods or from defendant Good except his account for goods gotten by himself, amounting to $193.86, and therefore he lost $416.14 by being involved in said business.

14th. That defendant Cox is a man of unquestionable character and integrity, and did not intend to perpetrate any fraud upon the plaintiffs.

All of which is respectfully submitted November 15th, 1882.

S. J. Douthit, Master.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This is a joint action by the plaintiffs above named, against the defendants, to set aside as fraudulent the sale of a stock of goods, by the first-named defendant to the latter, and to subject the same, or the value thereof, to the payment of certain executions of the plaintiffs heretofore obtained in this court against the defendant Good. The matter was referred to the master to take testimony and report his conclusions of fact to this court. Pursuant to said order the master has taken the testimony and made his report, to which exceptions have been filed on behalf of the plaintiffs and defendants. In the view which I have taken of the case, it will not be necessary to deal with these exceptions seriatim.

*The pivotal point of the whole case is the alleged fraudulent sale of the stock of goods by Good to Cox on February 28th, 1880. It appears from the evidence taken that Good was a merchant at that time, and previously doing business at Marietta; that Cox, his father-in-law, a farmer, without knowledge of mercantile affairs, lived in the neighborhood; that Butler, Broome & Clapp, merchants in the city of New York, were creditors of the said Good, and sent one of their traveling agents to look after his indebtedness to them; that said agent and Good went together to Cox's and induced him to become surety upon Good's indebtedness to Butler, Broome & Clapp; that Cox was ignorant at the time of Good's insolvency, but afterwards, upon discovery of that fact, he procured an assignment to himself, by sale, of the entire stock of goods, the inventoried value of which, at prime cost, being about $530; that Cox's liability on account of his suretyship was about $650; that the deed of bargain and sale of the stock of goods was recorded in the register's office at Greenville on the day that it was executed. By the terms of the trade Good was to retain possession of the goods, and by the addition of other goods to be paid for by Cox, the original stock of $530 worth, it was believed, could be advantageously disposed of; the Butler, Broome & Clapp indebtedness was to be paid off as well as the bills for additional merchandise, from the proceeds of sales, and Good was to receive wages for attending to the business, at the rate of $400 per annum. The Butler, Broome & Clapp indebtedness was thus paid off, excepting the sum of $110 paid by Cox, who sustained a total loss in connection with the said mercantile business of over $400.

It is scarcely necessary to cite authorities in support of the proposition that, in the absence of a bankrupt law, a debtor in failing circumstances has the right to prefer one bona fide creditor over another. Was Cox a bona fide creditor of Good? I think there can be no doubt of this.

But it is urged by the plaintiffs' counsel that the retention of possession of the stock of goods by Good, the vendor, after the sale to Cox, was per se fraudulent. Since the statutes of Elizabeth upon this subject, and the numerous decisions of our own courts, (Smith v. Henry, 2 Bailey 118; Maples v.

Maples, Rice *Eq. 300, and many others,) it is undeniable that, as an abstract proposition, this is true. But the relation of vendor and vendee must continue in order to bring the case within the operation of the statute. It does not forbid the vendor's becoming the agent of the vendee. In such case the vendor assumes a new character, and if the sale is for valuable and sufficient consideration, and is, in other respects, fair, open and bona fide, it ought to be upheld.

The testimony satisfies me that the relation of principal and agent subsisted between these defendants on and after February 28th, 1880, and I do not see enough in the case, so far certainly as Cox is concerned, to impeach the validity of the sale for the want of any of these qualities. Very much was said at bar as to the manner in which Good conducted the business after the sale to Cox, and justly said, as to the loose, negligent and unskillful manner in which it was done, not to use any harsher terms. Cox's loss of over $400, and he, the preferred creditor, sufficiently attests the unskillfulness (if not the infidelity) of the agent. But the testimony fails to show that Cox must suffer the consequences of this beyond the loss which he too has sustained. The conclusion reached seems to me to be well sustained by the reasoning in the leading case of Guignard v. Aldrich, 10 Rich. Eq. 253, which, in many of its features, bears a close resemblance to the case in hand.

Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the exceptions to the master's report be and they are hereby overruled; that the complaint herein be dismissed, and that the defendants have judgment against the plaintiffs for their costs.

The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in holding that the defendant Good was the bona fide agent of defendant Cox from February 28th, 1880, until the business was closed, and in overruling plaintiffs' exception to the master's report to that effect.

2. Because, even if the agency of Good were admitted, it is submitted that his Honor erred in holding that it could so change *his character of vendor in possession as to free the sale from fraud, specially when such retention of possession was part of the original transaction and agreement.

3. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in holding that there was a sufficient delivery of the goods to work a change of ownership.

4. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in not holding that the fraud of Good (which is virtually admitted by the decree) rendered the whole transaction void as against creditors.

5. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in not declaring the sale void, upon the ground, among others, that the retention of a salary by Good, to be paid him out of the stock of goods, was an interest in stock sufficient to render the transaction fraudulent.

6. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in holding that the agreement was, that said goods were to be bought and paid for by Cox, while the testimony shows that they were to be paid for out of the proceeds of the stock.

7. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in holding in substance that defendant Cox paid to Butler, Broome & Clapp $110 out of his own funds, while the testimony shows that Cox stood charged upon the books with a balance of $193 for goods bought by him out of the stock in controversy.

8. Because it is submitted that his Honor erred in overruling plaintiffs' exception to so much of the master's report as stated that defendant Cox had no intention "to perpetrate a fraud upon the plaintiffs," this being a question of law which the master had no right to decide.

9. Because it is submitted that the testimony and report of the master establish a clear case of a sale fraudulent and void per se.

10. Because it is submitted that, even if the transactions were capable of explanation under the decisions in this State, yet they have not been explained, and, therefore, the presumption of fraud has not been removed, and his Honor should have so decreed, and ordered the proceeds of the stock to be applied to the payment of the claims of plaintiffs.

Mr. Julius H. Heyward, for appellants.

Messrs. George Westmoreland and C. H. Orr, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The object of this action was to set aside a sale of a stock of goods, wares and merchandise made by the defendant Good to his co-defendant Cox, upon the ground of fraud. The circumstances relied upon by the plaintiffs, as badges of fraud, were: 1st. That Good was insolvent at the time of the sale, which was made soon after suits had been commenced against him, and embraced all of his property except that which was covered by a prior lien. 2d. That Good remained in possession of the property alleged to have been sold, and to all appearances continued business as before.

The master found, as matters of fact, that the insolvency of Good was not known to Cox at the time of the sale; that he paid full value for the goods sold; that the object of the sale was to provide for the payment of a debt upon which Cox was surety; that Cox had no intent to perpetrate a fraud in becoming the purchaser, and only bought to protect himself from liability as surety; that after the sale he employed Good as his agent to carry on the business, and that the result of the whole transaction was a loss to Cox of something over four hundred dollars. The Circuit judge concurred with the referee in these findings of *fact, and this is conclusive upon us, for it is manifest that there was testimony, which, if believed, would be sufficient to establish each and every one of these facts.

It is, however, earnestly contended on the part of the appellants, that these badges of fraud are conclusive evidence of the fraud charged, and are incapable of being explained or rebutted by evidence. It is not to be denied that there are authorities which seem to support this proposition, and very possibly if the question were res integra it might be regarded as the safer and better rule. But we think that the more recent cases, not only in England and in the Supreme Court of the United States, but also in this State, show that such a proposition cannot now be sustained; and that the true rule is that while these badges of fraud constitute such strong evidence that they will be regarded as conclusive, unless explained by the most satisfactory testimony, yet they do not constitute such a presumption of fraud as to be irrebuttable by any evidence. In other words, when these badges of fraud are established, and nothing more, the presumption of fraud then becomes conclusive, and no inquiry into the intention of the parties is necessary or admissible. But when satisfactory evidence is offered to explain them, it then becomes a question of fact, to be determined by that branch of the court invested with jurisdiction to determine issues of fact, whether under all the circumstances the transaction brought in question is bona fide or fraudulent.

The case of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587, may be regarded as the leading case in support of the proposition contended for by the appellants, but it is at least open to question whether the language used in that case is not susceptible of a construction more favorable to the rule which we have stated to be the correct rule, than to the proposition contended for by appellants. The language used by Buller, J., in that case is as follows: "This has been argued by the defendants' counsel as being a case in which the want of possession is only evidence of fraud, and that it was not such a circumstance per se as makes the transaction fraudulent in point of law; that is the point which we have considered, and we are all of opinion that if there be nothing but the absolute conveyance without the possession, that in point of law is *fraudulent." When it is considered that there was no evidence in the case tending to explain the continued possession of the vendor, the language above quoted may well be construed as meaning that the retention of possession by the vendor, where such continued possession is not satisfactorily explained, is not merely evidence from which a jury may find fraud, but that it is conclusive.

As has been well said by the learned annotator in his notes to Twyne's Case, 3 Rep. 8, at page 10 of 1 Sm. Lead. Cas.: "The words of Buller, J., were, 'if there be nothing but an absolute conveyance, without the possession, that in point of law is fraudulent,' by which his lordship may have intended that where there was nothing, i. e., no facts whatever appearing in the case except the absolute conveyance and the non-delivery, that then the inference of fraud would be so strong that a jury ought not to resist it. But it is very different in cases where, although the conveyance is absolute and the possession has not passed, still there are surrounding circumstances which show that a fraud may not have been intended; in such cases it cannot properly be said that there is nothing but an absolute conveyance without the possession." At all events it appears from the case of Martindale v. Booth, 3 Barn. & Ad. 498, and other cases cited in the same note, that the tendency of the latter cases in England is to hold that retention of possession by the vendor is not absolutely conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of fraud, which may be rebutted by testimony satisfactorily explaining such possession.

The case which is usually cited from the Supreme Court of the United States, in support of appellants' proposition, is Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch 310 [2 L. Ed. 118]. That case rests entirely upon the authority of Edwards v. Harben, supra, and is open to the same explanation, inasmuch as it does not appear that any evidence was offered tending to explain the continued possession of the vendor; and in the absence of such explanation the retention of possession would properly be considered conclusive evidence of fraud. But in addition to this, the authority of Hamilton v. Russell, as sustaining the proposition contended for, is certainly shaken, if not overthrown, by the subsequent case of Warner v. Norton, 20 How. 448 [15 L. Ed. 950], in which it was held that retention of *possession by the vendor of personal property is only prima facie, and not conclusive evidence of fraud, and may, therefore, be explained. The court, in speaking of the question now under consideration, uses this language: "Few questions in the law have given rise to a greater conflict of authority than the one now under consideration. But for many years past the tendency has been, in England and in the United States, to consider the question of fraud as a fact for the jury under the instructions of the court, and the weight of authority seems to be now, in this country, favorable to this position. Where possession of goods does not accompany the deed, it is prima facie fraudulent, but open to the circumstances of the transaction which may prove an innocent purpose."

The first case in our own State upon the subject, which we have been able to find, is De Bardeleben v. Beekman, 1 Desaus. 346, where it was held that if possession does not accompany the bill of sale, and the same be not recorded, it shall be void as to creditors, though there was no doubt that the parties intended no actual fraud. But in this case it seems to have been conceded that the vendor was allowed to retain possession for his own use and benefit, which, as will be seen from the discussion in the subsequent cases, is the very reason why retention of possession by the vendor is regarded as so strong a badge of fraud. This case, therefore, which seems to have escaped notice in the subsequent decisions, lends no support to the proposition contended for by the appellants.

In Kennedy v. Ross, 2 Mill Const. R. 125, it was held that retention of possession by the vendor was sufficient proof of fraud; but in that case there was no testimony offered tending to explain the continued possession of the vendor, and there is nothing in the case which warrants the conclusion that the court meant to decide that such possession was so absolutely conclusive of fraud as to be incapable of being explained by other testimony. The case of Kid v. Mitchell, 1 Nott & McC. 334 [9 Am. Dec. 702], can scarcely be said to have decided anything upon the point we are considering, though the case seems to imply that retention of possession by the vendor is not absolutely conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of fraud. In

Terry v. Belcher, 1 Bail. *568, the question was distinctly made and it was held that retention of possession by the vendor, after an absolute sale, is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence that the sale was fraudulent.

In Smith v. Henry, 2 Bail. 118, the court held that the most usual badges of fraud are retention of possession by the vendor, and the sale of the whole or the most valuable part of the debtor's property pending suits against him, and that when these two badges of fraud are found together they become conclusive and render the sale fraudulent per se unless explained by the most satisfactory evidence of the absence of any fraudulent intent. It is quite true that when this case came before the Court of Appeals a second time, (1 Hill 16,) Harper, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, did use language going very far towards sustaining the view that the retention of possession by the vendor, after an absolute sale, was absolutely conclusive of fraud, and not capable of being rebutted or explained by evidence; but that such was not the intention of the court is conclusively shown by the subsequent case of Jones & Briggs v. Blake and wife, 2 Hill Eq. 629, in which the opinion of the court was delivered by the same distinguished judge, holding that the retention of possession by the vendor may be explained by satisfactory evidence that the possession was retained under a bona fide agreement for hire, or that the possession of the vendor was in any other way consistent with a bona fide sale, and was not allowed for the purpose of securing to the vendor some "advantage in relation to property, profit or pecuniary advantage."

In Anderson v. Fuller, McMull. Eq. 27 [36 Am. Dec. 290], there was no satisfactory evidence explaining the continued possession of the vendor, and hence the presumption of fraud arose. In Fulmore v. Burrows, 2 Rich. Eq. 95, the decision turned upon the fact that the evidence was not sufficient to satisfy the chancellor that there was any bona fide agreement for hire, and, therefore, the retention of possession by the vendor not being satisfactorily explained, was sufficient to establish fraud. In Pringle v. Rhame, 10 Rich. 72 [67 Am. Dec. 569], it was held that the retention of possession by the vendor after an absolute sale may be explained by satisfactory *evidence that the possession was retained under a bona fide agreement for hire. In that case, Withers, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, undertakes to show that the case of Smith v. Henry, as reported in 1 Hill 16, when properly understood, does not support the idea that retention of possession by the vendor is so absolutely conclusive of fraud as to be incapable of explanation by evidence.

Applying the rule deduced from the foregoing authorities to the case in hand, we see no reason for interfering with the judgment below. The Circuit judge held, and correctly held, that, in the absence of a bankrupt law, an insolvent debtor has the right to prefer one bona fide creditor to another, and, therefore, the sale to Cox, although made pending suits against the debtor, being made for the purpose of paying a bona fide debt upon which the vendee was surety, constituted no sufficient evidence of fraud.

As to the retention of possession by Good, the Circuit judge held that it was sufficiently explained by the fact which he regarded as satisfactorily proved, that such possession was held merely as the agent of Cox, and not for the benefit of Good. If, as we have seen, the retention of possession by the vendor is susceptible of explanation by satisfactory evidence that the parties had assumed towards each other the relation of bailor and bailee for hire, we cannot see any reason why the fact that the parties have assumed the relation of principal and agent should not have a like affect. Indeed, after the agency has been satisfactorily proved, which, according to the findings both of the master and the Circuit judge, was done in this case, it may be doubted, under the cases of Brooks v. Penn, 2 Strobh. Eq. 113, and Lott v. DeGraffenried, 10 Rich. Eq. 346, whether it is proper to say that the vendor retained possession in this case, or whether it would not be more correct to say that the vendee, by his agent, took possession immediately upon the execution of the bill of sale.

After Cox became the owner of the goods he, of course, had a right to do with them as he pleased; and what more natural than that he, who had no experience in handling a stock of goods, should entrust them to the management of his son-in-law, *who had been engaged in that kind of business. For such management he, of course had a right to allow him whatever compensation he thought proper, and no one else had a right to complain. It is true that the amount allowed seemed to be greatly out of proportion to the services required of the agent, but while this was a circumstance to be weighed, and doubtless was given its due weight by the Circuit judge, in considering the question as to the bona fides of the transaction, yet it was not conclusive; and the Circuit judge having found that there was no fraud in the sale, we cannot say that there was any such error, as, under the well settled rules of this court, would warrant us in interfering with his conclusion.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

COCHRAN v. FILLANS.

[1. Trusts ⇐171.]

A widow residing with her child in the Island of Jersey, and being about to marry, transferred all her interest in the estate of her first husband, consisting of moneys, bonds, &c., in the hands of an administrator in South Carolina, to trustees in Jersey, without security, upon certain trusts in behalf of herself, and, after her death, in behalf of such issue as should attain their majority, or marry, &c., charged with a payment of half the income to her intended husband during life. Upon her death, leaving the said child, a minor, and her husband surviving, held, that the funds in South Carolina were not payable to the general guardian here of such infant, but to the trustees in Jersey under the marriage settlement.

Held, further, that the money being in this State, and the cestui que trust who may become entitled to it being an infant, the courts here cannot permit it to be paid over to the foreign trustees, until satisfied that they have given sufficient security in the Island of Jersey for its proper administration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hamilton v. Levy, 41 S. C. 384, 19 S. E. 610.

Before permitting property in this State belonging to an infant to be transferred beyond the limits of the State, the court must be satisfied (1) that the guardian has been regularly appointed according to the laws of the State in which the ward resides; (2) the fitness of such guardian for the appointment; and (3) that sufficient security has been given. And the same rule applies to cases of foreign trustees of an infant cestui que trust, who has property here.

[4. Trusts ⇐171.]

This principle depends, not upon the residence of the infant in this *State, but upon the responsibility of the courts of this State for the protection of property within their jurisdiction belonging to cestuis que trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson dissented so far as the opinion required trustees to give security.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, June, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Rutledge & Young, for the guardians and Fillans.

November 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. William C. Murray died many years ago, leaving a handsome property in this State. John Clarence Cochran, the plaintiff, was his executor, and in 1865, filed a bill in Charleston for the partition and settlement of his estate. James Ancrum Murray was one of the children of the testator, and before the estate was divided, married and died intestate, leaving in the Island of Jersey, in the kingdom of Great Britian, a widow, Victoria Isabella Murray, and one child, an infant, William James Murray. John C. Cochran thereupon administered upon the estate of the intestate, James A. Murray, in South Carolina, and filed a supplemental bill, in which the property of William C. Murray was ordered to be sold, and the share of the intestate, James A., was ascertained, of which his widow was entitled to one-third, and the child, William James, to two-thirds. John Robert Davey was appointed tuteur or guardian of the infant in the Island of Jersey, where a guardian is not required to give bond and security for the faithful discharge of his trust, but it seems that the electors, who recommend the guardian, are, in some respects, responsible for the manner in which he discharges the trust. Henry Edward Young and the said John Clarence Cochran were regularly appointed the guardians of said infant in this State, and as such gave bond for the faithful discharge of their trust.

A., married in *the Island of Jersey a second husband, Maitland Hall Fillans, of London, and, in contemplation of the event, the parties entered into an ante-nuptial marriage settlement, which, among other things, provided that the third part of the said Victoria Isabella in the estate of her former husband, James A. Murray, should be conveyed to George White and Edward Jones, also of Jersey, as trustees, upon certain trusts, to wit: "After the death of the said Victoria Murray, in case the said Maitland Hall Fillans should survive her, to pay one-half of the net income derived from said property to him during his natural life, and subject to such life-interest of the said Maitland Hall Fillans in the half thereof, to hold all and singular the said property in trust for all the children of the said Victoria Isabella Murray, who being a son or sons, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters, shall attain that age or marry. In case no child, being a son, shall attain such age, or, being a daughter, shall attain such age or marry, the trustees shall stand possessed of the said property upon such trusts and for such purposes as the said Victoria Isabella Murray shall declare by her last will," &c.

In 1877 the said Victoria Isabella died in Jersey, having first executed a writing in the nature of a last will and testament, but having the attestation of only two witnesses (sufficient at the place of her domicile to dispose of personal property), whereby she undertook to execute the power reserved to her in the articles of marriage settlement, by appointing her one-third of the estate of her first husband, James A. Murray, to go to her brother, John Robert Davey, and George White, as testamentary executors, upon certain trusts for her only son, the said William James Murray, her husband, Fillans, who survived her, and her own family, the Daveys.

This paper was admitted to probate both in Jersey and in the State of South Carolina.

This action was instituted by John Clarence Cochran, as administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Fillans, in this State, making all the claimants hereafter mentioned parties. The complaint states that the said administrator, having duly administered the estate, which is in his hands, invested in bonds, stocks, &c., amounting to about $20,- 000, is ready and desirous of paying *out the assets and closing the estate; but he cannot do so on account of the conflicting claims interposed, and he prays for the instruction of the court as to whom the money shall be paid. First. Edward Jones and George White, of Jersey, trustees in the marriage settlement, claim that the property of Victoria Isabella Fillans, specified in the said deed, shall be transferred to them, as trustees, by appointment of the owner, without being required to give security therefor, either in Jersey or in this State. Second. Henry Edward Young, as one of the guardians of the minor, William James Murray, appointed and under bond as such general guardian in this State, claims that the plaintiff be required to pay all the funds in his hands as administrator of Mrs. Fillans, so that the same shall vest in him and in the said administrator, as guardians aforesaid, with orders to pay one-half of the income arising therefrom to the said Maitland H. Fillans, during his life, and the other half to the use of the said infant, William James Murray, in such way as the court may direct. In this prayer, Maitland H. Fillans, who is entitled to one-half the income of the property during his life, concurs and prays that the fund shall not be transferred to the trustees in Jersey. John Robert Davey, the uncle of the ward, and claiming to be his guardian by appointment and order of the Royal Court of Jersey, joins in the prayer of the trustees, and prays that the funds shall be paid to them.

The cause was referred to Master Porter, who reported that "The court is authorized and bound to protect this trust fund against accident or abuse by requiring those who claim the possession, either as guardians or trustees, to give bond and security for the faithful discharge of their trusts." Upon exceptions to this report, Judge Kershaw held that the interest of the minor, William James Murray, was contingent upon his attaining twenty-one years of age, and ordered the funds paid to the trustees in Jersey, upon their entering into bond, with approved security, to the clerk of the court for Charleston county, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties as such trustees.

All the parties appeal to this court. The South Carolina guardians from so much of the decree (1) "as holds that the said Murray is now entitled to no part of this fund, whereas he has a *vested interest in the same, subject, it is true, to be divested in case of death under age, and subject to the life-estate of Maitland Hall Fillans in the one-half thereof, is entitled to the income arising therefrom; (2) and as directs that the fund be sent without the jurisdiction of the court, without an inquiry whether this will be to the interest of the said infant; (3) and as holds that John Robert Davey has been appointed, by proper proceedings, the guardian of the said Murray; (4) and as holds that the funds in the cause are held by the plaintiff, as administrator of James A. Murray, whereas he holds them as administrator cum testamentano nexo of Mrs. Fillans, in this State; and in all other respects that the decree be sustained."

And the trustees appeal from so much of the decree as holds as follows: 1. "That the said defendants should be required to give security before the trust funds are transferred and paid over to them, no such security having been required by the donor of the trust, and no charge of insolvency or unfitness being made or shown against the said trustee. 2. Because the Circuit judge erred in not holding that if the said defendants should give security, they should only give such sufficient security for the execution of the trust as should be required by any competent court of general equity jurisdiction in the Island of Jersey or kingdom of Great Britain, or as should be sufficient in the place of their domicile."

If these funds were now due and payable to the ward, William James Murray, there is little doubt that his general guardians would be entitled to receive them, although they had not been appointed such guardians with any reference to this particular fund. But the question goes back of that. The funds due the estate of James A. Murray, by his death, were divided into two parts—two-thirds of them belonged absolutely to the minor, William James Murray, as the only child of his father. There was no trust or limitation over upon this portion, and, as we understand it, no question is now made concerning it. The other one-third of the estate went, absolutely, under the statute of distributions, to Victoria Isabella, as widow, but before it was reduced into possession, she, being about to marry a second *husband, conveyed it to trustees, as stated in the articles of marriage settlement, and the contention is as to the right to the possession and control of this fund.

The plaintiff instituted this action as administrator in South Carolina, with the will annexed, of Victoria Isabella Fillans, but it must be observed, in the first place, that the fund cannot now pass under the paper in the nature of a will executed by Mrs. Fillans and called her will. At the time of her death she was a married woman, and, by the law of her domicile, incompetent to make a general will; but, if she had been competent, she could not thereby dispose of property which she had previously settled. It is true she had the right to execute a power if the circumstances existed in which the right was given; but the articles of marriage settlement had assigned the property to trustees upon such trusts as carried the whole interest, except in the single case of all her children dying before they attained the age of twenty-one years, in which event alone she had the right to appoint to new uses. "In case no child, being a son, shall attain such age, or, being a daughter, shall attain such age or marry, the trustees shall stand possessed of the said property upon such trusts and for such purposes as the said Victoria Isabella Murray shall declare by her last will."

There is one child still living, who may attain to the age of twenty-one years, and therefore her appointment to uses cannot now take effect, but the property falls under the provisions of the marriage settlement, which gives the legal estate to the trustees, who "shall stand possessed" of it under the trusts therein declared. In this view, it seems to us that the question whether the interest of William James Murray is vested or only contingent upon his attaining the age of twenty-one years, does not necessarily arise, for in either case the property cannot now be delivered to any guardian of the minor, but must be held by the trustees until he attains the age of twenty-one years, and then delivered to him as the only child of his mother; or, if he should not attain that age, then, as we suppose, be distributed according to the paper in the nature of a will executed by Mrs. Fillans, as in that case the event will have occurred in which she was authorized to appoint to uses.

*We agree with the Circuit judge that the absolute owner in her life-time, having conveyed this property to trustees for the purpose of carrying out certain trusts in contingencies which could not be foreseen, it should be transferred to those trustees to enable them to execute the said trusts. But the trustees are in the Island of Jersey, kingdom of Great Britain, while the property is here within the jurisdiction, and certainly, in one event, is going to a minor. Under these circumstances, will the court authorize the foreign trustees to receive the property and carry it beyond the jurisdiction; and if so, upon what terms and conditions?

In practice, our courts have relaxed what seems to have been the general rule against allowing such transfer, and, regarding themselves competent to do so, have ordered funds of infants under their control—that is to say, in the hands of executors or administrators—to be paid to guardians appointed and residing in other States. But in doing so the court takes every precaution to guard against abuse and loss to the infant, and for that purpose always requires a new appointment with bond and security in the jurisdiction, or at least a recognition of the foreign appointment upon proof here to be approved by the court of these things—First, the fact of a guardian having been regularly appointed according to the laws of the State in which the ward resides; secondly, the fitness of the guardian for the appointment; and, thirdly, whether sufficient security has been given. Ex parte Smith, 1 Hill Eq. 140; Ex parte Heard, 2 Hill Eq. 54; Ex parte Copeland, Rice Eq. 69. Judge Story, in his Conflict of Laws, § 504a, thus states the rule: "No foreign guardian can, virtute officii, exercise any right or powers or functions over the movable property of his ward which is situated in a different State or country from that in which he has obtained his letters of guardianship. But he must obtain new letters of guardianship from the local tribunals authorized to grant the same before he can exercise any rights or functions over the same," &c.

This being clearly the law as to foreign guardians, is there any reason why less should be required of foreign trustees appointed by the donor in her life-time without requiring *security? It is said that the donor had the right to receive this property herself without giving security, and, having that right, she could appoint another to receive it in her stead. The donor undoubtedly had that right before she executed the marriage settlement; but it must not be overlooked that she ceased to have that right the moment she executed the settlement, which introduced a new element, viz., that of a trust in behalf of an infant who cannot receive the funds until he attains the age of twenty-one years. It is this interest of the cestui que trust which, as it seems to us, makes it as much the duty of the court to secure these funds for the benefit of the infant as if the trustees had been appointed by the court in Jersey.

As Chancellor Dunkin said, in Ex parte Copeland, supra: "In the case of Morrison v. Toomer, decided recently by the Circuit Court in Charleston, it is said by the chancellor, 'the general doctrine and course of this court (equity) is well established; that it will not permit trust property to be removed out of the jurisdiction; and the trustee, who should knowingly and willingly permit this, would render himself liable to those who might be injured by his misconduct. * * * The court does sometimes permit trust property to be carried out of the jurisdiction, taking every possible precaution for the security of the cestui que trust. * * * Regarding the recent decisions on this subject as in some degree an innovation upon the practice of the court, it is not deemed expedient to extend them to cases where the reason does not manifestly exist. The application is always addressed to the sound discretion of the court. The presumption should always be against the removal of funds beyond the jurisdiction of the court; where the expediency or necessity is made clearly to appear, permission should be granted only on such terms as the nature of the case may require, or as experience may suggest to be necessary.'"

As we understand it, the practice of requiring security in such cases does not depend upon the domicile of the cestui que trust, or the manner in which his foreign guardian or trustee was appointed, but upon the view that the property being within the jurisdiction, the court is in some sense responsible for its safety, and will, therefore, not yield that control, except upon such *terms as will certainly secure and protect it. If Mrs. Fillans had created this same trust by will instead of by her marriage settlement, probate of the will and new administration in this State would have been necessary even for her executor to get possession here. Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 579 [37 Am. Rep. 737]; Patterson v. Pagan, 18 S. C. 584. We think that we cannot, according to the well-established principles of equity, authorize this fund to be carried beyond the jurisdiction without requiring security for its protection. See Ex parte Robert, 2 Strobh. Eq. 88.

But whilst the property is here, this is an English trust, to be executed by English trustees, and in behalf of persons who are resident in England, and it may be that it will be inconvenient for foreigners to give bond and security in this State for a sum so large, and particularly as it is a trust fund to be held probably for a number of years. These considerations have induced us to consider whether the purpose in view may not be accomplished by requiring that the trustees should give security in Jersey for the faithful administration of the trust. We have no right to make such an order. All that we can do is to control our own action according to the practice of this court and the well-established principles of equity. The Circuit decree is so far modified as to permit the trust fund to be paid over to the trustees whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Circuit Court that the trustees have given to the proper officers or court in the Island of Jersey good and sufficient security for the faithful administration of the trust declared in the deed of marriage settlement aforesaid. And in case such proof, to the satisfaction of the Circuit Court, is not offered, then that the trust funds be paid over only upon bond and security given in the county of Charleston as required by the Circuit decree.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified according to the conclusions herein announced, and in all other respects be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

it requires the trustees to give bond *before they can receive the estate in contest. If the trustees had been appointed by a foreign court, then the principle relied upon would apply, as the foreign appointment would give the trustees no rights here; but I know of no general principle or authoritative case which would warrant the court to apply this to trustees acting under a trust-deed executed between the parties in which no bond is required, unless a case is made in behalf of the cestui que trust showing danger to his interests, upon which the court might act.

Ex parte RAY.

[1. Homestead ⇦12.]

The right of homestead secured by the constitution and the several acts passed in pursuance thereof, is not an estate, but is a mere right of exemption; hence, the only effect of an assignment of homestead is to ascertain and designate what particular property is covered by such exemption, so that the same cannot be applied to the payment of debts. And this the claimant, a widow, has the right to have done, upon petition to the proper officer.

[2. Homestead ⇦150.]

The homestead laws do not affect the statute of distributions. The title to property is not changed by its being designated as a homestead for the family of one deceased, but such property remains subject to division under the statute of distributions.

and on February 1st, 1882, the re*spondent, who is his widow, filed her petition before the master praying that a homestead might be assigned to her. A. L. Armfield, to whom letters of administration upon the personal estate of the intestate had been granted, filed sundry objections to the granting of the prayer of said petition, all of which were overruled by the master, who issued a commission to certain persons therein named requiring them to set apart to the petitioner a homestead out of the real estate of said John Ray, as well as personal property of the value of not more than $500. In pursuance thereof, the commissioners made their return setting apart a portion of the land as a homestead and also certain personal property specifically mentioned in said return, and valued it at an amount not exceeding $500. To this return, the administrator filed sundry exceptions, all of which were overruled by the Circuit judge, and the return of the commissioners was confirmed.

The administrator appeals "on the grounds taken before the master, mainly on the ground that the decedent, John Ray, not being in debt at the time of his death only to a small extent, compared even with his personal property, his widow is not entitled to a homestead either of the real or personal estate, as against his heirs-at-law; that it is only as against debts that homesteads are allowed." Under our recent rule we can only consider the ground of appeal, which is specifically stated, which indeed seemed to be the only ground relied upon in the argument here.

To dispose of this case it would be quite sufficient for us to say that we have no legal evidence before us as to the amount of the indebtedness of the intestate. The statement made by the administrator in his objections filed before the master, though sworn to by him, is manifestly not sufficient, for at that time the time allowed by law for presenting claims against the estate of a decedent had not expired, and it would have been impossible for the administrator to know the amount of the indebtedness of his intestate. Indeed, he only ventures to give an estimate "according to his best information."

But waiving all this, and assuming the fact to be, as the ad*ministrator then supposed it to be, we are unable to see any ground upon which the appeal can be sustained. As we have held in Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C. 239, the right of homestead secured by the constitution and the several acts passed in pursuance thereof, is not an estate but is a mere right of exemption. Hence the only effect of an assignment of homestead is to ascertain and designate what particular property is covered by such exemption, so that the same cannot be applied to the payment of debts. The petitioner had the right to have so much of the property of her deceased husband as was exempt from being applied to the payment of his debts, whether they were large or small, specifically designated and set apart, so as to prevent the administrator or any one else from applying or subjecting the same to the payment of such debts.

What interest the administrator has in the matter, it is difficult for us to conceive. If there should prove to be a sufficient amount of property, over and above that set apart under these proceedings, to pay the debts of the intestate, what possible objections can the administrator have to the designation of the particular property which cannot be applied to the payment of such debts. But if, on the other hand, there should not be a sufficient amount left for the payment of the debts, then, as we understand the argument of the appellant, it was conceded, and as we think properly conceded, the exemption could be claimed. The real ground of complaint on the part of the appellant seems to be the apprehension that by the assignment of homestead to the widow the interests of the other heirs-at-law and distributees in the property so assigned, will be either defeated or in some way impaired. What interest the administrator has in this matter, at least so far as the real estate is concerned, it is difficult to understand. But as the administrator may be regarded as the representative of the distributees, and bound to protect their interests in the personal property, we will consider the question.

We do not understand the homestead laws as designed to alter or in any way affect the statute for the distribution of intestate's estates, and they do not even purport so to do. It is true that the legislature might, if so minded, make that, or any other *alteration, in the law regulating the distribution of an intestate's estate, but we see nothing in the homestead laws indicating any such intention. On the contrary, as we have said, the sole purpose of these laws was to exempt a certain amount of property from liability for debt, leaving the title to such property exactly where it was before, and only throwing around it a shield to protect it from the grasp of creditors. It seems to us, therefore, that the assignment of homestead in this case can have no other effect than to designate and set apart certain property of the intestate as exempt from being applied in any way to the payment of his debts leaving the title to such property just where it was before, and leaving the property so designated as exempt, as well as any other that may remain after the payment of the debts of the intestate, to be divided amongst the heirs-at-law and distributees according to the provisions of the statute of distributions.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court which is appealed from, be affirmed.

JONES v. COLUMBIA AND GREENVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

[1. Railroads ⟸406.]

The killing of stock by a railroad train being proved, the law presumes that the injury was done through the negligence of the railroad company, until the contrary is shown. This rule of law is unaffected by the recent statutes requiring stock to be kept enclosed.

[This case is also cited in Simkins v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 20 S. C. 261, without specific application.]

*This was an action by Thomas Jones against the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company commenced in a trial-justice's court, on March 23d, 1882, to recover the value of two hogs and one sheep, alleged to have been killed on the railway track by defendant's train.

The hogs were killed by a freight train in December, 1881, before Christmas, late in the evening, just before dark. The sheep was killed by a freight train in the evening, in January, 1882. The stock got out of plaintiff's pasture alongside of the railroad. The plaintiff did not report the killing to the railroad at the time.

In the case agreed upon, the following statement appears: "Defendant offered no testimony, the complaint served having failed to specify time, or place, or circumstance; and no notice of the stock-killing having been given the railroad company until the summons was served, at least two months after the sheep was killed. The defendant, during the time included, was running six or eight freight trains a day, and two passenger trains. Among so many trains after so long a time, it was impossible to discover by what train, engineer or conductor the alleged damage was done."

Judgment was rendered by the trial-justice in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appealed to the Circuit Court, and trial was had de novo before his Honor, Judge Wallace, at the February Term, 1883, the testimony on the trial being read to the jury. The verdict was for the plaintiff, for seven dollars and costs.

Notice of appeal was duly given, and exceptions filed, and the case came up to this court on the following grounds of appeal:

1. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that, the killing of stock by the company's train being proved, the law presumes that the injury was done by the negligence of the railway; that this has been the law of South Carolina ever since Danner's Case, and that the stock law has not removed this presumption.

2. Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge that where the law forbids the stock owner to permit his stock "to run at large beyond the limits of his own land, or the lands leased, *occupied or controlled by him," and where there is no law compelling the railway company to fence its track, if the cattle are at large or have escaped from a fenced pasture, and are killed or injured on the track by the railway company's trains, the stock owner cannot recover damages against the company.

3. Because his Honor refused to charge that in such case the burden of proof is on the stock owner to show that he is not guilty of contributory negligence.

4. Because his Honor refused to charge that the stock owner cannot recover unless the injury is attributable entirely to the fault and negligence of the railway company.

5. Because his Honor refused to charge that if the jury believe the stock were at large because of the owner's negligence, they cannot give him damages unless the railway company is proved guilty of gross negligence, or that the injury was inflicted wantonly and willfully.

6. Because his Honor refused to charge that the stock owner cannot recover damages if the jury believe there was a want of due diligence on both sides; and that a mere preponderance of negligence on the part of the railway company will not entitle the stock owner to recover where both parties are at fault.

7. Because his Honor refused to charge that, under the provisions of the stock law, stock roaming at large on the track or roadbed of a railway company are trespassers, and their owner cannot recover for injury done them by the railway trains unless the company's gross negligence or willful injury is proved.

Messrs. Lee & Blake, contra.

November 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action in this case was brought to recover the value of two hogs and one sheep alleged by plaintiff to have been killed on the railway track of the defendant. The plaintiff relied upon the presumption of negligence arising from the naked fact of the killing, as held in the celebrated case known as Danner's Case, 4 Rich. 329 [55 Am. Dec. 678]. Judge Wallace, who heard the case on appeal from a trial-justice court, sustained the ruling in Danner's Case as applicable to this, no testimony having been offered by the defendant. The appeal controverts this charge of the Circuit judge, and insists that since the passage of the "stock law," which was of force in Abbeville at the time of the killing, that Danner's case has no application in such cases, and that now, to make railroad companies responsible for the killing of stock, &c., negligence must be affirmatively and expressly proved, as is contended to be the *law in all other cases where actions are brought for injuries sustained. In other words, that the stock law has withdrawn such cases as this from the operation of Danner's Case. The appeal contains several other exceptions besides this, but this is the main one and we will consider it first.

There can be no doubt but that the recent acts of the legislature, known as the stock law, have materially and fundamentally changed the previous law, as to the roaming at large of cattle. Prior to the passage of these acts, the law, in its effect, required crops to be fenced in and it permitted cattle to roam at will. It was then no trespass for the stock of one man to graze upon the uninclosed lands of another. Now, however, this is changed, and stock is required to be fenced in, and crops need not be inclosed. There can be no doubt either that the effect of this legislation has been to make the roaming of cattle upon the uninclosed lands of others than the owner of such cattle a trespass, for which such owners may in some form or other be held responsible. These principles are conceded.

Was Danner's Case based on the law first announced above to such extent that the doctrine announced and applied there would not have been announced and applied but for the fact that that law was then of force? Would the presumption of negligence arising from the naked fact of killing as established in that case, have been established by the court, had the present stock law been of force making it a trespass for the cattle of others to roam upon other lands than that of their owners, instead of permitting, and to some extent legalizing, such roaming? If the foundation of Danner's Case was the law as it then stood as to crops and cattle, requiring the one to be fenced in and the other to be fenced out, then there would be much merit in the appeal and the case would be relieved from many of the difficulties now surrounding it. It would not involve the overruling of Danner's Case or touch the wise doctrine of stare decisis, as in that view the underlying principles of law controlling the facts in Danner's Case being changed by subsequent legislation, as it is contended, the question would be presented in an entirely new attitude.

other principles than *this, principles which have not been impaired by the subsequent stock law legislation—principles which our Supreme Court at that time found well established and settled—then that case would stand directly across the path of the appellant, and the plaintiff might successfully invoke the doctrine of stare decisis. Danner's Case was not only solemnly decided after careful examination by the court of last resort, but it has been subsequently approved and affirmed. And that it has been the law of this State since its decision has never been doubted. And although it may seem to be a new principle and not in full harmony with many railway decisions in America, yet it would be a precedent which under the circumstances this court would feel constrained to follow, unless upon examination it is ascertained to have been founded upon a state of facts requiring the application of a different principle of law from that which the facts now require. In fact we would have no other alternative unless we disregarded the settled practice and rules of this court.

There seems to be some misapprehension as to the real point decided in Danner's Case, as well as to the principles upon which it rested. The court did not decide that railroad companies were responsible in all cases where stock were killed on their track, whether the killing was willful, negligent or accidental; nor did it discriminate between slight, ordinary or gross negligence. These questions were untouched and left under the operation of the common law rules already established. But what the court did decide was rather in the nature of a rule of evidence than otherwise, determining the quantum of testimony which might carry a case of this kind to the jury, and it seems to have been founded upon what the court regarded as a necessity in such cases. The court simply held that the plaintiff, upon proof of the killing, might rest; that this would make out a prima facie case of all that was necessary to hold the defendant responsible, and if it remained unexplained, liability attached.

The court did not hold that the proof of negligence was unnecessary, or that it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to offer such proof, but it held that while this fact was a necessary ingredient in the liability of defendant, yet the proof of the killing, unexplained by the circumstances or by the testimony of the *defendant, furnished in itself sufficient evidence of the presence of such negligence as would hold the defendant responsible. The court said: "That the company did not produce witnesses to show how the damage occurred, nor explain why they omitted to do so, tends to induce the belief that they could make no defense. They had the witnesses under their control. The plaintiff may not have been present when his cattle were killed and may not be able to discover who were the persons employed on the train when the damage was done. When a party is charged with an act or declaration which may subject him to an action, and does not deny it, his silence is construed into an admission. The same construction may be put on a party's omission to offer testimony in his defense when it is in his power to produce witnesses who might exculpate him." This was the principle upon which the case turned, to wit, the fact that it was in the power of the defendant alone to explain, and that he failed to attempt it. There is not a word or an intimation appearing in the case which involved the stock law as it then existed, as one of the elements of the decision.

Nor can we say that the opinion of the court was unsustained by authority. The cases relied on and cited seem to support it. Leame v. Bray, 3 East 593; Weaver v. Ward, Hopk. 134; Christie v. Griggs, 2 Cam. 79; Piggott v. Eastern Counties R. R. Co., 54 Eng. Com. L. 228; Ellis v. Portsmouth & Roanoke R. R., 2 Ired. 140. But whether this be so or not, Danner's Case was heard in 1851, over thirty years ago. Since then it has been regarded as the settled law of this State. It had the sanction of an unanimous court, Judge Frost delivering the opinion of the court and O'Neall, Evans, Wardlaw and Whitner concurring, than whom neither our judicial gallery nor that of any State has ever furnished a more imposing array. It has grown gray with time, and the country, citizens, railroads and all have understood it and conformed to it. Under these circumstances its roots have gone down too deep to be torn up easily.

In addition to the authorities referred to supra, in Cooley on Torts the following is found, which fully accords with Danner's Case. Mr. Cooley says: "The duty being pointed out, the fail*ure to observe it is to be shown; in other words, the existence of negligence. This is an affirmative fact, the presumption always being, until the contrary appears, that every man will perform his duty. But the quantum of evidence necessary to make out a prima facie case of negligence is very slight in some cases, while in others a more strict showing is required. A bailee who returns in an injured condition an article which has been loaned to him, is by this very condition called upon to explain, for a presumption of fault must arise therefrom against him. If a child is sent into the streets of a city in charge of a spirited team, which, apparently, he is too young and weak to manage, the negligence seems manifest, while there might be no appearance of want of due care had the team been broken down by labor and years. Often the injury itself affords sufficient prima facie evidence of negligence. Thus if the buildings of individuals are destroyed by fire originating in sparks from a locomotive, the fire itself is held to be evidence of negligence which requires to be overcome by some showing that the railway company provides suitable precautions against such an occurrence, &c. There is consequently nothing unreasonable in presuming negligence from the occurrence of an injury and calling upon the railway authorities to rebut the prima facie case by showing that they took reasonable care," &c. Cooley Torts, p. 665.

The rule in Danner's Case is not modified either in Murray's, Roof's or Rowe's Case. In Murray's Case, Judge Wardlaw did say, that on account of the fence law which prevailed in the State at that time, "it was not unlawful for the owner of horses or cows to permit them to roam at large upon all lands of his own or of others that were not guarded by a fence such as the law prescribes; and the entry of a horse or cow upon the uninclosed track of the railroad is no trespass. The owner of cattle who permits them to roam runs the risk of all damage which they may receive accidentally, and so may sometimes be said to be negligent of his own interests; but he is not guilty of legal negligence such as embarrass his recovery from a person who, through negligence, hurts his cattle." He further said: "The court acquiesces, too, in the reference which the recorder made to Danner's Case for the presumption which arises from the *killing of the horse by a train of cars established and unexplained, and for the unfavorable inference raised by the absence of all the defendants' agents who were at the killing. Negligence rather than accident is shown by proof of damage done by a train when nothing more appears," &c. 10 Rich. 231 [70 Am. Dec. 299]. In Roof's Case, 4 S. C. 61, Danner's Case was followed upon the principle of stare decisis, and was affirmed in Rowe's Case, 7 S. C. 167. We find, therefore, no error in his Honor's charge as to the first exception.

The other exceptions involve refusals to charge. It is to be regretted that the charge of the judge is not found in the brief. It would have been better to have had it set out in full so that we might have seen what he did say, and, therefore, been better able to determine the force and effect of the exceptions. The second, fifth and seventh exceptions raise substantially the same point, to wit, that inasmuch as under the stock law, cattle roaming at large on the track or roadbed of a railway company are trespassers, their owners cannot recover for injury done them by the trains under any circumstances, as urged in the second exception, and in the seventh, unless the company's gross negligence or willful injury is proved.

We think these requests were properly refused. Certainly, the first could not have been charged, because, even assuming that it might be held to be a trespass for cattle to roam upon a railroad track in those counties where the stock law prevails (as to which we do not now express an opinion,) yet this would not have warranted the charge requested. True, where one is a trespasser upon the land of another, either in himself, his servants, or his cattle, he may be made responsible in an action for damages; but we know of no law which would warrant the injured party to take the law into his own hands and kill the trespasser. The courts may redress his wrongs; but he has no authority to undertake to right himself, much less to inflict vengeance.

No doubt some negligence must be proved; whether it must be gross or not is not necessary for us to determine. In fact, the difference which is sometimes attempted to be drawn between *different kinds of negligence is so shadowy that it is by no means easy to define clearly what is gross, or what is ordinary, or what is the degree in a special case. But if there be a distinction, it was not necessary for the judge to charge as requested here. The rule in Danner's Case required him to say when the killing was proved, that the plaintiff might rest, and if the defendant failed to explain this killing so as to exculpate the company, either by proof that the killing was accidental, unavoidable or free from negligence, then the fact of killing, with the prima facie case which it made, was sufficient, as this furnished all the proof which the case in the first instance required. This the judge charged.

As to the third, fourth and sixth exceptions. These raise the question of contributory negligence. The facts of the case are not fully stated in the brief; so far as it appears, no testimony was offered by the defendant; in fact, it is so stated in the brief. The question, then, as to contributory negligence, was an abstract question having no reference to the facts. These exceptions may have contained good law, but it was irrelevant here.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[3. Railroads ⇐406.]

In the running of a railroad train, the employés must regard the safety of the passengers and the property of the company, as well as dangers to cattle and persons on the track, and the question of negligence is influenced by these considerations; but it cannot be said that a railroad company is liable only for gross negligence in the killing of a horse on its track by a train of cars, or for wanton negligence or willful misconduct.

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

This was an action by Eldred C. Simkins against the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company, commenced April 7th, 1881, to recover $500 damages for the killing of two horses belonging to plaintiff by a train of cars of the defendant company, on or about March 1st, 1881. The defendant denied liability and asserted as a counter-claim injuries done to the engine and cars of the company by the presence of these horses on the track. To this counter-claim there was no reply.

The accident occurred at a trestle, towards which the horses had run on the track from one hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty yards, as estimated by witnesses from the tracks of the horses. All this was within the pasture of plaintiff, through which defendant had a right of way, and the horses were killed about midnight. The employés of the company, in charge of the train, did not know that these horses were on the track until after the engine had been thrown off by the killing of the horses. As to the speed of the train, the darkness of the night, and the burning of a headlight on the engine, the evidence was conflicting.

The defendant presented several requests to charge. Those which were refused are correctly quoted in the exceptions, and the opinion states the reasons given by the Circuit judge for his refusal. He did charge the jury as follows:

"That under the laws of this State a railroad company is not bound to protect its track by fences or other inclosure from the *incursions of horses, cattle, or other animals. That a railroad company is not liable for the killing of a horse upon the track by its train, if such killing is accidental. That a railroad company is not liable for injuries caused by the mere fact that a train was of such length, or was running at such speed at night, that it could not be stopped by the engineer and brakeman short of one hundred or two hundred or even three hundred yards, inasmuch as such running of a train is not negligence or misconduct. That in the absence of proof of gross negligence or willful misconduct on the part of the railroad company itself, the damages for the killing or injuring of horses on the track can in no event be vindictive, but merely compensatory for the actual loss proven to have been sustained by the same."

And he further charged the jury that the fence or stock laws of this State applicable to Newberry county and other counties at the time these horses were injured changed the rule of law formerly prevailing here, so as to do away with the presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad, derived from a mere fact of killing or injuring stock, and so as to put upon the owner of the stock killed or injured the burthen of proving that such killing or injuring was the result of negligence on the part of the railroad or its employés; but that the plaintiff having introduced testimony on the point of negligence, if the jury should conclude from the testimony in the case that there was negligence on the part of the railroad or its employés, they should find for the plaintiff, the owner of the stock.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $328.

The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions, together with those copied into the opinion:

6. "Because his Honor refused the request of the defendant to charge the jury 'That a railroad company is not liable for the killing or injuring of a horse upon the track by its train, unless such killing or injuring is the result of either wanton negligence or willful misconduct of the employés running the train.'

7. "Because his Honor refused the request of the defendant to charge the jury 'That since the enactment of the stock or fence laws of this State, the killing or injuring of horses by a railroad train, on its track, in Newberry county, does not put the *burthen of proof upon the railroad company, that such killing or injuring was accidental or inevitable, but that in such case it is necessary, in order to make the railroad company liable, that there be proof of wanton negligence or willful misconduct on the part of the employé or employés running the train.'

8. "Because his Honor refused the request of the defendant to charge the jury 'That if it appear that a horse killed or injured by a train was first discovered, or was first discoverable, on the track at such a short distance from the place where he was killed or injured, that the train could not have been stopped in time to prevent running over or against the horse, it was not necessary that the persons running the train should have seen the horse, or having seen him, that they should have attempted to stop the train.'

11. "Because his Honor refused the request of the defendant to charge the jury, 'That where a party seeks to recover damages for injury to his person or property, resulting from the negligence of another, he must show that his own conduct has been free from blame; and it must not appear that he has contributed to the cause of injury on account of which he complains.' "

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.
Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

November 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The respondent seeks to recover in this action, the value of two horses, killed on the track of defendant's railroad, by a train of cars passing over them. Unlike the case of Jones against this defendant, just decided by this court, [see next case ante,] the respondent assumed the duty of proving negligence affirmatively by other testimony than the mere killing, and he did not rely upon the presumption arising from the fact of killing as in Danner's Case [4 Rich. 329, 55 Am. Dec. 678]. The defendant also introduced evidence upon the subject of negligence, and the case was stoutly fought, on both sides, as to that question. The defendant submitted various legal propositions, *some fourteen in all, to the Circuit judge, with requests to charge them. The judge declined eleven of these requests, which now constitute the grounds of appeal.

The first four, as is admitted, involved the same principle and hinge upon the same point, and they were discussed before us, on both sides, under the same head. They rest upon the general proposition, that a horse found upon a railroad track in this State is a trespasser, and that all questions as to the liability of a railroad company in the killing of such horse, must be adjudicated under the light of the fact that he is a trespasser. No doubt the counsel presenting these requests intended them to apply to Newberry county, the place of trial, as legal propositions arising under the operation of the stock law, and to such other counties in which the stock law had become the law. They intended to claim that in such counties, since the enactment of the stock law, stock were not at liberty to roam at large as formerly, and if in such cases they were found outside the premises of their owner, it was illegal, and a trespass, and that in such cases the law, as to injuries done them, should be applied under the influence of that fact.

The propositions, however, as presented to the judge, were general in their terms, no reference being made to Newberry county or to the stock law. The judge made a written indorsement on these requests, as follows: "They relate to the general law of the State, and not to the fence law of this (Newberry) county. As a general rule of law in this State, said propositions are contrary to the decisions of this State." It does not appear that any effort was made to correct this misunderstanding of the judge, or to inform him that the requests were founded upon the stock laws of force in Newberry county. On the contrary, the charge as thus indorsed seems to have been submitted to. This court has no power to consider propositions not made below, or to review refusals to charge in the absence of requests to charge. Errors of commission are of course before us, when brought up by proper exceptions, but errors of omission must be founded upon a previous request to the judge, in addition to the exceptions necessary to bring them under our review.

Looking at the requests as understood by the judge, based *upon the generality of the terms in which they were couched, there can be no doubt that his ruling was correct. But had he understood the request to have reference to Newberry county, and based upon the stock law of force in that county, according to the view which we take of the question it would not have been error to refuse the request, as we do not think the stock law has any application to the case. The injury complained of was sustained at a point on the track where it passed through an inclosure of the plaintiff, used by him as a pasture for his cattle. The only statute of force at the time the disaster occurred was the act of December 14th, 1878. 16 Stat. 689. The language of which is, "That in the counties of Abbeville, Union, Newberry and Laurens, it shall not be lawful for the owner or manager of any horse * * * or neat cattle of any description to permit the said animals or any of them to run at large beyond the limits of their own land."

It is conceded in this case that the railroad company did not own the land upon which its track rested at the point where the damage was done, but was only entitled to a right of way, an easement, over the said land. The act above cited, further provides that "wherever any of the said stock be found upon the lands of another person than the owner, the owner of such stock shall be liable for all damages sustained." It will be observed that the prohibition is against permitting stock to run at large beyond the limits of the owners of land, and the penalty is a liability for damages, if one's stock is found upon the lands of another. In this case the animals of the plaintiff were not beyond the limits of his land. They were not upon the lands of the defendant. The defendant had only an easement, an incorporeal hereditament, which is something different from land. The plaintiff still retained the ownership of the land, and might lawfully use it in any way not inconsistent with the easement of the defendant.

There was, therefore, nothing unlawful in the act of the plaintiff in permitting his stock to roam at large in his inclosed pasture upon his own land, through which the defendant only had the right of way, and it was not a trespass on his part for his animals to stray upon the track of the defendant's railroad. *We have not been able to discover in any of the various acts in relation to the stock law, any indication of an intention to embrace within their provisions the various railroad tracks in this State, and it seems to us clear that the terms used in the act referred to, according to their proper construction, cannot be extended so as to embrace the track of a railroad in which the company has a mere easement, and does not own the land over which the track passes. In our opinion, therefore, all of the grounds of appeal based upon the stock law must be overruled.

Fifth exception. "Because his Honor refused the request, that a railroad company is not liable for killing or injuring a horse upon the track of its train unless such killing or injuring is the result of gross negligence on the part of the employés running the train, or at least on the part of the engineer." The judge allowed this except the word "gross." We think the weight of the authorities sustains the judge's ruling. The subject of negligence has been much discussed, and various definitions have been given of it, and much confusion has arisen in reference thereto. Sometimes it has been held to be a question of fact and left almost entirely to the good sense of the jury. At other times it has been regarded as a question of law, and sometimes it has become a mixed question of law and fact. It is not necessary for us in this case to go into this question and explore the mass of cases in the different States and courts where this subject has been considered and adjudged. The exception itself submits it as a question of fact, and the only objection is that the Circuit judge did not require as a legal proposition that the jury should be limited to such negligence as might be termed gross.

Negligence, as we understand it, is the absence of care, and in its essence, in all of its forms, it implies wrong and fault in the party committing it. There may be different degrees of care. There may be a most assiduous, minute and scrupulous attention governing one's conduct, or there may be that sort of attention which characterizes the conduct of ordinary men, or, still further, that which belongs to the reckless and indifferent. And there may be the absence of all care, substituted by a wanton, willful act, intended to do injury. The absence of these degrees of care may characterize the negligence which results. In the *first class the negligence might be designated as slight; in the second, ordinary, and in the third, gross, if epithets are necessary. Now there are but few cases where that minute and scrupulous attention, referred to above in the first class, is required by the law, and consequently but few cases where slight negligence can be made the foundation of an action for damages. All that the law requires, as a general rule, is that sort of care which prudent men, influenced by personal interest, ordinarily bestow on their business and conduct, and it is the absence of this kind of care which in most cases gives rise to actions at law. This of course includes the third class, where there is not even the care of the reckless and indifferent.

It should be observed here, however, that negligence is a relative term, and its existence in a given case depends upon the requirements of the occasion. I mean to say, that an act may be negligent under one state of facts when the same act under a different state of facts might be entirely free from negligence. For instance, to drive a wild and dangerous horse, and of unusual speed, along a crowded street with hundreds of persons and vehicles on the way, would be a negligent act, for the injurious consequences of which, if any, a party could, no doubt, be held responsible; but to drive the same horse at the same speed along an unoccupied street, or along some secluded road in one's own enclosure, seldom or never traveled by others, might be free from every feature of negligence. So, too, in those counties in the State where the stock law has not become the law, and where cattle are at liberty to roam at large upon railroad tracks and elsewhere at will, for a train of cars to dash forward, without the precaution which should be observed in such cases, might be negligent, whereas the same train, going at the same speed, and without the same precaution, in the counties where the stock law has been adopted, and where the railroad employés had no thought that cattle would be found on the track, would not be a negligent act.

So, at last, the kind of negligence for which a party may be made responsible depends on the degree of care which may be required in the special case. If the care of the most prudent and scrupulous is required, then slight negligence may be actionable. If ordinary care is only required, then the absence of this or *ordinary negligence would sustain an action. If the case demands only the care of the indifferent and reckless, (and we know of no such case,) then gross negligence would be necessary. Negligence in all of its forms, as we have said, implies wrong. It carries with it the idea of fault—a failure to do what is required to be done. And an injury resulting from this failure must be redressed, whether it be a slight, ordinary or gross failure. That is to say, in cases where either of these degrees is actionable under the principles laid down above, then an injury resulting from it is entitled to be redressed.

It is true, it has been held in words in some of the States where the rule of the common law as to cattle prevailed, to wit, where the owner was bound to keep them on his own land, that railroad companies could only be made answerable for an injury to them wantonly perpetrated, or, as is said in some of the cases, where the act causing the injury was reckless and willful. This seems to have been held in Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, and in some other of the States. But in Vermont, and in some other States, the doctrine prevails that the company is liable for injuries to cattle upon its track if they could have been avoided by its servants in the exercise of ordinary care. Pierce Railr. L., p. 322–326, where the different cases are collected.

These principles, although seemingly in direct conflict, may yet be somewhat harmonized by remembering, as urged above, that negligence is relative, and its character depends upon the care required in a given case; and, therefore, what would be negligence, gross or otherwise, in one case, might have no feature of negligence in another. In the running of a railroad train, the employés must look to the safety of the passengers and of the property of the company, as well as to dangers to cattle and persons on the track, and the question of negligence must be determined by these considerations and others; but after letting these have their legitimate influence subordinating the danger of cattle to these higher interests, we cannot agree to the doctrine, that only gross negligence, to wit, the absence of that care which the reckless and indifferent would give, could alone make the road responsible. We do not see that the fact that stock are required to be fenced in, and are not expected to be found on *the track, should release the company from the bestowal of such care as would be reasonable in such a case. It certainly ought not to license the company to any conduct short of gross, willful and vicious, or, as is said in some of the cases, willful negligence. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge was warranted in striking out the word "gross" in the exception.

Of course, we do not undertake here to determine what would be slight, ordinary or gross negligence in these railroad cases. All that we determine is, that it is not necessary to show gross negligence, and that liability may attach below this. We think the law requires these companies, even in counties where the stock law prevails, to exercise at least reasonable care, such as ordinarily prudent men would be expected to exercise under the circumstances. Whether this has been exercised in a special case is a question of fact for the jury.

The next two exceptions, the sixth and seventh, in which the judge was requested to charge that nothing short of wanton negligence or willful misconduct could make the defendant responsible, are disposed of by what we have already said.

We do not see that the eighth exception involves any principle of law. If it was a fact that the horse was first discovered or was first discoverable at so short a distance on the track that the train could not have stopped in time, then this might have been urged upon the jury as proof that there was no negligence; but we do not see that the judge was required to charge that there was no negligence as matter of law.

The ninth exception alleges error because his Honor refused to charge as requested: "That a counter-claim for damages resulting from the trespassing of the horses set up in the defendant's answer in an action for damages for the killing or injury of horses by the train of a railway company is proper, and must be allowed to the extent of the damages proved to have actually resulted to the railroad from such trespassing, if it appear that such damage to the company was not the result of blamable conduct on the part of the company or the employés running the train." Under the code (section 171) a counter-claim may be interposed: 1. Where the cause of action of defendant, which he attempts to set up by counter-claim, arises out of the contract *or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, or is connected with the subject of the action. 2. Where the plaintiff's action is on contract, and the defendant's cause of action is also on contract and in existence at the commencement of plaintiff's action. Lynch's Code, p. 72.

The plaintiff's action here did not originate in contract, so we need not consider any of the grounds above, except that portion of the first which provides for a counter-claim where the defendant's cause of action arises out of the transaction set forth in the complaint, or is connected with the subject of the action. Did the defendant's cause of action, presented in his counter-claim, arise out of the transaction set forth in the complaint, or was it connected with the subject of plaintiff's action? The foundation of the counter-claim is an alleged trespass by plaintiff's horses, which resulted in injury to defendant's engine. The transaction, if it be a transaction, which is the foundation of plaintiff's action, is an injury done to plaintiff's horses by a train of cars of defendant. These two events were nearly contemporaneous in this instance; but did the first arise out of the latter?

There is certainly no necessary connection between two such events. The one may happen, and frequently does happen, without the other; but even when happening at or near the same time, we do not see how the trespass of the horses, even if it be admitted that they were trespassing, (which must always be in such cases the first event,) can grow out of the injury done to the horses. Let it be assumed that it was a trespass for the horses to be on plaintiff's track, and this gave the defendant a right of action. The horses were upon the track before the train arrived, and a right of action had accrued to defendant before any cause of action arose to plaintiff.

It may be said, however, that the injury for which defendant seeks by his counter-claim to recover damages occurred afterwards. This is true, but did it grow out of the killing of the horses, which is the transaction constituting plaintiff's cause of action, or did it grow out of the fact that these horses were upon the track and threw the engine off? We do not see that defendant's cause of action grew out of the transaction which is the foundation of plaintiff's suit, in the sense of the counter-claim provided *for in the code, or that it has such connection with the subject of plaintiff's action as, under the code, authorizes it to be set up as a counter-claim here. On the contrary, the two causes seem to us to be entirely separate and independent of each other. The foundation of each is a tort. But these torts have no dependence the one upon the other. The alleged tort of the defendant which constitutes the foundation of plaintiff's action is the negligent running of defendant's cars by which his horses were killed; the alleged tort of plaintiff which is the foundation of defendant's counter-claim, was the alleged illegal presence of his horses upon the railroad track by which the train was thrown from the track and the engine injured. The injury to the engine in point of time, it is true, followed in quick succession that of the injury to the horses; but it cannot be said that the illegal presence of the horses on the track, which is the foundation of defendant's counter-claim, arose out of the negligence of defendant in running the cars, which is the foundation of plaintiff's action. Nor was it connected with the subject of plaintiff's action.

In most of the States having the code, similar provisions to ours in reference to counter-claims have been adopted, and in some of the States, the terms "transaction," "arising out of," "subject of action" and "connected therewith," have been much discussed. The decisions are not uniform, and from them it is difficult to arrive at a definite and satisfactory conclusion. In some of the States, especially in New York, the tendency has been to limit and narrow the meaning of these terms. In others, the construction has been more liberal. In the first, the principles of the former doctrine of set-off and recoupment, which applied to actions ex contractu entirely, have controlled, more or less; in the latter, it has been held that the terms "transaction" and "subject of the action" mean something more than contracts, and that consequently counter-claims may embrace other causes of action besides those arising in contract.

This whole subject is fully discussed with great ability and perspicuity in Mr. Pomeroy's second edition of his Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 734, et seq., p. 772. And at section 790, will be found a discussion of the "cases in which the *demands of both parties are for damages arising from tort," in which he says: "Counter-claims of damages from torts, when attempted to be enforced against causes of action for damages also arising from other torts, have, with few exceptions, been rejected. The courts have been inclined to adopt, or at least to assume as a general principle, that such a cross-demand can never arise from the transaction set forth by the plaintiff as the foundation of his claim." It will be seen, however, that this doctrine has not been universally accepted. And he presents in the foot note an array of cases from which this principle was extracted. Opposed to this doctrine, he also cites a few cases announcing the principle, that under special circumstances a tort may be counterclaimed against a tort. No doubt this is true, where there is an evident connection. Under the former practice, when the law of set-off and recoupment prevailed, it is certain that the cause of action which the defendant attempts to set up here could not have been interposed. Nor do we see, upon our analysis of the counter-claim provision in our code, that it can be done by virtue of the code. Under these circumstances, while the cases in other States are not authority, yet we are disposed to follow on that line in which the most of them seem to have gone; and, therefore, to hold that the Circuit judge was right in refusing this request of the defendant.

Tenth exception. Because his Honor refused the request of defendant to give a binding charge to the jury "to find for the defendant, because of there being in this case no proof, or, at most, a mere scintilla of evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant or its employés." The judge declined this because there was contradictory testimony on that point which must be left to the jury. We see no error here.

Eleventh exception, as to contributory negligence, was refused in the form presented, because, as stated by his Honor, "A charge should not merely state a general rule of law. It should be made in connection with a point in the case on which evidence has been offered. And the above rule, as applicable to horses, has already been charged upon and the defendant held liable for negligence, if proved." A judge is not bound to charge general and abstract propositions of law, however sound. They must *have some connection with the case and the facts relied on. So far as this principle had reference to the horses, it seems that the judge had charged upon it, and it was not necessary for him to go over that ground again. We think the reason which he gives vindicates his refusal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

20 S. C. 271

BOBO v. VAIDEN.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸527.]

Where a surety on an administration bond petitions for relief and a new bond is required and given, the second bond becomes the primary security, not only as to the surety who petitioned, but also as to the other sureties on the first bond.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸527.]

But the administrator, when cited to show cause under his surety's petition, having made return showing a balance in hand much less than the true balance—an error resulting from an incorrect voucher given him by such petitioning surety—the first bond is primarily liable to the extent of such error.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2368; Dec. Dig. ⟸527.]

A distributee who was also a surety on the administrator's bond, having made an assignment of his distributive share in the estate, the assignee is entitled only to what is left to such surety after paying his liability to the estate for the devastavit of the administrator. And the benefit of this rule may be claimed by the other sureties.

Before Fraser, J., and Pressley, J., Union, June, 1881, and March, 1882.

This was an action by Ira L. Bobo and others, distributees of the estate of John Bishop, deceased, against W. H. Vaiden, administrator, and the sureties on his two bonds, for account and settlement, commenced August 29th, 1879. There were no unpaid creditors.

The facts connected with the points made in this court are sufficiently stated in the opinion. There was testimony of P. M. Cohen, a surety on the second bond, that before signing he made inquiry as to the amount of Vaiden's liability on his first bond, *and that he would not have signed it if he had known that the liability was for $300 more than he was then informed. There was no allegation of bad faith in Minter.

The decree of Judge Fraser was as follows:

As I understood the counsel in the argument before me, it was desired that the question of the rights of sureties as amongst themselves should be settled. Without entering into a full examination and discussion of the cases bearing on this subject, I will state my conclusions very briefly.

The words of the present act, Gen. Stat. p. 453, § 8, are substantially the same as the old act on the same subject. In Ordinary v. Bigham & Hudson, 2 Hill 516, it is said that the ordinary may revoke the administration and grant administration de bonis non, or he may order the administrator to substitute a new security for the discontented one in a new bond.

The doctrine in Enicks v. Powell, 2 Strobh. Eq. 196, I take to be, that where there is a revocation of the administration, and the same person is appointed and gives a new bond, the debtor and creditor being united in the same person, there would be the usual presumption of payment to the administrator in his new capacity; that this would be followed by the same consequences as an actual payment to any other person who might have been appointed in his place, and the sureties on the first bond relieved, ipso facto, by such revocation and re-appointment. Where, however, there is no revocation but an order for a new bond only, all the sureties are parties to a common undertaking, and jointly liable to the beneficiaries. If the circumstances show that the new bond was given at the instance of a surety, and for his protection, as in Field v. Pelot, then the sureties to the new bond are primarily liable, and the sureties to the first bond, who petitioned for relief, only secondarily liable.

Only one of the first set, John R. Minter, is before the court in this case, and he was the petitioner. Was the order of the Probate judge in this case a revocation? It certainly was not an order simply to substitute a new surety for the discontented one—at least not so intended. In Field v. Pelot an order had been made by the Court of Equity for guardians to give a new bond *with sureties, "on or before March 1st next, or after that day the letters of guardianship shall be considered as revoked." Some time after this time had expired the guardians gave a new bond, no new appointment having been made. The court held that the bond was a good one, but that though there was no new appointment the guardianship was a continuing one, and the new surety estopped from denying his liability on the bond. Dr. Stoney was a surety on the first bond and John S. Field was surety on the second. The court, per Harper, says: "That Dr. Stoney could not be discharged from all responsibility, but the surety might well assume the primary liability. * * * If Dr. Stoney had paid his bond with his own money he would have a right to be re-imbursed in full by Field. If Field had paid off his bond he could have recovered nothing against Stoney." This was said in reference to a guardianship bond. Field v. Pelot, McMull. Eq. 382.

In the same case, Chancellor Harper says: "There is nothing to prevent the new surety binding himself to the same extent as the old, whether for past or future liabilities (on administration bonds); and such are the plain terms and obvious purposes of his undertaking. * * * When a party interested in the estate becomes dissatisfied. * * * it would seem that the new security is only collateral to the former. * * * But when it is the surety who becomes dissatisfied with his responsibility and seeks to be relieved, the converse seems to follow. * * * The court cannot substitute a new security so as to discharge the former from his contracts. But there is nothing to forbid its requiring a new security, which, as between the sureties themselves, shall be the primary one, leaving the former only collateral; and such seems to be the nature of the new sureties' undertaking."

The court, in the case of Field v. Pelot, seems to have expounded the principles in reference to sureties on administration bonds, and to have applied them to a case of guardianship bonds—in its leading features very much like the case now before this court. It is very difficult to see how any positive act of maladministration could be established in this case before twelve *months from the death of the intestate had passed, and before there could have been any lawful payments, either of debts or distributive shares. I am of the opinion that unless there was some positive breach of trust, by refusal to pay out on lawful demand, or of devastavit, by wasting the assets before the second bond was given, the second bond was the primary security, and all the circumstances show that was its purpose and that the sureties on the second bond are not entitled to call on John R. Minter, a surety on the first bond, and at whose instance and for whose protection the second bond was given, for contribution for any payments they may be compelled to make; that John R. Minter is liable to the distributees, and if he pays anything is entitled to contribution from the sureties on the second bond, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

All questions of costs and other questions in this cause are left open for future investigation and adjudication in this cause.

The decree of Judge Pressley was as follows:

The testimony and report of referee in this case are not in such form as would make me understand the various points raised by the exceptions; I therefore decide only:

1st. That the rule laid down by Judge Fraser in his past decision of this case, in favor of one of the sureties to the first bond, is also applicable to Elizabeth Bishop, she being liable on any devastavit of W. H. Vaiden, only in case the sureties to the second bond fail to pay the same.

2d. That no devastavit has been shown which would fall primarily upon the first bond, the amounts which the administrator failed to sell for cash being either to himself or having been collected by him, except the purchases of Mrs. Gordon Bishop, for which, I decide, he must receive credit as so much paid by him on her share as one of the distributees of her husband.

3d. The assignment of Catherine Vaiden to D. P. Duncan is valid, and he should receive out of her share the amount he paid for her husband, with interest at seven per cent. from the time he paid it.

4th. The other sureties on the second bond are entitled to have the remainder of the share of Catherine Vaiden in said estate *applied to her liability as co-surety, that application to extend also to her share in the shares of other distributees who may have died without leaving other heirs than brothers or sisters.

5th. All other points raised by any of the exceptions to said report are recommitted to the referee for further testimony and definite report thereon.

The decree of Judge Wallace simply embodied, in final form, what had already been decided.

Mr. R. W. Shand, for appellant.

Mr. J. C. Wallace, for administrator of Elizabeth Bishop.

Mr. J. B. Steedman, for J. R. Minter.

November 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. John Bishop, late of Union county, died intestate in April, 1874. W. H. Vaiden was appointed his administrator May 13th, 1874, upon his entering into bond with Elizabeth J. Bishop, W. A. Johnson and John R. Minter, as his sureties. John R. Minter, one of the sureties, afterwards, to wit, on November 30th, 1874, upon petition to the Probate Court to that end, obtained an order releasing him from all further liability upon the administration bond which he had signed and the defendant, W. H. Vaiden, was required in said order to give another bond on or before December 8th next thereafter, and in default thereof, that his letters be revoked. On December 15th, 1874, seven days after the time fixed in the order, Vaiden gave a new bond as administrator, with Caroline Vaiden, James M. Johnson, W. M. Stewart, John Ray and P. M. Cohen, as sureties. The action below was against the administrator, W. H. Vaiden, and some of the sureties on each bond, and was for an accounting.

A short time before Minter was relieved,

he had a transaction *with the administrator, in which he gave to said administrator a receipt for $788.37, as so much paid on a debt which he, Minter, held on the estate of the intestate, when in fact the administrator only paid him $468.37, just $320 less than the amount called for in said receipt. Minter explained this by the statement that Bishop in his life-time had made payments on the note which he held, leaving a balance of $468.57, which was paid by the administrator, but as there had been no credits on the note of the amounts previously paid by Bishop, that he gave a receipt to the administrator in full. The administrator in his return obtained a credit for the $788.57, as if the whole sum had been paid by him out of assets in his hands as administrator.

In the progress of the case, D. P. Duncan claimed that the share of Mrs. Vaiden, a daughter of the intestate, and one of the sureties to the second bond, had been assigned to him in payment of a debt due to him by Mrs. Vaiden.

The case in one form or other has been heard by Judge Fraser, Judge Pressley, Judge Aldrich and Judge Wallace; the principal questions involved being: First. The respective liabilities of the sureties on the two bonds. Second. Whether Minter shall be held primarily liable for the $320 difference between the receipt he gave to the administrator, and the amount actually paid him; and lastly, whether Duncan should be paid out of Mrs. Vaiden's share to the exclusion of her liability as one of sureties on the bond. Judge Fraser held the second bond the primary security as to Minter, but passed no judgment as to the $320. At that time Duncan had not intervened, and consequently his claim was not before the court, and Judge Fraser seemed to have understood that Elizabeth Bishop, one of the sureties to the first bond, had not been made a party, and consequently he made no decree as to her.

Judge Pressley held the second bond a primary security as against Elizabeth as well as Minter, this, as he said, being in accordance with the rule laid down by Judge Fraser as to Minter, but he did not pass upon the $320 matter. At that time Duncan had intervened and presented his claim and Judge Pressley allowed it, holding it superior to the rights of set-off and retainer asserted by Mrs. Vaiden's co-sureties on the administra*tion bond. Judge Aldrich recommitted the matter to the referee to state the accounts, and upon the coming in of a second report, Judge Wallace confirmed it, and passed an order in accordance with the previous decrees, making the second bond the primary security as to all of the parties, and allowing the Duncan claim in advance of any appropriation of Mrs. Vaiden's share to her liability on the bond.

Cohen, one of the sureties on the second bond, has appealed, raising the questions raised below, to wit: 1. What are the respective liabilities on the two bonds? 2. Is Minter primarily liable for the $320? 3. Should Duncan be first paid out of Mrs. Vaiden's share? Appellant's counsel admits, that as to Minter the second bond is the primary security, but he claims that Minter should save the sureties on the second bond harmless to the extent of the $320, the amount of the voucher to Vaiden, administrator, in excess of the amount actually paid him. He resists the claim of Duncan, and he denies that Elizabeth Bishop should have the benefit of Minter's release by the order of the Probate judge.

As to the first question. Under the act of 1789, the court of ordinary had power to grant relief in cases of this kind, either by revoking the letters of administration, or by requiring a new bond; yet the vested rights of the parties interested could not be impaired. Ordinary v. Wallace, 1 Rich. 507; Owens v. Walker, 2 Strobh. Eq. 289. The act of 1839 has made no material changes in the law on this subject. It is in substance the same as the act of 1789, differing principally in its phraseology; but under neither of these acts has the precise question now before the court ever been contested and distinctly decided. In Cureton v. Shelton, 3 McCord 412, there were but two sureties to the bond, and both petitioned for relief. In Trimmier v. Trail, 2 Bail. 480, there was only one, and he petitioned. So, too, in Waterman v. Bigham & Hudson, 2 Hill 512. So that the question here presented was not involved in either of these cases. Field v. Pelot McMull. Eq. 382, was a case of guardianship, and in Enicks v. Powell, 2 Strobh. Eq. 196, the administration was revoked and a new appointment was made de bonis non, of the same party, with a new bond. When a revocation *is ordered and a new appointment conferred on the same party, there is no difficulty, as, by operation of law, payment is presumed to the discharge of the first administration. It is in cases where there has been no revocation—where the original letters continue—that a new bond is ordered and given at the instance of one or more of the sureties to the first bond, where the difficulty is presented.

As a general principle, it has been settled that the second bond becomes the primary security, and the first is at least suspended until the second is exhausted. True, the first bond cannot be entirely discharged, so far as the parties interested in the estate are concerned; but as between the sureties to the two bonds, the second stands in the front rank and must protect the first. Glenn v. Wallace, 4 Strobh. Eq. 150 [53 Am. Dec. 657]. See also cases supra. If this was a case where all of the sureties to the first bond had petitioned, then these authorities would be directly in point. But here one only of the sureties, Minter, petitioned. Can this make any difference? While, as we have said, the question was not directly involved in either of the cases mentioned yet the opinion of the distinguished jurists pronouncing judgment is manifest from their utterances therein. See what Chancellor Dargan said on circuit, sustained on appeal, in case of Owens v. Walker, supra. Also the remarks in Field v. Pelot, supra. It seemed to be unquestioned that the general principle above applied as well to cases where any number less than all of the sureties to the first bond petitioned, as where all petitioned. In each case, if the relief afforded by the court consisted in requiring simply a new bond, with the original letters of administration continuing, this new bond became the primary security, and it operated to that extent, to the relief of all of the sureties on the first. Glenn v. Wallace, 4 Strobh. Eq. 150 [53 Am. Dec. 657].

Indeed, such must necessarily be the result unless the new bond is to be held simply as an indemnity to the petitioning surety. We find no authority for such a position. Nor could such be the understanding or the purpose of the order; because, if so, the new bond should always be executed to the party petitioning for relief, instead of in the usual form of such bonds. Besides, upon the theory that the new bond takes the place of *the first to the extent only of the name of the petitioning surety, which would in effect be the case if it is held simply as an indemnity to him, this would be making a new contract for the other sureties, and one not authorized by them. In this case, Elizabeth Bishop may have been perfectly willing to go on the first bond with Minter as a co-surety, and yet utterly unwilling to sign with the others, with Minter's name erased. "A release of one of several co-obligors is a release of all." Ordinary v. Bigham, 2 Hill 515. There is much force in what Chancellor Dargan said on this subject on circuit in case of Owens v. Walker, 2 Strobh. Eq. 293.

True, the original bond in this case, and all such bonds, are given subject to the act of 1839, in reference to relief to any of the sureties when demanded, but we think such relief should be afforded in harmony with the well-established principles of law in reference to contracts as to other matters, especially as this can be done under the authority conferred by the act of 1839. The power to afford relief is limited by the injunction that the rights of parties shall not be impaired. This injunction can always be regarded, and yet the necessary relief furnished, by following the decided cases, wherein it has been held that the only course for the court to pursue is either to revoke the administration or to require a new bond, which is to stand as a primary security to the old, and not simply as a substitute for the name of the petitioning surety on the old. We think there was no error in the court below as to this first question.

Now, as to the second question. It is not entirely plain from the proof what has been adjudged on this subject. Judge Pressley seems to have thought that Judge Fraser had ruled upon the whole liability of Minter, including that alleged to have arisen out of the error in Vaiden's return of the payment of $788.57 to Minter, and he declined to hear argument in reference to it, and this matter was not separately considered in the final decree of Judge Wallace. But whatever may be the facts in this respect, our view as to the relative liability of the two sets of sureties for the sum of $320 is this: that, as a general rule, the giving of the second bond would have the effect of postponing the liability of the sureties on the first bond to that *of the liability of the sureties on the second bond; but inasmuch as the second set of sureties had a right to suppose from the return required of the administrator, under the proceeding instituted by Minter, that the liability which they were assuming was $320 less than the final accounting has shown it to be, and inasmuch as they were thus misled by the act of Minter, (whether so intended or not is immaterial,) it would be inequitable to allow Minter to claim exemption from primary liability for the said sum of $320. And as Mrs. Bishop did not herself join in the application for relief, but can only obtain the same under or through her co-surety, Minter, her administrator cannot now claim any more than he can. We think, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be so modified as to exempt the appellant from primary liability so far as the said sum of $320 and interest is concerned.

As to the Duncan claim. On December 15th, 1874, W. H. Vaiden was required to give a second bond for the administration of the estate of his intestate, John Bishop. Caroline, the wife of the administrator, and daughter of Bishop, and as such entitled to a share of his estate, became one of the sureties on the bond of her husband, as administrator. It seems that the administrator wasted the estate, and it becoming necessary to replace the assets out of the sureties, Mrs. Vaiden, or her assignee, insisted that in 1877 she, as distributee, had assigned to D. P. Duncan so much of her share in the estate as would secure a debt he had contracted for her husband, and the claim thus made was allowed. It seems to us that it would be inequitable to allow Mrs. V. to contract a liability to the estate by signing the administration bond of her husband, and afterwards to assign her interest in the estate, and thereby throw the whole weight of her husband's default upon her co-sureties, who probably were induced to join her in the suretyship on the faith of her interest therein. We are not informed whether she has any other means to meet said liability.

The real interest of a distributee in the estate is what remains after all his obligations to the estate have been discharged. It is upon this principle that he is chargeable with advancements and obligations to the intestate, even where the right of action is *lost. Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C. 216. The principle extends to obligations to the administrator, as where personal property is bought at his sale. We do not perceive why a liability on the administration bond should not also fall under the operation of the same rule. Dues of the sureties upon the administration bond are only assets of the estate in place of those wasted by the administrator. Suppose there was only one distributee and he was the only solvent surety upon the bond. Until something was paid, there could be nothing for the distributee. He would be simply debtor to himself. If Mrs. Vaiden were now suing the estate for her share, is there any doubt that her liability as surety would be set off before anything would be paid her? Has the assignee any higher right? The demand is a mere chose in action, and, in such cases, the admitted rule is, that the assignee takes the interest assigned subject to all the defenses both legal and equitable against the assignor. Wait Anno. Code 120; Lynch's Code, § 135.

But it is said that the question as to whether there is an equitable defense must be determined by the facts as they stood at the time of the assignment, and at that time no devastavit had been established against the administrator, and that the sureties had paid nothing. It is true that, at the time of the assignment, the devastavit had not been established formally; but it is now established. We have no means of knowing precisely when it was actually committed. We incline to think it was before the assignment, as it appears from the accounting before the referee that there was nothing either received or paid out after the date of the assignment. But, under the authorities, it seems to be unnecessary to inquire when it was either committed or judicially ascertained. When the assignment was made, in 1877, the bond had been given for three years, and that was the obligation which created her liability, and to it the devastavit, whenever judicially established, must be referred. De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C. 470. Besides, the liability as surety is not an independent debt, but grows out of and is "connected with the subject-matter" of the estate, and it seems to us that Mrs. Vaiden has no share in the estate until that liability is discharged. The assignment to *Duncan must be considered as subject to the liability of Mrs. Vaiden as surety on the administration bond.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to conform to the conclusion herein stated, and affirmed in all other respects.

20 S. C. 282

FIELDS v. HURST.

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃719.]

Objection was made by plaintiff to the hearing by the Circuit judge of defendant's exceptions to the referee's report; the objection was overruled and plaintiff excepted. After decree rendered, plaintiff filed exceptions thereto, but did not renew his exception to the hearing of defendant's exceptions to the referee's report. Held, that this question, not having been made a ground of appeal, was not properly before this court for review.

[2. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃267.]

No exceptions having been taken to an intermediate decree at the time, or after final judgment rendered, objections cannot be raised in this court to such decree.

[3. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃273.]

Exceptions not considered, because too general.

[4. Reference ⊂⊃99.]

The provisions of the code as to referee's reports apply especially to cases at law. References in equity causes are governed by the rules which prevailed under the old chancery practice. The force and effect of a referee's report, in all cases, stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃99.]

5. Findings of fact by a referee were reversed by the Circuit judge: the Circuit decree, upon these points, was sustained by this court. Mr. Chief Justice Simpson dissenting as to one of these findings of fact.

[6. Account ⊂⊃19.]

The Circuit decree, after allowing all proper items of debit and credit in an account, made a small balance in favor of plaintiff, but nevertheless dismissed the complaint upon the ground that they were substantially equal. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the balance ascertained in his favor in such statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃19.]

Before Hudson, J., Darlington, November, 1882.

The decree of the Circuit judge makes a full statement of the case. It was heard by him on the following exceptions by defendant Hurst to the referee's report: "1. Because the referee erred in his findings both of law and fact. 2. Because the conclusions of the referee are unsupported by the testimony, *and contrary to the law applicable to the same." Before the hearing, plaintiff's counsel objected that the exceptions were insufficient, and suggested nothing to be heard by his Honor. The case was ordered to proceed, and plaintiff excepted.

The decree was as follows:

This cause was heard by me, November 28th, 1882, upon exceptions to the report of the referee. As this is a decree upon the main issues in the cause, except as to preliminary points heretofore adjudicated, a brief history of the litigation betwixt the parties to the original transaction will not be inappropriate. In fact, such a summary is necessary to a proper understanding of the case. The litigation began twenty-two years ago, and the transactions giving rise thereto originated twenty-four or twenty-five years ago.

About the year 1857, one John Gatlin sold and conveyed the land described in the pleadings to one Jacob Kelly, and, to secure the purchase-money, took Kelly's notes —three in number, we presume, each for about $800; one, at least, was for that sum, and the land was sold for about $2,500. One of these notes for $800, some time afterwards passed into the hands of the present plaintiff, Matchet Fields. Hearing of this fact, and hearing also that there were against Gatlin in the sheriff's office various and sundry unsatisfied executions incumbering this land, Jacob Kelly became alarmed and dissatisfied, and expressed a desire to rescind the sale and regain possession of his notes.

An opportunity soon occurred to enable him to accomplish this purpose. In 1858, it was learned that Samuel F. Hurst desired to buy the land, and was willing to pay therefor about the sum contracted to be paid by Jacob Kelly, to wit, $2,500. To enable him to get a good title, an arrangement was entered into between Gatlin, Kelly, Hurst and Fields to the following effect: Kelly was to reconvey the land to Gatlin, and receive back his notes. Hurst was to give for the land a negro woman, valued at $1,000, and two promissory notes, the one for $825, payable January 1st, 1860, and the other for $850, payable January 1st, 1861, each bearing interest from January 1st, 1859. These notes, however, were to be made payable to Matchet Fields instead of to John

*Gatlin, and the bill of sale of the negro woman was likewise to be made to Fields.

It was further agreed that Fields should thereupon give to Hurst his bond for titles to the land in consideration of the negro woman and the notes; and to enable Fields to put himself in condition to make good title to Hurst, he was to have the land sold at sheriff's sale under the outstanding executions in the office against Gatlin, and bid the same in. Betwixt Gatlin and Fields it was agreed that Fields, having thus secured title, should hold the same merely to reimburse himself for any outlay of money on his part in buying up and extinguishing the liens in the sheriff's office. That so soon as he should thus re-imburse himself from the notes of Hurst, the balance, if any, should go to Gatlin. As for the negro woman, it was agreed that she, the title being in Fields, should nevertheless be delivered over to the use and benefit of Mrs. Gatlin, wife of John Gatlin, then an invalid.

The parties accordingly met, when the other notes of Kelly, besides the one then held by Fields, were delivered into the hands of Fields, who then surrendered all of them to Kelly, whereupon Kelly assigned his deed to the land to Gatlin, and delivered the same, thus indorsed, to him, thinking thus to reinvest him with title. The bill of sale of the negro woman and the notes were then executed by Hurst and delivered to Fields, who executed and delivered to Hurst his bond for titles. It is also in testimony on the last reference, that the terms of the agreement between Gatlin and Fields were also reduced to writing, to the effect aforesaid, and duly delivered, but that the same has been lost or destroyed in some way.

It may be as well to remark here, that throughout the long protracted period of this contention, and amidst all the conflict of testimony, the aforesaid terms of the agreement and statement of the transaction between the parties are sustained by the testimony generally, except the contention as to the first note of $800 of Jacob Kelly, which went into the hands of Matchet Fields, he contending that he had bought and paid for this note in gold, and that for this outlay he was also to be re-imbursed out of the notes of Hurst, whilst the defendants, and witnesses who are able to speak of the transaction, deny this, and state in substance that *he held this note only as security for money laid out for Gatlin on executions, or to be laid out, and that the notes of Hurst were taken by substitution for and indemnity for the same outlay. At least such is the inference that defendant's counsel ask this court to draw from the testimony. At all events, this $800 note of Kelly is the pivotal point of the contention.

During this year, 1858, Fields did pay several hundred dollars on executions against Gatlin, and, having this land sold at sheriff's sale, did purchase the same at and for the nominal price of $20, representing that he was buying the same for Gatlin's benefit, and was to pay off the executions in the office against him, thus enabling himself to buy it at this low price.

In due season, Hurst becoming ready to pay his first note, went, in company with Gatlin, James, the son of Jacob Kelly, a Mr. Lee, and perhaps another, to the residence of Matchet Fields, to pay this note, and to have a settlement of the indebtedness of Gatlin to Fields on account of money laid out and expended for Gatlin's benefit. Fields evaded a settlement, saying that his papers were at the court house, and that in their absence he could not come to a settlement. Thereupon, Gatlin, Hurst and the others repaired to the court house to ascertain what amount Fields had paid on executions against Gatlin. Finding no evidence of any payments, or at least of but small outlays, Gatlin forbade Hurst to pay anything to Fields, and insisted that, as no outlay had been made by Fields, Hurst should make payment to him and take title from him. Accordingly, Hurst did so, paying then the first note, and subsequently the second one, and took title from Gatlin and also a quit-claim deed from Kelly.

Afterwards, learning of these transactions, Fields threatened to seize the negro woman, and began suit on the notes of Hurst. To prevent Fields from collecting this money of Hurst, and to compel him to deliver up further claim to the land, Gatlin, in February, 1860, filed his bill in the Court of Equity for Darlington, and sued out an injunction. To this bill, strange to say, Fields made no answer until August 31st, 1868. During this interval, at various and sundry times, he obtained leave for further time in which to answer, the injunction in the meantime remaining of force, with not an effort to dissolve the same.

*The version of the contract given by Gatlin in his bill was strongly supported by affidavit of Jacob Kelly, Hurst, James Kelly, a Mr. Lee, a magistrate who drew the papers, and others. These facts, of course, are not evidence in this cause, and are only stated in narration of the course of litigation. In this answer to the bill, Fields gives his version of the contract and dealing of the parties, and avers that he bought and owned the $800 note of Jacob Kelly, and had settled in full with Gatlin and passed receipts, and that he was the sole and rightful owner of the negro woman and of the notes of Hurst, which had been wrongfully paid to Gatlin. Also, that he had perfect title to the land, having the sheriff's deed and also a quit-claim deed from Jacob Kelly. [Perhaps it is a mistake in me to say that Hurst had a quit-claim deed from Kelly.]

The cause stood thus on the docket of the Court of Equity, without a hearing, until 1871, when it was striken off. No further proceedings were had in relation to this contention until September, 1875, when, John Gatlin having died, Matchet Fields began this action against Samuel F. Hurst and the other defendants, some of them having, perhaps, been added by amendment. It should be here remarked that the defendant Harris purchased his part of the land from Hurst in 1862, and that Grantham bought his at some sheriff's sale—exactly when I don't discover from the answer or testimony. On January 8th, 1880, Grantham also took title from Fields, for $100, to his part, and on the same day Harris also took title from Fields for $500; and they, having also titles from all other claimants, are no longer concerned in the litigation.

Running over narration, the cause came on to be heard before his Honor, Judge C. P. Townsend, at the February Term, 1877, of this court, when judgment turned upon a technical issue—statute of limitations—and, being appealed from, was reversed by the Supreme Court and a new trial ordered. See 9 S. C. 277. The cause was then referred to J. J. Ward, Esq., as special referee, to hear and determine the issues of fact and of law. He heard the cause and non-suited the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed to the Circuit Court, and Judge Pressley held that the appeal should have been directly to the Supreme Court, but he recommitted it *to the referee with directions, if he saw proper, to give the plaintiff a rehearing.

The referee, after argument heard, granted a new trial and gave judgment for the plaintiff. To this the defendants excepted, and the case on exceptions was heard by Judge Kershaw, who, on August 1st, 1882, rendered his decree, in which, after passing upon various technical matters, he recommitted the case to the referee to ascertain the state of the accounts between Fields and Gatlin, holding, in effect, that Fields held the notes of Hurst in trust for Gatlin, as an indemnity to the said Fields for all moneys due him under the contract of 1858, and in trust to pay the balance to Gatlin. He orders the unsold part of the land to be sold to pay the balance so found to be due to Fields, if any, unless by a given day Hurst should pay the same.

This reference was accordingly held, and, after much testimony, the referee stated the accounts and reported a balance due by Gatlin to Fields, on January 1st, 1860, of $1,218.04. With interest to November 16th, 1882, this amounts to $3,324.50. As a credit, he has allowed Hurst $225 for use of the land by Fields' tenants for the three years last past, which being deducted, leaves a net balance, November 16th, 1882, of $3,099.50. The $600 which Fields got from Harris and Grantham he refused to allow as credit to Hurst because these men had also paid Hurst or Gatlin for their purchases—the payment to sheriff being considered payment to Gatlin.

The contest before me turns upon the $800 note of Kelly's charged against Hurst, alias Gatlin, and the refusal of the $600 credit. The referee who heard this case is an intelligent lawyer, and his findings of fact are entitled to great weight. In fact, those findings must stand unless they are discovered to be unsupported by the testimony, or against its manifest weight. I have, therefore, put myself to the trouble of reviewing the testimony with much care after listening to the earnest comments thereon of the learned and able counsel engaged in the cause.

The foregoing full recital of the history of the litigation through all its stages from beginning to end, has been given in order to bring before us in prominent shape the points at issue. To recite the testimony here would give to this judgment undue *length and tediousness. I shall be content here merely to give the impressions made upon my mind by a review of all the proceedings and pleadings and documents placed in evidence, and especially by the testimony of the living witnesses who, without objection, have been admitted to give testimony to the transactions with both the living and dead.

I conclude that the following facts are established either by undisputed testimony, or by the great weight of the evidence:

First. That John Gatlin, being in embarrassed circumstances, and wishing to relieve himself of his pecuniary troubles that were pressing him, sold his land with that view to Jacob Kelly, who bought on a credit, not knowing of the liens of outstandiing executions. To remove these liens and thus prevent impending sale, Gatlin transferred one of the Kelly notes of $800 to Matchet Fields, not for its value in money, but as a security to Fields for money which he agreed to apply to liens in the sheriff's office.

Second. Fields began to apply money to these liens, in the small and by part payments, so as to keep creditors quiet when impatience was manifest. Kelly, learning of the existence of these liens, and that Fields had one of his notes, very naturally became dissatisfied, and desired a rescission of the sale. It was then learned that Hurst would take Kelly's bargain off his hands.

Third. It was then arranged between Gatlin, Fields, Hurst and Kelly, that the trade with Kelly should be rescinded, and that Hurst should become the purchaser, at $2,575, of which $1,000 should be paid by delivering a negro woman, and the balance should be secured by the two notes as aforesaid, one for $825 and the other for $850. As Matchet Fields was the man with money, it was agreed that he should get title to the land; that to him should be given the title to the woman and the two notes of Hurst, and to the said purchaser of the land Fields' bond for titles should be given; that Fields should extinguish the executions in the sheriff's office, a part of which he had already made payments on upon the security of one of the Kelly notes. To secure and indemnify Fields for all moneys thus expended, he was to hold the title to the land and to the negro, and notes given by Hurst, with the understanding and upon the trust and *confidence, that when Hurst should pay the money, Fields should retain sufficient to pay himself for his expenditures, and account to Gatlin for the balance. Should Hurst fail to pay, then Fields should look to the negro woman and the land for pay; and if sold, he should, out of the proceeds, first pay himself, and then account to Gatlin for the balance.

Upon these terms the contract was consummated, the notes of Kelly were surrendered, and the obligations of Hurst were substituted, and Fields proceeded accordingly to pay further sums on the executions. The note of Kelly he held, not as a purchase, but as an indemnity. Had he paid the cash to Gatlin for this note, as he claims to have done, it is certain that the proceeds would have been promptly and gladly applied by Gatlin to the executions in the sheriff's office, and would have extinguished a much larger amount of those liens than Fields did extinguish from beginning to end, both while he held the Kelly note and after he got the larger security from Hurst. I only mention this as one circumstance amid the many in the case—to say nothing of the testimony of witnesses—going to show that the Kelly note was not bought by Fields, but was held by him only as an indemnity.

I am constrained, therefore, by what I conceive to be the great weight of the testimony and evidence in the case, to hold that the referee erred in charging this $800 note against Hurst and Gatlin in this accounting, and it must be stricken out. This item being erased from the account, there is left on the first day of January, 1860, due by Gatlin to Fields, for money expended by him for said Gatlin, and the interest thereon, the sum of $362.12; and this amount corresponds with the sum which living witnesses say that Fields did expend for Gatlin, and which Gatlin, in his bill in equity, alleged as the amount. He there stated that it was not over $400. Of course the allegation of that bill, and the denials in the answer, are not testimony, nor were they received as such; but I merely mention the fact that the testimony of living witnesses and the account thus corrected, corroborate what is averred in that bill, and which Fields took eight years' time to deny.
*Now, on January 8th, 1880, Fields received of Grantham, for part of this land, $100; and from Harris, for another part $500. The referee does not allow Hurst credit for this, chiefly because these men had paid either Hurst or Gatlin for their purchases, and because he did not think that the order of Judge Kershaw was broad enough to admit of such an item of credit. But it is manifest that whatever Fields realized out of the securities he held, viz., the land and the money obligations of Hurst, was that much payment of the outlay for Gatlin. Hurst is just as much entitled to have the proceeds of these sales by Fields to these men credited on his notes, or passed to the credit of the cestui que trust, Gatlin, as if the same had been realized from a sale of so much of this land under a foreclosure sale at the suit of Fields. This money must be entered as a credit in the account, as of the date January 8th, 1880.

Now, the sum of	$362 12
Int. from January 1, 1860, to January 8, 1880, is	508 00
Leaves due, January 8, 1880	$870 12
Deduct	600 00
Balance due, January 8, 1880	$270 12

Now, the referee has charged Fields with rent for 1880, '81 and '82, $75 per annum, which wants but little of extinguishing this balance.

Accurately estimated, the account will stand thus:

Balance, January 8, 1880	$270 12
Int. to January 1, 1881	18 50
	$288 62
Then paid	75 00
Balance, January 1, 1881	$213 62

*Balance, January 1, 1881, (bro't forward.)	$213 62
Int. to January 1, 1882	14 95
	$228 57
Then paid	75 00
	$153 57
Int. to December 1, 1882	10 74
	$142 83
Then paid	75 00
Balance due to date of decree	$67 83

But when we consider that Fields, during the life-time of Gatlin, refused to come to a settlement, and refused to take the money from Hurst, when he and Gatlin went to him and offered to pay every cent he had laid out and expended; that he refrained from instituting this suit until Gatlin was dead; and lastly, that he took advantage of Hurst's removal from the county, and, ousting his tenants, wrongfully took possession of this land of Hurst, pending this action, we do not deem that he deserves the most liberal and tender consideration at the hands of the court. The referee has failed to consider these circumstances in his estimate of what Mr. Fields should pay for the use of a place wrongfully taken possession of pending litigation. Our estimate is, that the six hundred dollars and three years' use and occupation of the land, fully repays him for the $362.12 which he expended for Gatlin twenty-four years ago, and which, twenty-three years ago, he refused to receive from Hurst when he offered to pay it.

It is, therefore, the judgment of the court that the plaintiff, Matchet Fields, is entitled to demand and receive nothing from Samuel F. Hurst on the notes in suit. It is further adjudged and decreed, that the said Matchet Fields do deliver up to the said Hurst, or his attorneys, the said notes to be canceled; and that he do execute and deliver within thirty days from this date to the said Samuel F. Hurst a warranty title in fee-simple to all the said tract of land, except the parts conveyed to the defend*ants Harris and Grantham. It is further ordered, that each party, the said Fields and the said Hurst, pay the one-half the costs of these proceedings, and that possession of said land be delivered up to said Hurst by the first day of January next.

From this decree, plaintiff appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his statements of the case are not supported by the facts and the evidence.

2. "Because the evidence does not support his Honor's finding as to the agreement between Matchet Fields and John Gatlin, and the finding of Judge Kershaw as to that agreement was the judgment of the court.

3. "Because it was error to overrule the finding by the referee that the Jacob Kelly note belonged to Matchet Fields, there being not only no overbearing testimony, but no testimony at all, to justify the finding of his Honor, while three living witnesses support the findings of the referee.

4. "Because there is not a tittle of testimony to support the finding of his Honor that Fields held this Kelly note as security for money laid out and to be laid out for Gatlin on executions in the sheriff's office, while the proof is abundant that Fields was the absolute owner of the note.

5. "Because it was error to use the ex parte statements accompanying the bill for injunction as evidence or corroboration of a theory on the facts—the bill only being introduced in evidence to show dates and the fact of injunction.

6. "Because it was error to allow Gatlin, or Hurst, the $600 which Fields got for his interest in the land sold to Harris and Grantham, Gatlin and Hurst having already received the full benefit of the sale of their entire interest therein.

7. "Because upon his Honor's own estimate there is a balance due Fields sufficient to carry costs, and it was error to adjudge nothing to Fields and half the costs against him.

8. "Because there is no evidence that Fields commenced this action after the death of John Gatlin, or that he, Fields, ever refused settlement with Gatlin, or was in any way derelict. And there is no evidence that

Fields wrongfully possessed himself of *the land in controversy, or ever got any benefit from it, but improved it.

9. "Because, if the contents of the bill of injunction was to be used at all, as it sought discovery, Fields' answer, being responsive to the bill, was conclusive until disproved by two witnesses."

Mr. B. W. Edwards, for appellant.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, contra.

February 19th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. [Omitting his statement of the case, which is fully stated in the Circuit decree.] In addition to the foregoing exceptions founded upon the decree of Judge Hudson, at the hearing of this appeal appellant's counsel undertook to review the decree of Judge Kershaw, claiming it to be an interlocutory or intermediate decree, and subject to review upon appeal from the final decree, citing Hyatt v. McBurney, 17 S. C. 143. And the appellant's counsel, in his argument, also raises and discusses the question, "Whether his Honor did not err in hearing the case on the exceptions taken to the referee's report." It is true this point was made below and, when overruled, was excepted to, but in the notice and grounds of appeal, this exception does not appear. It is a well-established rule that to authorize this court to consider any question on appeal, it must be made in some form, one of the grounds of appeal, and must be brought before us in some definite and distinct shape. It will not do simply to except below, but the question must be presented in the grounds, or exceptions brought up to this court, otherwise this court cannot know but that it has been abandoned, nor can the opposite party be expected to meet it. This question then not appearing in the grounds of appeal, we are not at liberty, under the rule referred to, to consider it, whatever may be the merit therein.

The same may be said as to the attempt to bring under our review the judgment of Judge Kershaw. No doubt this decree *was an intermediate decree. It was certainly not a final decree, and might have been made the subject of review here upon this appeal from the decree of Judge Hudson, which was a final decree, if it had been excepted to specifically or by specifying the grounds of error, if any, in the exceptions by which the case has been brought here; but this the appellant failed to do. There is no error alleged in the decree of Judge Kershaw except in the argument, nor have any exceptions thereto or notice of intention to appeal therefrom, ever been filed. It was too late at the argument. Cleveland v. Bryant, 16 S. C. 635; Pringle v. Sizer, 7 S. C. 134.

This brings us to the exceptions proper. The first, fifth, eighth and ninth are not very material. They do not affect the real questions involved, nor do they raise any question themselves necessary to be determined. The first is entirely too general, and is obnoxious to the same objection which the appellant made to the exceptions to the referee's report, and which he failed to pursue. The fifth and ninth refer to the use that was made of the bill in equity, &c. The judge in his settlement explains this satisfactorily. It seems to have been introduced in evidence by the appellant's counsel for a certain purpose and the judge says its use was confined to that purpose. The eighth seems to us wholly unimportant.

The appeal then must turn on the second, third, fourth and seventh exceptions. The second exception suggests a conflict between Judge Kershaw and Judge Hudson, as to the agreement between Fields and Gatlin. We do not see this conflict. It was held by both of the judges in effect, that Fields was a trustee holding the notes of Hurst as an indemnity until he was re-imbursed; Judge Kershaw said, for all his payments and expenditures on account of Gatlin; Judge Hudson said that Fields was to be re-imbursed for any outlay of money on his part in paying up and extinguishing the liens in the sheriff's office; but both seemed to understand that the $800 note, over which the most serious contest took place, was to be considered, and Judge Hudson did not exclude this on the ground that it was not one of the matters which, even though valid, could not be allowed under the agreement, because not one of the debts of Gatlin, *which Fields was to pay off; but he excluded it on the ground that the testimony failed to show that Fields had ever advanced money to Gatlin for said note. According to his idea, Fields held this note as an indemnity for moneys to be advanced for Gatlin on his debts, and that the Hurst notes were substituted in its stead when Kelly rescinded his trade and Hurst took his place as purchaser. So there is really no conflict between the two decrees on that subject.

The third and fourth exceptions raise substantially the same question, and that is whether the finding of the referee as to the $800 note should have been disregarded and overruled by the judge. When Judge Kershaw heard the case, after determining the principles upon which the contest should be decided, he recommitted the matter to the referee, Mr. Ward, to ascertain and report the balance due, if any, by the defendant Hurst upon his notes given for the purchase of the said land, after allowing the credits to which he is entitled under the agreement as adjudged by him. It will be observed from the recital of the substance of Judge Kershaw's order, that nothing but the finding of a certain matter of fact was referred to Mr. Ward, to wit, the balance due on Hurst's notes, after allowing the credits to be established. There was nothing for Mr. Ward to do but to ascertain the credits, and to deduct them from the notes. This involves nothing more than questions of fact.

Now, it is provided in the code, that when nothing more than a question of fact is referred to a referee, in such case his finding and report becomes a special verdict, or, rather, in the language of the code: "The report shall have the effect of a special verdict." Lynch's Code, § 296. Where the whole issue is referred, the report then stands as a decision of the court, and judgment may be entered thereon in the same manner as if the action had been tried by the court (Ibid.), subject to be reviewed on appeal under the provisions of section 292 Lynch's Code. To what court this appeal must be carried, in the first instance, is not now involved. But the report of the referee upon an issue of fact referred to him becomes a special verdict, and being a special verdict it is subject to be set aside, for any of the causes for which verdicts may be set aside, and the action of the judge in *reference to such a case, so far as this court is concerned, must be considered as in any other case where verdicts are vacated and a new trial ordered.

These provisions of the code, however, are understood to apply especially to referees appointed under the code in actions at law, and not to referees appointed in equity causes. These latter are governed by a different rule: the rule which prevailed under the old chancery practice, where cases were referred to the master, an officer of the court, or to a referee, or sometimes to a jury, to assist the court, and for its information. The case before us is an equity case. It is substantially for specific performance, a case of equity cognizance, and must be governed by the rules established in this court in the various decisions upon subjects of this character, all of which are found cited in the "note of the reporter" in 12 S. C., p. 609. And it belongs to that class where there is a difference between the judge and the referee upon the facts. In such case, this court will examine the decree, and either adopt or reject it, as the facts may warrant, to the same extent as a Circuit judge passes upon the report of the referee. The question, then, is an open question uninfluenced by the previous findings, and free from the operation of the rule adopted in other cases, that said finding will not be disturbed unless there is an absence of all testimony to support it, or the evident and overwhelming weight thereof is the other way.

Coming to the examination of the question of fact as to the $800 note as an open question, dependent entirely upon the force and effect of the testimony, we are constrained to support the finding of the referee. The question as to this note was, Did Fields advance the money to Gatlin for that note, or was it placed in his hands as an indemnity for such sums as Fields might thereafter pay for Gatlin? The testimony of the plaintiff Fields is positive upon this subject. He states, unqualifiedly, that he paid Gatlin the full amount of this note. His son, P. G. Fields, swears that he wrote the indorsement on the note by which it was transferred to Fields; that this indorsement was witnessed by himself and one Jesse Walker; that Gatlin told him that he owed his father the note and a great deal more. Jacob Kelly, the maker of the note, knew the fact that Fields *had become possessed of this note very soon after he had executed it to Gatlin, and on that account, in part, he became dissatisfied with the trade. He did not want Fields to have this note upon him, and he had charged Gatlin not to let Fields have it.

Now this is all the testimony that bears directly on the note. It is true that the character of Fields was assailed, not, however, with entire success. Three out of thirteen witnesses would not believe him on his oath, but six of the same thirteen would; but then there is no doubt that the note was indorsed to and delivered by Gatlin to Fields. He thus became the legal owner, with all the presumptions in his favor. These all seem too strong to be overturned by the theory of the defense worked out of circumstances not entirely pertinent to the question at issue. We think the preponderance of the testimony is with Fields, and that he should have been allowed this note on the computation of his claims against Gatlin.

We sustain the finding of the judge as to the credit of the $600 received by Fields from Harris and Grantham. The intent and purpose of the transaction in reference to the land was to indemnify and secure Fields, and whatever he received therefrom should redound to the credit of Gatlin. Harris and Grantham, after they had purchased from Hurst and Gatlin, found it necessary to pay Fields this $600 to obtain good titles. Fields has no claim to this except as a benefit to Gatlin. He had no interest in the land except through Gatlin, and whatever he received was really for Gatlin, and he should account for it in a settlement with Gatlin, which settlement the court ordered the referee to make. If Harris and Grantham purchased from Hurst and Gatlin on a mistake as to the title, and the consideration has failed, they may possibly have a claim against Hurst and Gatlin to be re-imbursed; but this does not release Fields from the necessity of accounting for the amount received by him.

We do not see upon what testimony the judge decreed that Fields was entitled to nothing, and that he should be dismissed with one-half of the costs of the proceedings. After throwing out the $800 note, and charging Fields with the $600 received from Harris and Grantham, the itemized accounting, as appears *in the decree itself, brought Gatlin in debt $67.83. (This amount should have been $89.31, as clearly appears from a mistake in the calculation of deducting the interest instead of adding it.) This balance is then expunged, upon the general statement that the $600 and the use of the land had sufficiently repaid Fields for the $362.12 found by the referee in his favor; yet the $600, and $75 per annum for three years' use of the land, had already been deducted from the $362.12 and interest, leaving this balance of $89.31 unpaid. The judge thought from the testimony that Fields had wrongfully taken possession of the land, and that the referee had not given sufficient consideration to this fact in estimating the value of the use and occupation of the land. This may be so; but this was not sufficient, as it appears to us, without further examination and testimony, to bring the parties exactly even, or to warrant a judgment that Fields was entitled to nothing.

I think upon the testimony that Fields should be allowed the $800 and interest; that his claims against Gatlin should be credited with the $600 received by him from Harris and Grantham, and that he should have judgment for whatever sum may then be found due, and that he should have his costs; and to this end that the judgment below should be reversed, and the case remanded to the end that a judgment in accordance herewith may be pronounced.

Mr. Justice McIVER. While I agree with the Chief Justice as to the other questions made in this case, I do not think the evidence is sufficient to warrant us in reversing the conclusion reached by the circuit judge as to the Kelly note for $800, and, on the contrary, think his conclusion is supported by the preponderance of the testimony.

There can be no doubt that the notes of Hurst were given to Fields, not as evidences of any debt due by the former to the latter, but simply to indemnify Fields against certain claims which he had against Gatlin. The burden of proof was, therefore, upon Fields to establish such claims. It was incumbent upon him to show that the note in question—the Kelly note—had been bought by him, and had thus become his absolute *property, and was not held by him merely as indemnity. Upon this point, as, indeed, upon almost every other point involved in this controversy, the evidence was conflicting, and when this is the case, as we have held in Maner v. Wilson, 16 S. C. 470, the conclusion reached by the circuit judge, even though adverse to that reached by the referee, must be regarded as prima facie the correct conclusion.

It does not appear distinctly when the plaintiff claims to have bought the Kelly note from Gatlin. The plaintiff, at one point in his testimony, says that he bought this note about twelve months before the transaction with Hurst, which, from the date of the Hurst notes, must have been on September 8th, 1858. At another place he says: "Bought the note in the latter part of '58 or first of '59, when the papers were fixed between him and Gatlin." P. G. Fields, the son of the plaintiff, says in his testimony that the note was indorsed by Gatlin to his father on April 18th, 1858, and that "witness and Jesse Walker were witnesses to the indorsement." This witness, when previously examined, fixed the date of the transaction between his father and Hurst at April 18th, 1858.

All of the witnesses, on both sides, agree in one thing—that when the transaction between Fields and Hurst took place, out of which the present controversy arises, the trade previously made between Gatlin and Kelly was rescinded, and Kelly's notes, given for the purchase-money of the land, were then surrendered to him; but there is no little conflict as to what occurred between the parties at the time. According to the testimony of the defendant Hurst, and his witness Lee, nothing was said by Fields when he surrendered the note which he had previously held on Kelly about his having bought the note, or about his having any absolute claim to it, although the plaintiff did, when last examined, claim to have mentioned the fact at that time. Nor does it appear that Fields set up any claim to have been the absolute owner of the note in question when the first note of Hurst fell due, and James Kelly, as the friend of Gatlin, with others, went to Fields for the purpose of having a settlement of what Gatlin might be due Fields. It seems, too, that Fields paid the largest judgment against Gatlin on October 22d, *1857, whether before or after the time he claims to have bought the Kelly note from Gatlin, his own testimony, and that of his son, leaves it doubtful, though it was certainly some time before the transaction with Hurst, and before the date (April 18th, 1858), fixed by his son.

It seems to me that the plaintiff's case rests entirely upon his own testimony, and upon that of his son; for according to my understanding of the matter, the testimony of Jacob Kelly affords no support whatever to the claim of the plaintiff. He only proves what is conceded on all sides—that Fields had one of the notes which he had given to Gatlin to secure the payment of the purchase-money of the land. He says: "From time I made bargain, I heard Fields was to get my notes. I charged Gatlin not to let him have them. He went and let Fields have one of my notes. * * * Gatlin went and left one of my notes with Fields." Now, when it is remembered that the character of Fields was, to say the least of it, proved to be not above suspicion; that he was an interested witness, testifying as to transactions with one whose mouth was closed by death; that his testimony was marked by numerous contradictions and inconsistencies, it is difficult to rest with confidence upon his statements, especially when contradicted by other witnesses of unimpeached character, some of whom are entirely disinterested, and when his statements are contradicted by the probabilities of the case.

If, as he alleges, he was the absolute owner of the Kelly note, it is scarcely credible that he would have surrendered it without taking something definite in its place. Why was it that he did not require from Hurst one note for the exact amount of the Kelly note, to say nothing of the fact that, as testified to by two witnesses, he did not even claim at that time to be the absolute owner of the Kelly note? Gatlin's object in selling the land seems to have been to get released from the pressure of judgments then subsisting against him; and why should Fields pay him $800 in cash, a sum, as the event has proved, more than sufficient to satisfy all the judgments against him, and, at the same time, undertake to satisfy such judgments? If it be true that Fields paid Gatlin in cash for the note, what security did Fields then have to indemnify him against any amounts that he *might thereafter pay for Gatlin, to say nothing of the judgment for nearly $200 which he had then paid, or which he, at least, paid before the transaction with Hurst? If Fields paid the judgment for $195.12 in favor of Moses & Haynesworth v. John Gatlin, before he got the Kelly note, it is scarcely conceivable that he would have paid Gatlin the face of the note in cash, as he says he did, without deducting the amount thus paid. But if he paid such judgment afterwards, then, according to his version, he held no indemnity whatever; and yet, when the transaction was made with Hurst, he seems to have required the most ample indemnity. Such conduct is entirely irreconcilable with all the probabilities of the case.

The inevitable inference from all the facts and circumstances of the case is that the Kelly note for $800 was originally "left" with him (to use Jacob Kelly's expression) as an indemnity against any amounts which he may then have paid or might thereafter pay for Gatlin; and that when it was agreed to rescind the land trade which Gatlin had made with Kelly, this note, together with the other notes of Kelly, were surrendered; and the notes of Hurst, together with the title to the negro woman, were given to Fields as a substitute for such indemnity. This, at least, is the version of the only really disinterested witness to the transaction—one in whom all the parties seem to have had confidence, as he was called upon to draw the papers.

I think it is a mistake to say that there is no doubt that Gatlin indorsed the Kelly note to Fields, who thereby became the legal owner, with all the presumptions in his favor; for, while this fact is testified to by P. G. Fields, the son of the plaintiff, it is contradicted, not only by Hurst but also by Lee, who is an entirely disinterested witness, so far as the issues in this action are concerned, and who, being a surety on the note, would, most likely, have examined it very closely. Then, too, the account which P. G. Fields gives of the manner in which such alleged indorsement was made is, to say the least of it, very extraordinary; and the failure to produce the testimony of Jesse Walker, alleged to have been the other witness to this rather unusual proceeding, who does not appear to have been in any *way interested or connected with any of the parties, to prove this fact so important to the plaintiff's claim, is not without significance.

Without going into a minute discussion of the testimony, but after a full and careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the case, I am unable to see any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court as to the Kelly note. But, as is shown in the opinion prepared by the Chief Justice, there is error in such judgment upon another point, I think the judgment of this court should be that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court with instructions to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, Samuel F. Hurst, for the sum of $89.31, together with interest thereon from the date of Judge Hudson's decree, and the costs of this case; and that unless the same be paid within a time to be limited in such judgment, then the lands described in the complaint, except such as have heretofore been conveyed to the defendants Grantham and Harris, be sold at such time and on such terms as the Circuit Court may prescribe, and the proceeds be applied first to the payment of the costs of this case, together with the expenses of such sale, next to the amount herein ascertained to be due to the plaintiff, and the balance, if any, be paid over to the defendant, Samuel F. Hurst.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur with the Chief Justice, except as to the Kelly note; but as to that, I agree with Judge McIVER. I think the claim that Fields paid cash for the note is inconsistent with the whole course of business between the parties.

Judgment reversed.

McLUCAS v. DURHAM.

[1. Partnership ⇐311.]

A partnership was dissolved by written agreement, one of the partners, M., taking all the assets and assuming to pay all the debts. At the time, there appeared upon the books certain deposits to the credit of one E., and also *an indebtedness by E., the balance in his favor being $700, and such balance was understood by the three partners to be the real indebtedness of the firm to E. But these deposits by E. having been of trust funds, judgment was recovered against the three partners for the full amount thereof, with interest. In action by M. against the other partners for contribution, E. being insolvent, held, that M. was liable for $700 of this judgment, and the three partners jointly for the balance. Before Kershaw, J., Marion, June, 1882.

This case is stated in the Circuit decree as follows:

This case was heard upon the testimony taken by the referee and the arguments of counsel. The following is a statement of the facts as I find them to be:

On September 1st, 1868, Solon A. Durham, William Evans and the plaintiff, John D. McLucas, entered into a copartnership for the transaction of mercantile business in the town of Marion, in the said State, under the name of S. A. Durham & Co. At several dates during the year 1869, while the copartnership continued, one Asa L. Evans deposited with the said firm the sums of money specified in the complaint, to wit: April 26th, $450; and June 22d, $1,076.51, and received therefor certificates of deposits from the firm, in the firm name, written by the plaintiff and signed by the defendant, S. A. Durham, acknowledging the deposit in each case and stating that the same should bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum and be subject to the draft of the said A. L. Evans at three days' notice. At the time of these deposits the rate of interest prevailing for the loan of money was something like twenty per cent. On March 11th, 1872, the said Asa L. Evans let the firm have the further sum of $1,000, for which he received the note of the firm payable July 1st, after date, to the order of said A. L. Evans, at Marion Court House, with interest from date at one per cent. per month.

During the existence of the copartnership, the plaintiff was the bookkeeper, and S. A. Durham and he were the managers of the business. William Evans took no part in conducting it.

On February 1st, 1873, the firm was dissolved, the plaintiff purchasing the interests therein of the other partners, assuming all the liabilities of the firm and receiving an assignment of all *the assets belonging to the same. This contract was by deed of indenture executed between the parties, a copy of which is attached to the answer of the defendant, Durham.

At various dates during the existence of the copartnership and up to the dissolution, Asa L. Evans and the firm of Evans & McRae, of which he was a member, drew money and bought goods on a credit, of the said firm of S. A. Durham & Co., to a considerable amount; so that, at the time of the dissolution, it was estimated by the plaintiff that he owed the firm within $700 of the amount due on the said note and certificates of deposit, and a statement was made out for the purpose of informing William Evans of the condition of the business with a view to the purchase of his share by the plaintiff, and the aforesaid contract of dissolution showing that the liability of the firm to said A. L. Evans was only $700.

The money deposited with the firm by A. L. Evans belonged to the estate of one Samuel F. Gibson, of which A. L. Evans was the administrator, and this fact was known to the plaintiff at the time of the deposits. Asa L. Evans, in accounting with said estate, turned over the said note and certificates of deposit as assets of the same, and a judgment was obtained after the dissolution of the firm, against all the members thereof in an action brought upon those instruments by the then clerk of the court, suing for the benefit of said estate, under the direction of the court. To the said action the accounts and liabilities of the said Evans and Evans & McRae due to the said firm were pleaded as a discount or counter-claim.

The jury allowed the discount to the amount of the note and interest and found a verdict for the plaintiff to the amount of the said certificates of deposit and interest, and judgment was entered accordingly for the sum of $2,362.47. A. L. Evans was then insolvent and had been since 1873. After the dissolution of the firm, William Evans died, and the defendant, John G. Blue, administered on his estate. Plaintiff claims to be placed in the same position as if the entire discount set up against the claims of A. L. Evans had been allowed, which would entitle him to have the defendants contribute to the payment of the judgment equally with him. There was no distinct agreement between A.

*L. Evans and the firm that his account and that of Evans & McRae should be allowed as a discount against the said deposits, but the plaintiff, and the defendant S. A. Durham, supposed and believed, at the time of the dissolution, that they would be so allowed as discounts, and the statement exhibited to William Evans was based upon that assumption, and he sold his interest upon that basis. They were all equally mistaken in this belief and there were no circumstances of fraud, misrepresentation, concealment or deception upon either part.

Upon these facts I conclude as matter of law that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief demanded. I add here my reasons for these findings and conclusions, so far as I deem necessary. One of the grounds upon which the plaintiff claims relief is the want of notice of the trust affecting the money deposited; that S. A. Durham had notice and did not communicate the same to him; that it was Durham's duty to inform him and his failure to do so led to his assumption of a liability in his contract of dissolution far in excess of that he supposed he did. If there had been such concealment, plaintiff's case would have been very strong against Durham. I have been constrained to find that plaintiff had notice of the trust. He seeks to avoid the effect of his contract of dissolution and purchase on the ground of mistake superinduced by the concealment of a fact by one of the copartners which it was the duty of the latter to communicate.

The affirmative and burden of proof is upon him. The testimony which he has produced to sustain this allegation of want of notice is overcome, or at least neutralized, by the testimony of A. L. Evans and S. A. Durham. A. L. Evans is disinterested and says in his testimony that he thinks the plaintiff was notified—"had no doubt of it." Durham, having no greater interest than plaintiff, testifies positively that plaintiff was informed that the money deposited belonged to the Gibson estate. Durham and plaintiff are equally credible and respectable witnesses. I am, therefore, compelled to find against the plaintiff on the ground of notice. There were some circumstances tending to corroborate the one and the other of them, but not enough to cast the beam on the side of the plaintiff.

*The question of law presented is, whether upon the facts found the mutual mistake of the parties is of such a character as to entitle the plaintiff to relief. It cannot be said to have been a mistake as to any fact existing at the time of the contract of dissolution. It was rather an erroneous opinion as to what would be the result of the transactions between the firm and A. L. Evans. It was a mistaken estimate as to the profits or advantages to accrue to the plaintiff, from the purchase shared in good faith by all the parties. They might all have believed that they had a valid discount to the amount claimed, which could be maintained in law, notwithstanding their notice of the trust. If so, it was a mistake as to the legal effect of the transactions.

The general rule (as is well known) is that mistakes of law furnish no ground for relief in equity, since all are presumed to know the law. 1 Story Eq., § 137. And the exceptions are said to be few in number and to have something peculiar in their character. Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. 15 [7 L. Ed. 27]; Bank of United States v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32 [9 L. Ed. 989]. In this State it has been supposed that there has been a departure from the rule, and that courts of equity will relieve against clear mistakes of law. Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McCord Eq. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667], has been cited at bar to establish this. But there Judge Colcock, who delivered the opinion, appears not to have gone further than to say that there are cases of mistakes in law in which the courts will grant relief, but he admits the general rule to be otherwise. He seems to rest that case upon the doubtful condition of law of mortgages after the acts of 1791 and 1797.

In the latter case of Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349, the executor and the legatees had agreed upon the settlement of an estate, and had actually settled upon the basis of an erroneous construction of a will. The error was mutual, and there was no circumstance of fraud, management or undue influence. The court refused to relieve against the settlement. Like this case, the error there was rather an error of opinion as to the legal effect of the transactions than a mistake either of fact or law. It seems to me that the plaintiff could with as much reason claim relief if any assets of the firm, estimated to be good at the time *of the dissolution, had since been ascertained to have been bad at that time, as demand it in this case. It is a case of hardship, but it will not do to make the defendants share it under the circumstances.

It is, therefore, adjudged that the complaint be dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs herein, to be adjusted by the clerk and inserted in the judgment, and that the defendants have execution therefor.

This case came to this court upon the following exceptions: Because his Honor erred in holding: "1. That there was no distinct agreement between A. L. Evans and S. A. Durham & Co., that his accounts and the accounts of Evans & McRae should be allowed as discounts against the certificates of deposit and the note. 2. That the plaintiff had notice that the money received by S. A. Durham & Co. from A. L. Evans, for which the certificates of deposit and note were given, belonged to the estate of S. F. Gibson. 3. That the defendant S. A. Durham was not chargeable with a failure to communicate his knowledge of the trust attaching to the money received from A. L. Evans to the plaintiff, his copartner. 4. That there was no 'mistake as to any fact existing at the time of the contract of dissolution,' when it is admitted on all hands, that no liability to the estate of S. F. Gibson was embraced in the statement upon which the contract was based, nor contemplated by any of the parties to the contract. 5. That the mistake in this case is not of such a character as to warrant the court in relieving the plaintiff from the hardship it entails. 6. Because his Honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff and the defendants should contribute equally to the satisfaction of the judgment in favor of the estate of S. F. Gibson against the members of the late firm of S. A. Durham & Co."

Mr. C. A. Woods, for appellant
Mr. W. W. Harllee, contra.

February 28th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*Mr. Justice McIVER. On February 1st, 1873, John D. McLucas, S. A. Durham and William Evans entered into a written agreement for the dissolution of a mercantile copartnership under the name of S. A. Durham & Co., which had existed since September 1st, 1868, a copy of which is set out in the "Case." One of the terms of said agreement was expressed in the following words: "The said J. D. McLucas further assumes all the liabilities incurred by the said firm of S. A. Durham & Co. since September 1st, 1868, and hereby obligates himself to pay and discharge said debts and liabilities out of the proceeds of the choses in action of the said firm, hereinafter transferred to him, and to use all due and proper diligence to raise money by means of said choses in action, and to apply it promptly, when collected, to the payment of said debts of said firm herein assumed by said McLucas."

One of the liabilities of the said firm, as it appeared on their books, was a balance due to A. L. Evans, amounting to $700, which arose in this way: the said A. L. Evans, at different times, deposited with the said firm of Durham & Co. considerable sums of money, which were credited to him individually on the books of said firm, and contracted large accounts upon the faith of such deposits; and the balance above mentioned was the difference between the amount of such deposits and the amount of the accounts due by him. There can be no doubt that when the agreement for dissolution was entered into, all the parties based their action upon the condition of the firm as shown by the books, and by a balance-sheet taken from the books and shown to William Evans, who does not seem to have been an active partner, and was not so familiar with the condition of the business of the firm, or with the books of the concern, as the other two partners, who had had the principal management of the business.

It turned out that the money deposited with the firm of Durham & Co. by A. L. Evans was not his own money, but belonged to the estate of Gibson, of which he was the administrator, though the money was deposited to his individual credit and not in his representative character, and there was nothing whatever on the books of Durham & Co. to indicate that such money belonged to *the Gibson estate, or that the firm was in any way indebted to said estate. Some time after the agreement for dissolution was entered into, A. L. Evans was required to turn over to the clerk of the court the certificates of deposit as part of the assets of the estate of Gibson, and an action was brought by him against S. A. Durham & Co. to recover the amount of such deposits, in which they attempted, unsuccessfully, to set up as a discount the amount of their claims against A. L. Evans; and judgment was recovered against said Durham & Co. for the sum of $2,362.47, the amount of said certificates of deposit with interest. The object of this action is to require the defendants to contribute their ratable proportion to the payment of said judgment, upon the ground that the liability thus judicially ascertained against S. A. Durham & Co. was not one of the liabilities which the plaintiff had assumed to pay under the agreement of dissolution.

The Circuit judge found as matter of fact that the plaintiff, as well as the defendant Durham, did have notice of the trust character of the money deposited with the firm by A. L. Evans; that, though there was no distinct agreement between A. L. Evans and the firm that his accounts should be allowed as discounts against the said deposits, yet "the plaintiff and the defendant S. A. Durham supposed and believed at the time of the dissolution that they would be so allowed as discounts, and the statement exhibited to William Evans was based upon that assumption, and he sold his interest upon that basis. They were all equally mistaken in this belief, and there were no circumstances of fraud, misrepresentation, concealment or deception upon either part." And as matter of law he found that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief demanded, and he therefore rendered judgment dismissing the complaint.

Accepting as correct the conclusions of fact reached by the Circuit judge, (inasmuch as there was a conflict of testimony, and it cannot be said that such conclusions are without any evidence to support them, or are manifestly against the weight of the testimony,) the only question remaining for us to decide is, whether, upon the facts so found, the plaintiff, as matter of law is entitled to relief. It is clear, from the facts as found, that the parties never intended that the plaintiff should assume the payment of *any debt to the estate of Gibson, for none of them knew of any such indebtedness at the time of the dissolution. It is equally clear that they all assumed that the amount of the indebtedness of the firm to A. L. Evans was only $700. The books showed no indebtedness whatever to the estate of Gibson, and only showed a balance of $700 due to A. L. Evans. It is manifest, therefore, that if the Circuit decree stands, the plaintiff will be required to pay some $1,600 more than he understood he was assuming to pay, and that much more than the other parties understood that he was assuming to pay. How, then, can it be said that the minds of the contracting parties ever meet upon such a result? And this is an essential ingredient in every contract.

It is true that the terms of the written agreement, by which the plaintiff assumed the payment of the debts of S. A. Durham & Co., are very comprehensive. "All the liabilities incurred by the said firm of S. A. Durham & Co. since September 1st, 1868." And if it stood alone, might be sufficient to embrace any debt, whether known or unknown, of the said firm. But the testimony leaves no doubt of the fact that such agreement was based upon the condition of the firm as shown by the books, or by the balance-sheet taken from the books. The plaintiff, in his testimony, says: "My assumption of the liabilities of the firm was based upon the statement [the balance-sheet] referred to above." Durham says: "Had a general idea of the books, my capital in the concern, and my liability to the firm; upon this I based my offer to McLucas." Certainly the balance-sheet was exhibited to William Evans before the agreement for dissolution was entered into, as he, not being an active partner, had no other means of ascertaining the condition of the concern; and such is the testimony. There is as little doubt that all parties understood, at the time the agreement was entered into, that the accounts of Evans were to be discounted against the amount of his deposits. This the Circuit judge has found as a fact, and that William Evans sold his interest with that understanding.

These facts being established "by proofs entirely satisfactory," equity will perform the written contract so as to make it conform to the precise intent of the parties. As is said in 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 152, "Sometimes, by mistake, the written agreement con*tains less than the parties intended; sometimes it contains more; and sometimes it simply varies from their intent by expressing something different in substance from the truth of that intent. In all such cases, if the mistake is clearly made out by proofs entirely satisfactory, equity will reform the contract so as to make it conformable to the precise intent of the parties." Applying this doctrine to the case in hand, the agreement for dissolution should be regarded as binding the plaintiff to assume the payment of the debts of S. A. Durham & Co., as they appeared upon the books of that concern, or upon the balance-sheet taken from the books; and, inasmuch as no debt there appeared to be due the estate of Gibson, and only a balance of $700 due to A. L. Evans, the plaintiff cannot be held to have assumed any liability to the estate of Gibson, beyond the balance there appearing to be due to A. L. Evans, which, in reality, inures to the estate of Gibson.

The result, therefore, is that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and that judgment should be rendered that the plaintiff pay the sum of $700 and interest on the judgment recovered by R. K. Clark as clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Marion against S. A. Durham, John G. Blue, as executor of the last will and testament of William Evans, deceased, and John D. McLucas, for the sum of $2,362.47, and that the plaintiff and the defendants herein are equally liable for the payment of the balance due on said judgment.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court with instructions to render judgment in accordance with the views herein announced.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, dissenting. I have not been able to concur with my brethren in this case, and I think its importance requires that I should make a short statement of the grounds of my dissent. The facts are so fully and carefully stated in the Circuit decree, that it is not necessary to do more *than give in general terms the relations of the parties and the character of the issue.

Solan A. Durham, John D. McLucas and William Evans did a mercantile business at Marion under the name and style of "S. A. Durham & Co." Durham purchased the goods, made sales and was generally the active member, McLucas was the bookkeeper, and Evans took no active part in conducting the business. During the year 1869, one Asa L. Evans, who was the administrator of the estate of one Gibson, and member of another mercantile firm known as "Evans & McRae," deposited with the firm of S. A. Durham & Co., money which he had in his hands belonging to the estate of Gibson, viz., on April 26th, $450, and on June 22d, $1,076.57, and received therefor certificates of deposit from the firm in his own name, which stated that the deposits should bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and be subject to the draft of Asa L. Evans at three days' notice. This transaction was had with Durham, the active member, who certainly had notice that the money deposited belonged to the estate of Gibson, and he claimed that McLucas also had such notice, but this McLucas denied. On March 11th, 1872, the said Asa L. Evans let the firm have the further sum of $1,000, for which he took the note of the firm, bearing interest at the rate of one per cent. per month. During all this time Asa L. Evans individually and Evans & McRae were running up a considerable account with S. A. Durham & Co., less, however, than the aggregate amount of the aforesaid deposits and note by about the amount of $700, but no settlement was made, the charges on both sides remaining open on the books of the firm.

Matters were standing in this condition on February 1st, 1873, when the firm of S. A. Durham & Co. was dissolved, the plaintiff, McLucas, agreeing to purchase the interest of the other partners, assuming all the liabilities of the firm and receiving an assignment of all the assets belonging to the same. This contract of dissolution was by deed executed by all the parties. It is long, containing many stipulations and mutual agreements, and among others that "the said Mc-Lucas further *assumes all the liabilities incurred by the said firm of S. A. Durham & Co. since September 1st, 1868."

Afterwards, the said Asa L. Evans, being pressed by those interested in the Gibson estate of which he was administrator, transferred the aforesaid certificates of deposit and note to the clerk of the court in discharge of his liabilities as administrator, and action was brought on them against the members of the late firm of S. A. Durham & Co. To this action McLucas, who had assumed the liabilities of the concern, pleaded as a discount the accounts of Asa L. Evans and of Evans & McRae, alleging that Evans before the transfer had expressly agreed that the matter should be set off, one against the other. The counterclaim was allowed to the extent of the note and interest, but not as to the certificates of deposit, which were recovered and judgment rendered for the sum of $2,362.47, which according to the terms of the deed of dissolution is a liability of McLucas alone.

Asa L. Evans and Evans & McRae turned out to be insolvent, and the accounts of S. A. Durham & Co. against them, worthless, and the plaintiff, McLucas, brought this action against his late partners, Solon A. Durham, and John G. Blue as executor of William Evans (who had died in the meantime), alleging that he purchased their shares in the firm with the belief and upon the understanding of all the parties, that the accounts against Asa L. Evans and Evans & McRae would, upon settlement, be discounted against the certificates of deposit, leaving really due in that regard, only about $700, instead of the large amount recovered as above stated, and praying that the defendants should be ordered, notwithstanding the terms of the deed of dissolution, "to satisfy said judgment and for such other relief as the court might think just," &c. The defendants insisted upon the terms of dissolution, alleged that McLucas knew as much of the condition of the business as they did, and that the contract was fair, without fraud, misrepresentation, concealment or deception of any kind.

It was referred to the master to state the facts, and the testimony is all printed in the brief. Judge Kershaw dismissed the complaint, saying that "There was no distinct agreement between A. L. Evans and the firm that his account and that of Evans & *McRae should be allowed as a discount against the said deposits, but the plaintiff and the defendant S. A. Durham supposed and believed, at the time of the dissolution, that they would be so allowed as discounts, and the statement exhibited to William Evans was based upon that assumption and he sold his interest upon that basis. They were all equally mistaken in this belief, and there were no circumstances of fraud, misrepresentation, concealment or deception upon either part. Upon these facts I conclude as matter of law that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief demanded. * * * One of the grounds upon which the plaintiff claims relief is the want of notice of the trust affecting the money deposited; that S. A. Durham had notice and did not communicate the same to him; that it was Durham's duty to inform him, and his failure to do so led to his assumption of a liability in his contract of dissolution far in excess of that he supposed he did. If there had been such concealment, plaintiff's case would have been very strong against Durham. I have been constrained to find that plaintiff had notice of the trust," &c.

From this decree the plaintiff appeals to this court, upon various grounds. The first four exceptions complain of error on the part of the Circuit judge in his findings of fact: First, that McLucas, the plaintiff, had notice that the money for which the certificates of deposit were given, belonged to the estate of Gibson; and, second, that there was no express agreement with Asa L. Evans that his account and that of Evans & McRae should be set off against the deposits. In a "chancery case" it is the duty of the Circuit judge to decide the facts, and when, after weighing the testimony, he has done so, this court, for obvious reasons, is disinclined to disturb his conclusions. It is possible that in the exercise of his judgment the Circuit judge may err, but the same thing may be said also of this court, and indeed of all human tribunals: but it concerns the interest of the community that there should be an end of litigation, and it has been found wise, upon the whole, to take as conclusive the honest judgment of the tribunal appointed to make the decision, only reserving the right to review and reverse in cases of plain error, or flagrant injustice.

*The rule was very satisfactorily stated by Mr. Justice McIver in the unreported case of Gary v. Burnett, 16 S. C. 633: "Before this court will reverse the findings of fact by a Circuit judge, even where based upon written testimony, we must be satisfied that the clear result of undisputed testimony points manifestly to a different conclusion from that reached by the Circuit judge. Where the testimony is conflicting and the Circuit judge has, upon weighing it, reached a conclusion which can be supported by the testimony, we will not interfere, although there may be other testimony in the case pointing to a different conclusion. We are not to substitute our judgment for that of the Circuit judge as to the comparative weight of the testimony. It is only where there is no testimony to support his conclusion, or where manifest error is shown, that this court will undertake to overrule a finding of fact by a Circuit judge."

I have carefully read the testimony in this case, and can not say that there is no testimony to support the conclusion of fact reached by the judge. On the contrary, I think his conclusion may very well be supported by a review of all the testimony. I agree with him that the testimony did not make out an express agreement that the accounts and the deposits should be set off, one against the other pro tanto. Even the plaintiff himself, in his testimony, used no expression stronger than "understanding," which is a vague term, and does not necessarily mean a distinct contract between parties. It seems to me probable that all the parties took it for granted that such would be the result. Evans certainly did when he deferred a settlement on the ground, "that the firm would owe him a balance on settlement," but as Asa L. Evans was not then known to be insolvent, they did not think it necessary that there should be an express contract on the subject. It is true that Durham & Co. contracted no liability in terms with the estate of Gibson, but they did to Asa L. Evans, with the knowledge that the money he deposited belonged to that estate, and their liability to the estate was the incident and legal result of that transaction.

The facts being considered settled, as found by the judge, it does not seem to me that there was error in the law as held by him. The general rule undoubtedly is, that a mistake in law *furnishes no ground for relief, as all persons must be presumed to know the law. It is not necessary to go into the vexed question, whether the court will undertake, in a certain class of cases, to grant relief for a mistake as distinguished from mere ignorance of the law. I cannot distinguish this case from that of Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349, cited by the Circuit judge. In that case the parties had agreed upon the settlement of an estate and had actually settled upon the basis of an erroneous construction of a will. Upon bill filed to correct the settlement, confessedly erroneous, the court refused relief, and I do not think it necessary in this case to say more than to cite and adopt what was said by Chancellor Dargan, in pronouncing what was made the unanimous judgment of the old Court of Appeals in Equity:

"Is there any authority which goes so far as to say that a party is entitled to relief from a mistake of law when there is no fraud, misrepresentation, management or undue influence, and where the mistake was simply his own erroneous construction of a will or deed? In this case the parties seeking relief had the will before them. They were familiar with its provisions. The defendant did not seek, in any way, to impose their construction of it upon the complainant. It does not appear that they expressed any opinion as to its proper construction. * * * Where one interested in a will undertakes to construe it for himself, and construes it erroneously, or adopts the erroneous construction of another, and predicates a settlement and discharge on such construction, he is not entitled to open the settlement in consequence of such errors. He must abide the consequences of his misconstruction, provided of course there is no fraud, management or undue influence employed to inveigle him into the settlement. The case is not materially altered where both parties have fallen into the same error. A misconstruction, like that made out in this case, is rather an error of the judgment, than a mistake either of the law or of fact. The simple misconstruction of a will or deed, where there is no fraud or circumvention, cannot be regarded in any point of view as coming within the scope and authority of those cases where mistakes of *law, in contradistinction to ignorance of law, have been considered as affording grounds for relief," &c.

In this case McLucas certainly agreed to pay all the liabilities of the concern. Whether the claim of the Gibson estate was one of these liabilities was a pure question of law, as to which the parties assumed to act on their own judgment. If they had taken advice they might have been correctly informed. It seems to me only another form of stating the same proposition to say, that the parties understood, as a matter of fact, that there was only due $700 on the deposits of Asa L. Evans. In the case of Cuningham v. Cuningham, [next succeeding this,] this court refused to reform a deed of land which was clearly executed under a mistake as to the proper construction of a will. The difference between ignorance and mistake of law seems to me to be very shadowy, and I find that if the court undertakes to give relief in cases of alleged mistake of law, made by parties relying on their own judgment, the result will be to introduce great confusion and uncertainty as to the rights of parties. I think the judgment below should be affirmed.†

CUNINGHAM v. CUNINGHAM.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Wills ⟸597.]

A testator, by the second clause of his will, gave certain lands and slaves to his widow for life, with remainder to his son and daughter should they both survive their mother; by the third clause, other lands and slaves to his daughter for life, with remainder to his son; and by the fifth clause, the balance of his lands and slaves to be equally divided between his widow, his son and his daughter, "the shares of my wife and daughter in said lands and slaves to be held subject to the same trusts and limitations as are provided in the second and third clauses of this will." Held, that upon the death of the widow, the two children surviving, the daughter took an absolute estate in the lands devised to the widow for life in the second and fifth clauses of the will.

A woman having, with her brother, a joint estate in a tract of land under her father's will, but believing that she had only a life-interest in a moiety with remainder to her brother, conveyed to him in fee her interest in one-half of the tract after division, and took from him a conveyance of his interest in the other half for the term of her natural life. Held, that there was no ground for reforming these deeds, and that after the sister's death, one-half of the part taken by her in the division remained the absolute property of her brother, and the other half passed under her will to her devisee.

[This case is also cited in Brock v. O'Dell, 44 S. C. 36, 21 S. E. 976, without specific application.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Laurens, February, 1883.

Hon. T. B. Fraser, Circuit judge, sat in the place of the chief justice, who had given an opinion in the case while at the bar. This case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

Robert Cuningham died in Laurens county, in 1859, leaving in force his last will and testament, and leaving surviving him, his widow Louisa, his son John, the defendant, and his daughter Pamela, referred to in the pleading and testimony as Ann Pamela. The widow, son and daughter were nominated executor and executrixes of said will. The main issue in the above action involves a proper construction of the second, third and fifth clauses of the will of Robert Cuningham, as follows:

"Second. As I have heretofore given to my son, John Cuningham, one thousand acres of land and forty-five slaves, with stock and other personalty, I now give to my beloved wife, Louisa Cuningham, during her natural life, one thousand acres of land, to be laid off so as to include my homestead and forty-five slaves; also, one-half of my stock of every description, and one-half of my household and kitchen furniture, wagons, planta*tion tools, and so forth, which may be necessary for carrying on a farm, and at her death the said land, slaves and their increase, and other property to be equally divided between my son, John Cuningham, and my daughter, Pamela Cuningham, should they both survive their mother, and if not, then to the survivor, provided, however, that should either or both of them die before their mother, having issue living, such issue shall take and receive the share to which their parents would have been entitled if living.

"Third. I give and bequeath to my daughter, Pamela Cuningham, my Dry Fork tract of land containing one thousand acres of land and forty-five slaves, together with the remaining half of my stock, household and kitchen furniture, wagons, plantation tools, and other articles necessary to the conducting of a farm: but should my said daughter die without issue living at her death, then it is my will that the same lands, slaves, and other property shall go to my son, John Cuningham, should he survive his sister, and if not, to such issue as he may have living at the death of my daughter.

"Fifth. It is my will that the balance of my land and slaves be equally divided between my wife, son and daughter; the land to be so laid off to them in such manner as may be most beneficial and convenient to the several tracts before given to them respectively. The shares of my wife and daughter in said lands and slaves to be held subject to the same trusts and limitations as are provided in the second and third clauses of this will." In a division of the balance of testator's land, under the fifth clause, 627 acres were allotted the widow, and a similar number of acres to the son and daughter respectively.†

Testator's widow, Louisa, died intestate, October 6th, 1873, leaving surviving her the defendant, her son John, and her daughter Pamela, the latter never having married. It appears that testator before his death disposed of the Dry Fork plantation devised to his daughter Pamela in the third clause of his will. After testator's death the defendant, John Cuningham, sold and conveyed to the widow and Pamela 785 acres of the land given him by his father. The widow, before her death, *conveyed to Pamela her half interest and Pamela thereby became seized and possessed of the 785 acres tract of land of which she died seized and possessed. Testator, in the sixth clause of his will, authorized his wife and children to select their own mode of making division.

After the death of the widow, Louisa, the defendant and his sister, Pamela, selected three citizens of Laurens county to divide between them the 1,627 acres devised and allotted to the widow for life. These commissioners, so selected, divided said land by allotting to defendant, John, 867 acres thereof, and to Pamela the balance of 760 acres, including the homestead. In January, 1875, defendant and his sister, Pamela, mutually selected their cousin, the Hon. B. C. Yancey, to draw deeds of conveyance to the tracts respectively allotted to be interchanged between them. Mr. Yancey drew the deeds, each reciting the provisions of Robert Cuningham's will, in the event that defendant and Pamela survived their mother. The deed so drawn and executed by Pamela to the defendant conveyed all of her interest in law and equity under her father's will to the 867 acres, whilst the deed from defendant to Pamela conveyed his interest in the balance of 760 acres for life only, under his father's will.

After said interchange of deeds in said division, on May 1st, 1875, Pamela Cuningham died, never having married, leaving of force her last will and testament, dated April 13th, 1871, wherein she gives (bequeaths) to her nephew, Clarence, the plaintiff (who is a son of defendant) "all of the property which I hold in my own right at the time of my death," subject to payment of certain legacies. Edward Noble qualified as executor of her will. After the death of his sister, about January 1st, 1876, the defendant, claiming as remainderman, under his father's will, and in accordance with his deed to his sister, on the division aforesaid, took possession of the 760 acres of land, and has ever since occupied and cultivated said tract of land.

On July 24th, 1882, the plaintiff, as devisee under the will of his aunt, Pamela Cuningham, brought the above-entitled action, alleging that under the will of his grandfather, Robert Cuningham, as devisee of Pamela he is entitled to the one-half in fee of the life-estate of Louisa, the widow of Robert Cun-

ingham. *Plaintiff prays that the deed from defendant to Pamela for 760 acres in the division aforesaid may be reformed on the ground of mistake, error and inadvertence, so as to pass the fee instead of a life-estate, and that defendant be required to surrender to plaintiff said 760 acres of land, and that he account to plaintiff for rents and profits since January 1st, 1876.†† The plaintiff also demands that defendant do account for the personal property of the life-estate of the widow that went into his possession. The defendant insists that his sister, Pamela, took but a life-estate under the will of Robert Cuningham; but even if he should be mistaken in this view, that the court will not now open the settlements made between himself and sister, Pamela, and pleads the statute of limitations and laches as a bar to the relief demanded by plaintiff. It was referred to the master to take testimony in regard to all the issues of fact, and report the same to the court.

As the defendant and his sister, Pamela, both survived the widow, I must conclude and decide that upon the death of the widow they each took a fee in one-half of the 1,000 acres of land devised the widow for life under the second clause of Robert Cuningham's will.

† It was conceded that Ann Pamela held this 627 acres only for her life.

†† Or else that the entire life-estate of Mrs. Louisa Cuningham be partitioned between the plaintiff and defendant.—REPORTER.

The interest or estate of Pamela in the additional 627 acres allotted to the widow depends upon the construction of the fifth clause of said will. In the fifth clause, testator directs that the shares of the wife and daughter in the balance of the lands and slaves therein devised, "be held subject to the same trusts and limitations as provided in the second and third clauses of this will." It will be observed that the provision made by testator for his wife and daughter, as well as the limitations in the second and third clauses, are separate and distinct. It seems to me that the trust and limitations imposed by testator in the fifth clause must be referred to and construed in connection with the provision made for wife and daughter respectively in said second and third clauses. The widow certainly took the 627 additional acres of land allotted to her of the remaining lands devised under the fifth clause, upon the same *limitation that attached to the devise of the 1,000 acres in the second clause. The defendant and Pamela both surviving the widow, I must conclude and decide that they were each entitled to a fee in the one-half of the 1,627 acres of land devised and allotted to the widow for life. This construction gives effect to each and every clause of testator's will, and is consistent with the intent as deduced from the words of the will.

Having concluded that the fee to one-half of the 1,627 acres was in Pamela, is the plaintiff, as devisee, entitled to have the settlement in January, 1875, between defendant and Pamela, opened? So far as the conveyance from defendant to Pamela of the 760 acres is concerned, no question has been made as to the right of the plaintiff to bring this action. The plaintiff bases his claim for relief upon the ground that Pamela, in said division or settlement, accepted the deed from defendant for life by mistake, error and inadvertence. There is neither allegation nor proof that defendant was guilty of fraud, misrepresentation or concealment in the division of the mother's life-estate between himself and his sister, Pamela. It appears that the defendant was not present when Mr. Yancey drew the deeds to be interchanged in this settlement, he having been detained at that time in Brooklyn by sickness.

The authorities draw a distinction between ignorance of law and a mistake at law. Where a party acts in ignorance of law, he is passive, and does not presume to reason. As ignorance cannot be proved, the courts cannot relieve on account of such ignorance. Mistake at law, however, is susceptible of proof, and the court will afford relief where such mistake is palpable or clearly established. In the cases of Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bailey 623 [23 Am. Dec. 155]; Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McCord Eq. 463 [16 Am. Dec. 667], and Executors of Hopkins v. Mazyck, 1 Hill Eq. 250, relief was granted where the party acted upon the erroneous advice of counsel. In the case of Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349, it was held that where an executor and legatee honestly misconstrued the will, and had a settlement based upon such misconstruction, the court would not open the settlement. In that case it was held that ignorance of law or error of judgment does not afford ground for relief.

*The testimony does not disclose the motive that prompted Pamela, at the time of the settlement, to accept from defendant the conveyance of the 760 acres of land for life. It cannot be determined satisfactorily from the testimony whether Pamela then acted upon the erroneous advice of counsel as to her right under her father's will, or upon her own erroneous misconstruction of her rights under said will. Mr. Yancey testifies that Pamela did not ask him to construe her father's will for her at the time he drew the deeds. He states that her mind was not impaired; that he conferred with Pamela as to the deeds, and she approved of the deed for 760 acres he drew for the defendant to sign. G. W. Calhoun, a witness for the defense, testified on cross-examination, without objection, that he had heard Pamela say that counsel had advised her that she took only a life-interest under her father's will, but the witness did not fix the time of such conversation. Mr. Yancey testifies that he heard Pamela express dissatisfaction with the provisions of her father's will, but this was before the settlement; and this witness testifies that he did not know that Pamela ever advised with counsel as to her rights under her father's will.

The recitals in the deeds between the parties, as well as the terms employed by Pamela in devising to plaintiff "all the property she held in her own right at the time of her death," indicate that both defendant and Pamela, in said settlement, acted upon a misconstruction of the rights of Pamela under the will of Robert Cuningham. Whether such misconstruction was the result of Pamela's erroneous judgment, or the erroneous judgment of counsel, does not satisfactorily appear from the testimony. I am, therefore, constrained to conclude and decide that plaintiff has failed to establish, at the time of settlement, such a mistake at law as would entitle him to have said settlement opened, or the deed from defendant for the 760 acres to Pamela for life reformed, as demanded in his complaint.

Under the deeds of settlement between defendant and Pamela, whilst Pamela has released and conveyed to the defendant the fee to which she is held to have been entitled in one-half of the 867 acres, the defendant being entitled to the fee in the balance or other half of the 867 acres, it does not appear that, in said *settlement, the said Pamela ever released or conveyed to defendant the fee in the one-half of the 760 acres to which she was entitled. The plaintiff, as devisee, must be held entitled to the fee in the one-half of the 760 acres retained by Pamela, and not released or conveyed by her in said settlement with the defendant.

As the settlement between defendant and his sister appears to have been made in good faith under a mutual misconstruction of their father's will, and defendant took possession of the 760 acres of land after his sister's death under said misconstruction, I conclude and decide that defendant should only account to plaintiff for the one-half of the rents and profits of said land from July 24th, 1882, the date of the commencement of plaintiff's action. Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 368.

The widow died October 6th, 1873, and her daughter, Pamela, administered on her estate. The testimony does not sustain plaintiff's demand against defendant for an accounting of the life-estate of the widow alleged to have gone into defendant's possession. The plea of the statute of limitations, however, must be held to bar plaintiff's right to require such accounting.

It is ordered and adjudged that plaintiff, as devisee of Pamela Cuningham, and the defendant, are each entitled to the fee in one-half of the 760 acres of land embraced in deed from defendant to Pamela Cuningham, January 9th, 1875, and that a writ do issue to divide and partition said tract of land between plaintiff and defendant, allotting to each the one-half thereof in value. It is further ordered and adjudged that defendant do account to plaintiff before C. D. Barksdale, master for Laurens county, for the one-half of the rents and profits of said 760 acres of land from July 24th, 1882, and that it be referred to said master to ascertain and report to the court the amount of rents and profits ascertained to be due plaintiff under this decree. It is further ordered and adjudged that plaintiff is not entitled to the relief demanded in his complaint, except as hereinbefore ordered, adjudged and decreed.

The plaintiff appealed from this decree on the following grounds:

*1. "Because his Honor held that the plaintiff, as the devisee of Miss Ann Pamela Cuningham, was barred from claiming one-half of the 867 acres of land conveyed in fee by said Miss Cuningham to the defendant, who, in consideration therefor, took a conveyance from the defendant of a life-estate in 760 acres, said interchanged deeds having been executed, as plaintiff alleged, under a palpable mistake of law in regard to their rights under the will of their father, Robert Cuningham. Said allegation of mistake, it is respectfully submitted, was supported by proof clearly establishing the mistake.

2. "Because his Honor erred in not holding and decreeing that said interchanged deeds, dividing 1,627 acres, were executed under a palpable mistake of law in construing the will of said Robert Cuningham, and should be set aside, said will devising in fee, in remainder, 1,627 acres between defendant and the said Miss Cuningham, at the death of their mother, Mrs. Louisa Cuningham, who had a life-estate therein.

3. "Because his Honor, it is respectfully submitted, erred in holding that the proof submitted did not clearly establish a palpable mistake of law on the part of said Miss Cuningham, plaintiff's devisor, induced, according to the uncontradicted proof, by the erroneous legal advice of eminent counsel, given at her solicitation, but for which advice, inducing the mistake, she would never have been a party to the interchanged deeds.

4. "Because his Honor should have granted one or the other of plaintiff's prayers, either to have decreed the deed for 760 acres be reformed, so as to give a fee instead of a life-estate to plaintiff's devisor, or to have set aside both deeds and ordered a partition of the 1,627 acres equally between the plaintiff, as devisee, and the defendant, according to the will of the said Robert Cuningham."

The defendant appealed on the following grounds:

I. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the testatrix, Pamela Cuningham, had a fee-simple interest in any portion of the 1,627 acres of land.

II. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that she had elected to take a life-interest in the 760 acres of land, and that *the plaintiff is bound by said election, and is estopped from claiming what his testatrix acquiesced in and did not set up any title to.

III. "Because his Honor erred in holding that Pamela Cuningham died testate as to the 760 acres of land or any portion thereof.

IV. "Because his Honor erred in disregarding the testimony which showed that Robert Cuningham, by his own construction of his will, designed thereby only a life-estate for Pamela Cuningham in any of his property, and that Pamela and John Cuningham so thus understood the scheme or meaning of that will, and acted upon that construction.

V. "Because his Honor erred in excluding or disregarding the testimony of G. W. Calhoun, which proved that Pamela Cuningham had not, in her will, intended, and never intended, to devise to plaintiff any estate or interest in the land held by her mother for life.

VI. "Because his Honor erred in stating or ruling that no objection had been taken by defendant to plaintiff's right to bring this action.

VII. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that the settlement or division between the defendant and Pamela Cuningham was a quit-claim to, and surrender of, any estate, except for life, in the 760 acres of land to John Cuningham."

Mr. Edward Noble, for plaintiff.

Miss Cuningham took a fee-simple in remainder in the lands given to her mother for life by Robert Cuningham's will. Parol evidence is inadmissible to show testator's intention. 5 Rich. Eq. 107; 15 S. C. 357. The interchanged deeds of January, 1875, do not estop plaintiff from claiming the fee. 3 Bl. Com. 308; 13 S. C. 370; 15 S. C. 352, 362; 2 Bail. 649; 2 McCord Ch. 455. Testatrix did not die intestate as to the 760 acres, her will covering all of her estate, and this being a portion of her estate. The interchanged deeds, having been executed under a palpable mistake of law, induced by the erroneous advice of counsel, should be reformed or set aside. 2 McCord Ch. 463; 2

Mr. John Cuningham, same side.

February 1st, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. [Statement of facts is omitted, as it has been already fully given in the Circuit decree.] None of the grounds of appeal bring up for the consideration of this court any questions concerning the personal property included in the life-estate of Mrs. Cuningham, or as to the order for account of the rents and profits, and these matters need not be referred to. The only questions which remain are those affecting the *title of the 867 acres and the 760 acres of land. They are as follows:

1. What is the proper construction of the second, third and fifth clauses of the will of Robert Cuningham?

2. What is the proper construction of the will of Pamela Cuningham, and what interest did plaintiff take under it in this land, if any?

3. Is it competent to use parol or any extrinsic evidence to control or aid in the construction of these wills, as to the matter before the court?

4. Did Pamela or John Cuningham, or either of them, in making the division of the land, in January, 1875, act in ignorance or under a mistake of law as to what were their rights in the land covered by their deeds of that date?

5. Was there any ignorance or mistake which is a ground of relief in this court?

6. Is Clarence Cuningham, as devisee of Pamela Cuningham, estopped from setting up any claim to the fee in consequence of her accepting a conveyance for life only in the 760 acres from John Cuningham?

When John Cuningham survived his mother, Louisa, who died in 1873, it can scarcely admit of a doubt that he took under the second clause of Robert Cuningham's will a fee in one-half of the 1,000 acres of land given to her for life. The only contingency in reference to his interest at her death was as to his having died before her, in which event his issue, if any, were substituted in his place to his share. Precisely the same words are used as to Pamela, and, having survived her mother, she took also a fee in remainder. Upon the words of the will itself, the matter is too plain for argument. Whether parol or extrinsic evidence of any kind can control this will be considered hereafter. The wife and daughter, however, each received in the division, under the fifth clause, 627 acres of land "subject to the same trusts and limitations as are provided in the second and third clauses." Now, in the second clause, the life-estate is in the widow, and the period of distribution is her death, and then to the survivor of John and Pamela, or both, if they both survive, the issue of either who had died in her life-time to be substituted. *In the third clause, the life-estate is in Pamela, and at her death without issue the property goes to John if living, and if not to his issue.

The construction which would hold Pamela's share under the fifth clause subject to the limitations in the second, or the widow's share under that clause subject to the limitations under the third, would lead to such confusion in construction as would make it impossible to carry out the will. It would not be possible, on this construction, to say at what period the fee, as to a part of it at least, became vested in John Cuningham, and the right of his children or issue to be substituted in his place lost. The only view which seems clear of difficulties is, that the widow and daughter took under the fifth clause, subject to the trusts and limitations as to them respectively in the second and third; and that the 627 acres was held by the widow in the same way as the 1,000 acres under the second clause; and as John and Pamela both survived her, they each took a fee in one moiety thereof. So much for the will itself.

The next question of construction is as to what passed to Clarence Cuningham under the will of Ann Pamela Cuningham. The words of the will are very comprehensive by which the testatrix gave her property to the plaintiff: "All the property which I hold in my own right at the time of my death." A will now speaks at the death, as well to realty as to personalty, and as if to provide against any doubt as to what was intended, the time of her death, and not the date of the will, or even of the codicil, is chosen as the period to which is referred the ownership of the property intended to be covered by the terms of the will. These words cover everything, and would cover even after-acquired property as well as property in which, as in the land here in question, the testatrix had a contingent interest—an interest in her own right, if the contingency happened, as it did.

Is there anything in either of these wills as to the matters before the court to justify a resort to parol or extrinsic evidence? It might not be amiss to refer to some of the authorities on this subject. We find in the general rule of construction laid down by Jarm. Wills (vol. III., p. 705,) the following rule: "That extrinsic evidence is not admissible to alter, detract from or add *to the terms of a will (though it may be used to rebut a resulting trust, attaching to a legal title created by it, or to remove a latent ambiguity) arising from words equally descriptive of two or more subjects or objects of gift." We find the same rule substantially in Abbott's Trial Evidence, § 105, where there is an "equivocal designation of the beneficiary," or "A similar ambiguity as to the property given." "And it cannot be made admissible even by showing that the testator did not own the parcel designated in the will, and did own another, and that the draftsman made the mistake." Id., § 102.

The rule is laid down in Wigr. & O'H. Wills 14, in these words: "Where the object of the testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition (i. e. person or thing intended), is described in terms applicable indifferently to more than one person or thing, evidence is admissible to prove which of the persons or things so described was intended by the testator." This kind of evidence can be admitted when it "merely tends to explain and apply what the testator has written, and no evidence can be admitted which merely shows what he intended to write." McCall v. McCall, 4 Rich. Eq. 455 [57 Am. Dec. 733] quoted, approved and applied in Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 357. There can be no doubt as to what persons were intended in either of these wills, or what property is covered by the language used. There is no latent ambiguity which calls for extrinsic evidence as to either the persons or property, and the conclusions reached as to the proper construction of the wills themselves cannot be controlled by any testimony which has been offered as to any intentions not expressed in the wills themselves.

It may be admitted, for the purposes of this case, that John and Pamela Cuningham were ignorant, or fell into a common error, as to their rights under the will of Robert Cuningham; and that the deeds of January, 1875, were executed by them under an impression that Pamela had only a life-estate in one-half of the 1,627 acres. It is more than probable that they reached this conclusion from what they knew of the wishes and general purposes of their father from himself, and not from any careful or critical examination of the terms of the will itself.

This court concurs with the Circuit judge, upon a careful *consideration of the testimony, in his conclusion that there was no mistake of law, as contradistinguished from ignorance of law. There does not appear in the testimony anything which goes to show that any person ever told Pamela that she had only a life-estate in the moiety of this land, and there is certainly no evidence that she ever submitted this will for a construction as to her rights under it to any one of the distinguished gentlemen‡ with whom it is said she conversed on this subject. It is more reasonable to think that, in a matter to the mind of this court so plain, they conversed or even advised with her on her own assumed construction of the will than construed it for her. She was a lady; though of feeble body, yet of well-matured intellect, of unusual intelligence and national reputation. Even Mr. Yancey, who drew the deeds of January, 1875, got his impressions from her, and, in his testimony in this case, says: "I was impressed with the belief that the widow and daughter took under the will only life-estates, derived from their statements or belief." Even at the time of this division he does not seem to have construed the will for her, and seems to indicate that, if there was anything for him to construe, he would have declined to act. If there was any error it was her own.

If the mistake in this transaction had been one of fact, without any improper negligence on her part, all the authorities agree that the court could give relief if application be made in due time. A mistake of law stands, however, on a different footing. Facts, material facts, are often in the knowledge of only one of the parties, sometimes known to neither, and either inaccessible or carefully concealed. It is presumed that every one knows the law, and for the very good reason that the source of information is open for all equally. It is true, that questions of law are sometimes doubtful. Lawyers, and even courts, differ about them; but there is no unfairness, and nothing unreasonable in requiring parties in ordinary cases to take these with all the other inevitable risks of human life when they stand on equal footing with their fellows.

*The case before the court does not call for any attempt to define the rule by which relief can be granted on account of mistake of law. Mr. Justice Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, (vol. I., § 138,) says that "it may be safely affirmed upon the highest authority, as well-established doctrine, that the mere naked mistake of law, unattended with any such special circumstances as have been suggested, will furnish no ground for the interference of the Court of Equity, and the present disposition of the court is to narrow rather than enlarge the operation of the exceptions." The cases involving special circumstances are referred to in some of the preceding sections; but no general principle is deducible from them. Not more satisfactory is the elaborate collection of the cases and discussion of this subject in the note to Blush v. Ward, 15 Am. Rep. 171, or the rule suggested by Mr. Pomeroy in his valuable work on Equity Jurisprudence, vol. II., § 849.

In this State, however, the distinction has been sharply drawn between ignorance of law and mistake of law. In Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bail. 623 [23 Am. Dec. 155], and in Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McCord Ch. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667], the court holding that in cases of mistake, the court could give relief, and that it would be refused in cases of mere ignorance. The principal reason given being that mistake could be proved and that ignorance could not. As parties can now testify in their own behalf, it may be doubtful if this reason can be longer sufficient to justify the distinction. In Hopkins v. Mazyck, the Court of Appeals, in affirming the Circuit decree, takes occasion to put its judgment on another ground, and to reaffirm the doctrine in Lawrence v. Beaubien and Lowndes v. Chisolm, on which the chancellor had cast some doubt in the Circuit decree. The court, however, has never held that even a mistake in law stands in all cases on the same footing as a mistake of fact. And nowhere have any limitations been laid down capable of general application.

In Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349, Chancellor Dargan, in the Circuit decree, which was affirmed per curiam, uses these words: "The simple misconstruction of a will or deed where there is no fraud or circumvention, cannot be regarded in any *point of view as coming within the scope and authority of those cases where mistakes of law in contradistinction to ignorance of law have been considered as affording grounds of relief. It is a cardinal theory of the law, founded upon a necessary policy, that every one is presumed to have a knowledge of its principles. This presumption prevails as well in reference to civil rights as in the criminal code. Without this doctrine, no system of law can practically fulfill the ends of its institution."

That case arose in this way: The will of Daniel Hesse gave certain lands to his grandchildren. The lands were sold and the money being in hand for distribution, all the grandchildren referred it to the ordinary to make up a statement for them according to the will, the sale and conveyances having been made by the grandchildren themselves. By this statement, a settlement was made letting in several grandchildren who were born after testator's death, and clearly not entitled to anything. It is true, that there were other grounds on which the Circuit decree rested the judgment, and the action was to recover back money paid. Yet this is very high authority for the opinion that, "the misconstruction of a deed or will is not to be regarded as coming within the scope and authorities of those cases where mistakes of law, as contradistinguished from ignorance of law, have been considered as affording grounds of relief."

In this view, this court concurs, and holds that even if there is a difference as to ignorance of law and mistake of law, and it should be regarded as in fact true that Pamela Cuningham had formed an opinion, either from her own construction of this will or in consequence of erroneous advice of others, this is no ground on which this court can relieve her devisee from the effect of these solemn deeds executed in 1875.

In the view taken by the court of this case, it is not necessary to consider the question of laches or the statute of limitations as a bar to plaintiff's claim; but, though urged in argument, no question has been made in reference thereto by the exceptions.

No act can be considered an estoppel unless it has been acted on by the party claiming the benefit of it. A man will not be allowed to aver against his own deed; but there is nothing in *the deed of January, 1875, of John Cuningham to Pamela Cuningham, or in the deed of same date of Pamela Cuningham, which in any way undertakes to dispose of the fee in this 760 acres of land after the death of Pamela. It stands now where it was before the deed was made—one moiety in John Cuningham and one moiety in the plaintiff, to whom it passed under Pamela's will. The parties simply held possession according to the terms of their respective deeds. We have held that these deeds cannot be reformed, but must stand according to their terms; and if the deed from John to Pamela had gone on to dispose of the remainder in the 760 acres after the death of Pamela, that would have been an end of the whole matter; but the omission of that deed to dispose of this remainder, has left such remainder untouched, and which thus fell under the will of Robert Cuningham, as herein construed.

No question has been raised by the appeal as to the mode of accounting for the rents and profits.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions be overruled; that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

TRUMBO v. CUMMING.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Judgment ⇐800.]

A sale by the sheriff under a junior judgment of the State court divests the liens of senior judgments upon the property so sold, of both State and United States Courts.

[2. Mortgages ⇐295; Vendor and Purchaser ⇐130.]

Where the mortgagee purchased the mortgaged land at a sheriff's sale under a junior judgment, and (the land having been forfeited to the State for non-payment of taxes) also obtained deed from the commissioners of the sinking fund, the lien of this mortgage, and also of all outstanding judgments and taxes, was divested, and, therefore, the mortgagee acquired a good, marketable title, which a purchaser from him was bound to accept.

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, July, 1883.

Controversy without action between Sarah H. Trumbo, plaintiff, and James D. Cumming, defendant. The opinion states the case.

*Mr. Jennings W. Perry, for appellant.

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, contra.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a controversy submitted without action, and the facts out of which it arose are as follows: Christopher C. Trumbo owned certain real estate in the city of Charleston, in fee-simple, for sixteen years prior to January 1st, 1880, the same being, however, all the while subject to a mortgage in favor of the city council of Charleston. Between July 27th, 1867, and May 11th, 1882, sixteen judgments and one money decree were duly recovered and entered in the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county (sometime district) against the said C. C. Trumbo, and executions were duly issued thereon. The first judgment bears date July 27th, 1867, and the last, May 11th, 1882. On December 20th, 1867, a judgment was recovered against the said C. C. Trumbo in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, and execution was duly issued thereon but no further action had.

The said C. C. Trumbo having neglected from year to year to pay the State and county taxes on the premises, the same were regularly forfeited to the State of South Carolina, and the commissioners of the sinking fund conveyed the said premises to the city council of Charleston on July 20th, 1881. On May 11th, 1882, the premises were levied on by the sheriff of Charleston county, under and by virtue of an execution issued on the junior judgment above mentioned, and, after duly advertising, the same were sold at public outcry to the city council of Charleston. In pursuance thereof, the said sheriff, on June 5th, 1882, conveyed the said premises to the city council of Charleston, who, on November 15th, 1882, conveyed to the plaintiff. On June 30th, 1883, the plaintiff contracted in writing to sell the said premises to the defendant for the sum of $6,000 in cash, and the object of this proceeding is to enforce the specific performance of such contract.

mination of the court *was, whether the title of the plaintiff was such a marketable title as the defendant was bound to accept. The Circuit judge answered this question in the affirmative, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff. From this judgment, the defendant appeals upon two grounds: 1st. Because the sale, under the execution of May 11th, 1882, did not divest the lien of the senior judgment in either the State or the United States courts. 2d. Because the commissioners of the sinking fund could not convey a title in fee-simple.

First, as to the lien of the senior judgments in the State courts. Ever since the cases of Snipes v. The Sheriff of Charleston, 1 Bay 295, and Greenwood v. Naylor, 1 McC. 414, followed by Gist v. McJunkin, 1 McMull. 342; Vance v. Red, 2 Speers 90, and McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq. 222 [94 Am. Dec. 164], recognized in the recent case of Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C. 364, it has been uniformly held in this State that a sale by the sheriff under a junior judgment divests the lien of the senior judgments and confers a good title on the purchaser—the senior judgments being first entitled to the proceeds of the sale in the order of their priorities. It is very clear, therefore, that so far as the senior judgments recovered in the State courts are concerned, the purchaser took a good title against them.

Next, as to the lien of the judgment recovered in the United States Court. The case of Pulliam v. Osborne, 17 How. 471, makes it equally clear that the sale by the sheriff divested the lien of that judgment also.

We do not deem it necessary in this case to consider or determine the extent of the powers of the commissioners of the sinking fund in making a sale of land forfeited to the State for non-payment of taxes where the rights of third persons are concerned, for, here, whatever interest the State may have had under the forfeiture for non-payment of taxes, has been conveyed to the city council of Charleston, who held the first lien, by way of mortgage, on the premises in question, and, by its purchase at sheriff's sale of the mortgagor's interest, has extinguished that lien. Schnell v. Schroder, Bailey, Eq. 334; McLure, Brawley & Co. v. Wheeler, 6 Rich. Eq. 343; Allen v. Richardson, 9 Rich. Eq. 53. The city council having thus acquired all of the interest *of C. C. Trumbo, which is conceded to have been a fee, divested of all the liens, and having conveyed the same to plaintiff, her title has become good and marketable, and such as the defendant is bound to accept.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

Petition by Mary Fooshe against M. E. Merriwether, in the Probate Court, for dower. The opinion states the case.

Mr. L. W. Perrin, for appellant.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, contra.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On October 6th, 1879, the demandant filed her petition in the Court of Probate for Abbeville county, demanding that her dower be assigned to her out of a tract of land formerly owned by her deceased husband, but then owned and occupied by the defendant. The commissioners appointed to admeasure the dower made their return, showing that they had divided the land *into three parcels, of nearly equal area, by two parallel lines running entirely across the tract, and had assigned to the demandant, as her dower, the middle parcel, the house and plantation buildings being on one of the outside parcels. To this return the demandant filed exceptions, principally upon the ground that the parcel assigned to her was not of equal value of the others, and also charging the commissioners with partiality. The charge of partiality was not sustained by the evidence, but the judge of Probate, after hearing much conflicting testimony as to the value of the premises, referred the return back to the commissioners, that they might include in their estimate the value of the improvements. The commissioners then made a further return, in which they stated that, in their opinion, the parcel containing the improvements, including the value of such improvements, was not greater in value than the parcel assigned to the demandant as her dower. This return was confirmed, and demandant was put into possession of the parcel assigned to her as her dower.

The judge of Probate then taxed against the defendant all the costs which had accrued up to the time of the filing of the exceptions by the demandant; but the costs of the witnesses and of the hearing upon these exceptions were taxed against the demandant. An appeal was taken by the demandant to the Circuit Court from so much of the action of the Court of Probate as taxed any costs against her, which appeal was dismissed. The demandant now appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because his Honor should have held that the Probate judge is required by the law to tax the costs of proceedings in, or admeasurement of, dower against the person who claims the land, or who is in possession of it. 2. Because his Honor should have held that the Probate judge was without discretion in the matter of the taxation of costs in proceedings in dower, and that the costs follow the event of the action. 3. Because his Honor erred in holding that proceedings in dower in the Probate Court was a case in chancery, and the Probate judge might exercise his discretion in taxing the costs against either party."

The decision of the Circuit judge is based upon the theory that this is "a case in chancery," and governed by the provisions *of section 323 of the amended code, as embraced in the general statutes of 1882, by which costs in such cases are in the discretion of the court, and that, as the judge who heard the case is best qualified to exercise such discretion, no reason was perceived for disturbing the taxation of costs as made by him.

The general statutes did not take effect until May 1st, 1882; and whether this case is to be governed by the present law, or that which was of force prior to the enactment of the general statutes, it would be impossible to say, owing to the conspicuous absence of dates in the "Case" as prepared for argument here. According to the case of Kapp v. Loyns, 13 S. C. 288, costs are to be governed by the law in force at the time the verdict is rendered; and, by parity of reasoning, they should be governed in this case by the law as it stood at the time the return of the commissioners appointed to admeasure the dower was confirmed. But when that was, whether before or after May 1st 1882, does not appear. The only dates given are the commencement of the proceeding on October 6th, 1879, and the date of the last return of the commissioners October 31st, 1881; but when the order of the Court of Probate confirming the return was made, or when the costs were taxed by that court, or when the appeal was taken from such taxation, or when the judgment now appealed from was rendered, appear nowhere in the "Case." We take this occasion, therefore, of calling the attention of the bar to the importance of giving, in the "Case" as prepared for argument here, the dates of the several steps in any proceeding which they desire this court to review.

Fortunately, however, in this particular case the absence of dates works no practical injury to either party, for, according to our view, the law governing this case is the same now as it has been ever since the passage of the act of 1786, 4 Stat. 743. By this act it is provided "that the expenses that may be incurred in making such admeasurement of dower, as aforesaid, shall be paid by the person or persons who shall claim the property or be in possession of the said lands." The same language was incorporated in section 5, ch. CXIII., of the general statutes of 1872, as well as in section 2287 of the general statutes of 1882. These words, in the act of 1786, have been construed in *Harshaw v. Davis, 1 Strobh. 74, where it was held that the owner of the land, out of which dower is claimed, must defray the expenses of assigning the dower, and he cannot exempt himself from the charge by a return to the summons that he was ready and offered to assign the demandant her dower before the summons was issued.

Now, if the demandant has a right to except to the return of the commissioners appointed to admeasure her dower, as she undoubtedly has, both at law (Beaty v. Hearst, 1 McMull. 31,) and in equity, (Gibson v. Marshall, 5 Rich. Eq. 254,) certainly the expense of having such exceptions heard and determined is as much a part of the expenses incurred in the admeasurement of her dower as anything else incident to a proper admeasurement; and, if so, then, by the express terms of the statute, such expenses must be paid by the person who claims the property or is in possession of the lands. We do not think, therefore, that it makes any difference whether this be regarded as a case in chancery or a law case. For, even assuming that it is a case in chancery, and that the question of costs is to be governed by the law as it now stands in reference to costs, as seemed to be assumed in the argument here, the general provisions in reference to costs found in section 323 of the code of 1882 must be reconciled with the special provision found in section 2287 of the general statutes in reference to costs in cases of dower; for the general statutes, embracing the code of procedure, was passed at the same time, and must be regarded as one act.

Now there is no doubt of the rule that where general terms, no matter how comprehensive they may be, are used in a statute which are apparently in conflict with other special provisions contained in the same statute, such conflict may be avoided by regarding the latter as exceptions to the former, and that, for this purpose, courts will read the two provisions as if words of exception were inserted. Pott. Dwar. Stat. 272-3; State v.

Shaw, 9 S. C. 143. The special provision in regard to the expenses incurred in making the admeasurement of dower must, therefore, be regarded as an exception to the general rule established by section 323 of the Code; and, hence, there was error in taxing any part of the costs of this case against the demandant.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Court of Probate for Abbeville county for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

STATE v. HICKS.

[1. Witnesses ⟸358.]

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, July, 1883.

This was an indictment against Coleman Hicks, Jr., and Charley Gallman, for burglary and larceny. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Johnstone & Cromer and M. A. Carlisle, for appellant, cited Best Ev., p. 1060; Whart. Ev. 572–3; 1 Greenl. Evid. 467, 468; Reyn. Steph. Dig. Ev., Arts. 126, 127, 131.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On the trial of this case the defendants offered one Charles Brown as a witness to impeach the character of the prosecutor, and on the cross-examination he mentioned certain particular offenses with which the prosecutor had been charged. In reply, counsel for the defendants proposed to interrogate the witness further as to the particular offenses which had been mentioned in his cross-examination, but such questions were upon objection, ruled out, and exception was duly *taken. The correctness of this ruling is the sole matter presented by this appeal.

The Circuit judge, in his report, says: "My reasons for excluding the question were these: A witness can only be impeached in this way by proof of his general bad character (i. e. reputation), and evidence of particular offenses committed by the witness cannot be given for that purpose. It was relevant and proper for the State, on cross-examination, to inquire into the grounds for the opinion expressed by the impeaching witness. When it was shown by the replies that the opinion was founded upon alleged particular offenses, and not upon general character, the impeachment was rendered more or less nugatory. In reply, the counsel for the defense could not destroy or impair the effect of the replies elicited on the cross-examination by evidence tending to show the nature, extent and truth of the particular offenses imputed by the impeaching witness. Therefore, such testimony was irrelevant in reply, as much as it would have been in the first instance."†

There is no doubt that the Circuit judge has laid down the rule correctly, that the character of a witness cannot be impeached by testimony tending to show that he has been guilty of, or has been charged with, particular offenses, though there is a case (Anonymous, 1 Hill 251,) in which evidence of a particular fact, to wit, that the witness sought to be impeached had been heard to say on a particular occasion, "that on some occasions he would swear a lie," was held to be competent for the purpose of impeaching the character of the witness. And there is as little doubt that the party offering the witness whose character is sought to be impeached, may test the value of the opinion expressed by the impeaching witness by asking him, on cross-examination, whether his opinion is based upon the general reputation which the witness bears in his neighborhood, or upon particular facts within his own knowledge or upon specific charges which have been brought against the witness whose character is sought to be impeached. But when, as in this case, *the cross-examination proceeds further and brings out particular facts or specific charges against the witness to be impeached, it seems to us that the other side ought to have the privilege of asking questions in reply in reference to such facts or charges as have been voluntarily brought out by the party offering the witness whose character is assailed, for he has thus voluntarily thrown open the door to inquiries which otherwise would have been incompetent.

This view seems to have the support of authority. In 1 Whart. Ev., § 573, that learned writer uses the following language: "It is also said that when a witness is cross-examined as to inadmissible matter, the party calling the witness has a right to re-examine as to such matter." So in 1 Stark. Ev. 144, (Metcalf's Edit.,) it is said: "If, by an unfortunate or unskillful question put on cross-examination, a fact be extracted which would not have been evidence upon an examination-in-chief, it then becomes evidence against the party so cross-examining.

The rule therefore seems to be, that if a party chooses to bring out what would be incompetent evidence if objected to, it becomes competent in that particular case, and must be treated as any other competent evidence. It was upon this principle that the case of Free ads. The State, 1 McMull, 494, was decided. In that case testimony was received without objection, showing that the witness, relied upon by the State to prove the offense alleged in the indictment, had stolen two great-coats, and it was held that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to allow counsel for the defendant to comment on the testimony showing that the witness had stolen the coats. Butler, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, after saying that the testimony was clearly incompetent, and would have been ruled out if objected to, used this language: "Incompetent testimony is frequently received by consent; indeed parties are, sometimes, sworn themselves in their own case. When such testimony is so received, it is usually regarded as competent testimony is, to be believed or not believed as the jury may think proper." So here we say it was clearly incompetent to offer testimony tending to show that the prosecutor had been guilty of, or had been charged with, certain particular offenses, but when it was brought out not only without *objection, but by the cross-examination on the part of the State, the counsel for the defense had a right to have it "regarded as competent testimony is," and hence had the right to examine, in reply, in reference to such testimony.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Wallace, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant, cited Wade Notice, §§ 1184–1188.

Mr. L. W. Perrin, contra.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The respondents, Cochran & Bonner, having obtained a judgment against the appellant, John E. Ellis, and issued execution thereon, the appellant, on or about April 1st, 1882, applied to the sheriff to have a homestead set off to him in the land upon which he resided. Accordingly three commissioners were duly appointed for the purpose, and they made their return on May 15th, 1882, in which they appraised the land of the appellant, consisting of 210 acres, more or less, *at the sum of $945, and assigned and set off the entire tract to the appellant as his homestead.

This return was duly filed in the clerk's office on June 1st, 1882, and on the 20th day of the same month the respondents, by their attorneys, duly filed exceptions thereto upon the ground that the real estate assigned exceeded in value the amount allowed by law as a homestead, but no notice of these exceptions was served upon the appellant. At the February Term, 1883, of the Court of Common Pleas, after hearing affidavits from three parties that each of them was ready and willing to pay in cash $1,350 to $1,400 for the said real estate, Judge Wallace granted an order "setting aside the said appraisement and appointing three other commissioners to set off said homestead, all of whom were nominated by the plaintiffs." The appellant received no notice "to nominate an appraiser, nor did he receive notice that a motion would be made to set aside said return."

From this order John E. Ellis appeals upon the following grounds: "1. Because said John E. Ellis did not receive any notice whatsoever to nominate an appraiser to set off his homestead, and the three appraisers named and appointed in and by the order aforesaid, were nominated by said Cochran & Bonner. 2. Because said John E. Ellis was not served with notice of the exceptions of said Cochran & Bonner to the return of the commissioners appointed to appraise and set off said homestead. 3. Because said John E. Ellis was not served with notice that a motion would be made to set aside said return. 4. Because said order is a complete surprise to said John E. Ellis, and will not subserve the ends of substantial justice by depriving him of the right to nominate an appraiser. 5. Because said order is, in all respects, contrary to law."

The act which was in force at the time these proceedings were instituted, is the act of 1880, (17 Stat. 513), although its terms, so far as it affects the present case, are identical with section 1994 of the general statutes, which did not take effect until May 1st, 1882. It is difficult to perceive wherein the terms of this act have been violated. It did not provide, when a new appraisement was ordered by the court, that one of the appraisers should be nominated by the judgment-debtor, as it does in the case of *the first appraisement, but on the contrary, it expressly provides that the re-appraisement shall be made by other appraisers appointed by the court; and certainly the court might, without any violation of the law, adopt those suggested by one of the parties, or by any officer of the court, or by any one else. The first exception cannot, therefore, be sustained.

As to the second exception, it will be sufficient to say that the act, in prescribing the mode of proceeding in cases like this, nowhere requires that any notice of the exceptions filed by the creditor should be served upon the judgment-debtor. All that is required is, that the exceptions shall be filed within thirty days after the filing of the return of the appraisers originally appointed; and this was done.

So, too, as to the third ground of appeal, we find no requirement that notice of a motion to set aside the return should be given. Indeed, it would seem to be wholly unnecessary to give the judgment-debtor any such notice. The very fact of filing the exceptions, as required by the act, operated as such notice, and when they were filed it would be the duty of the clerk to place the case upon the calendar for hearing by the court, as any other case, and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we are bound to assume that the clerk, as a public officer, performed this duty. When the appellant made his application to have his homestead assigned to him, he knew, or ought to have known, as the act is very plain, that he had inaugurated a proceeding which could not become final or effectual until his creditors had had an opportunity to file exceptions, and that he could not take the final step necessary to perfect his right, for the protection of which such proceeding had been inaugurated by him, until after the expiration of the time allowed for filing exceptions, or until the exceptions, if filed, had been disposed of; and, surely, there could be no necessity for giving him formal notice of each step in the regular and orderly conduct, as prescribed by statute, of the proceeding which he himself had instituted. See Johnstone v. Manigault, 13 S. C. 403, where this court adopted a similar view in reference to another special statutory proceeding.

As to the fourth ground, we can only say, that if the order appealed from has operated as a surprise to the appellant, such a *result is due to his own laches in not following up his own proceeding according to the terms of the act, of which he was claiming the benefit, and not to any error of law on the part of the Circuit Court. The fifth ground of appeal, as has often been ruled, is too general in its terms to require any special notice.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court, which is appealed from, be affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. COOLEY.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸45.]

A woman being entitled to property in her own right, upon her marriage it was settled absolutely upon her during her natural life, with an absolute power of disposition, and it passed as money into the hands of a trustee. The woman survived her husband and died intestate, leaving issue. Held, that action against this trustee, for an account of the trust estate, could be maintained only by an administrator.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸3.]

Parties can set up a claim to personal property, under the statute of distributions, only through regular administration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⟸3.]

3. This case distinguished from Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1, and also from Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253.

Before Wallace, J., Anderson, March, 1883.

This was an action by J. M. Richardson, assignee of Frances M. Moore, against W. M.

Cooley and one of the sureties on his bond, the other distributees of Mrs. Ann Duckworth being also parties defendant. Action commenced December 4th, 1880.

Mrs. Ann Cooley, a widow, with several children, being about to marry Howard Duckworth, who was the father of several children by a former marriage, and both of them being possessed of property in their own right, entered into a contract, by the terms of which Mrs. Cooley renounced all claim of dower and other claims against her intended husband's estate, and Mrs. Cooley retained "the property now in her possession," which was to be "only subject for the demands now against her, which she is to be the real owner and possessor of during her natural life, and to be disposed of by her according to her own discretion." This was in 1846. No trustee was provided for by this settlement.

*In 1852, a trustee was appointed, who obtained possession of moneys belonging to Mrs. Duckworth, he having given his bond as such trustee to the commissioner in equity. Howard Duckworth died about 1860, and many years afterwards his widow died, her surviving distributees, under the statute, being her children and grandchildren by her first husband. W. M. Cooley and Mrs. Frances Moore were two of these children. This action was afterwards brought by an assignee of Mrs. Moore's share. Other matters are stated in the opinion. Upon the point decided by this court, the arguments were as follows:

Messrs. Joseph N. Brown and Murray, Breazeale & Murray, for defendant, W. M. Cooley.

The property was Mrs. Duckworth's own, personal and settled upon her for life only, with no remainders over. At her death, therefore, it was intestate property, distributable under the statute, and could be demanded only by an administrator. 10 Rich. 109, 393; 4 McCord 427; 9 S. C. 253. The trust became executed by the death of Howard Duckworth, or, at any rate, by the constitution of 1868, and Mrs. Moore and her assignee can only claim under the statute of distributions.

Messrs. Orr & Tribble, contra.

The objection for the want of proper parties was waived, because not raised by demurrer. Code, § 169. Administration not necessary, as it is a suit on Cooley's bond for an accounting. Hill Trust. 760; 9 S. C. 254. As an appointee of the Court of Equity, Cooley could not be made to account elsewhere. 12 S. C. 556; 6 Id. 346. The Probate Court cannot grant an administration, for the bond, the only estate, is assets in the hands of the heir. Gen. Stat., § 1964.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Several questions have been raised in this appeal: but from the view which we take of the case it will not be necessary to consider but one of these questions. This lies at the threshold, and will dispose of the case, so *far as the present parties are concerned, before reaching the other questions. Besides, it would be improper to pass upon the others, as the parties legally interested therein are not before the court, and, therefore, they are not ripe for examination.

One Mrs. Ann Cooley, of Anderson county, in contemplation of marriage with Howard Duckworth, entered into a marriage contract with the said Duckworth, whereby her property real and personal was to remain hers, subject only to the demands then against her, further stipulating "that she was to be the real owner and possessor during her natural life, and to be disposed of by her according to her own discretion." No trustee was named in the deed; but in pursuance of a petition presented to the Court of Equity in 1852, the defendant, W. M. Cooley, was appointed said trustee, who gave bond to the commissioner in equity in the penal sum of $2,600 for the faithful discharge of his trust, with J. W. Poore, G. W. Turner and Reuben Poore as his sureties. Shortly after this appointment, William M. Cooley, the trustee, received as the trust funds the sum of $1,356.76. The interest upon this fund seems to have been paid regularly up to March, 1865, when there was an alleged investment in Confederate bonds of $500. The interest continued to be paid on the remainder until March, 1869.

Mrs. Duckworth died in 1879, having lived continuously with the trustee for the last six years of her life. She died intestate, having made no disposition of her estate, and leaving as her heirs-at-law and next of kin and distributees the defendant, W. M. Cooley, Francis Moore and the children of Mrs. J. W. Poore, deceased. No administration has ever been taken upon her estate. This action has been brought by the plaintiff Richardson, who claims one-third of the estate as assignee of Francis Moore. The action is upon the trust bond, and the complaint prays an accounting with the view to ascertain the amount in the hands of the trustee, and that plaintiff have leave to issue execution in severalty against Cooley, the trustee, for one-third of the amount ascertained to be due by the master which he claims as assignee. The defendant answered, setting up among other defenses—First, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, second, that *the action could not be sustained in the absence of administration on the estate of the deceased.

We cannot see why this defense was not sustained. It was apparent upon the record that the deceased had died intestate, and that no administration had been taken out upon her estate. The property in question belonged to her and was subject to administration at her death, and we do not know by what authority her next of kin or their assignees could claim possession, except through an administrator. This is not like the case of Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1, where there was but one distributee and no debts. On the contrary, here there are numerous distributees besides creditors, or at least one party setting up claims against the estate. Mrs. Duckworth had the right, under the marriage contract, to dispose of the property as she saw fit; but she made no disposition, and the only claim which the plaintiff or the other parties can set up is through the statute of distributions; and there is no mode of enforcing such claims except by regular administration.

The case of Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253, has no application here. There the question was, whether the bond of the administrator, executed to the Probate judge, could be sued in the name of the distributees to whom the administrator was accountable; but there is no such question as that here. There it was admitted that the administrator was accountable to the distributees, and the question turned on that fact. Here it is denied (and there is no doubt about the correctness of the position) that the defendant can be held accountable to the distributees in the first instance. It was held in the case of Kaminer v. Hope that there could be no title in the distributees of an intestate estate, except in due course of administration; and in all suits brought in that character the administrator is a necessary party, referring to 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 295; Story Eq. Pl., § 170; Bradford v. Felder, 2 McCord Eq. 169; Farley v. Farley, 1 McCord Eq. 506; Gregory v. Forrester, Id. 318; Humphreys v. Humphreys, 3 P. Wms. 349. On this ground we think there was error in the judgment below.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

[1. Criminal Law ⇐202.]

A person indicted for arson and acquitted by direction of the judge, as the offense did not constitute the crime of arson, was, afterwards, for this same act of burning, put upon his trial for the statutory offense of burning an untenanted house, and he interposed the plea of autrefois acquit. Held, that this plea was properly overruled.

Before Witherspoon, J., Anderson, June, 1883.

The opinion makes a full statement of the case.

Mr. Columbus Wardlaw, for appellant.

A person cannot be tried twice for the same offense. It is forbidden by the common law, the Federal and State constitutions. Were the offenses the same? The question turns upon the meaning of the word "offense. "Offense" means any violation of law. Mr. Justice McLean uses the words "same act." 18 Wall. 178; 1 Mart. & Y. 122; 1 Green. 375; 15 S. C. 370.

Mr. J. B. Moore, same side, cited 1 Bailey 651; 2 Treadw. 517; 4 McCord 254; 2 Nott & M. 15; 18 Wall. 163.

Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The appellant, Wesley Jenkins, was tried and convicted at the June Term, 1883, of the Court of Sessions for Anderson county, of burning an untenanted house. To the indictment, he plead autrefois acquit, which being overruled, upon trial he was convicted and sentenced, *the sentence being "confinement in the penitentiary for two years at hard labor."

The appeal raises the single question whether his plea of autrefois acquit should have been sustained. To understand this question, the facts must be stated. It appears that the appellant was indicted and tried at the February Term, 1883, of the court for Anderson, for arson, the indictment charging him with having burned a house within two hundred yards and appurtenant to the dwelling-house of one Jesse J. Dobbins, &c. Upon this trial, it being evident that the house burned was not appurtenant to a dwelling-house, under instructions from the court, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

At the next term of the court, to wit, in June, 1883, he was again indicted, this time under the act for "Burning an untenanted house." After the jury had been impaneled but before any testimony was adduced, the solicitor discovered that the accused was charged with having committed the offense on December 19th, 1883, (a future time,) instead of December 19th, 1882, (the real time,) whereupon he moved to quash the indictment, which was ordered against the objection of appellant's counsel, who claimed that his client was entitled to a verdict. The indictment, however, was quashed, and, the grand jury not having been discharged, a new indictment charging the proper time, and that the property belonged to J. Jesse Dobbins instead of Jesse J., as in the first, was found, upon which the accused was tried, and, as above stated, convicted and sentenced.

The question is, Was the offense charged in this last indictment the same as in either of the other two? If so, the appeal should prevail, as there can be no doubt that in such case he could successfully invoke for his protection the principle that no person shall for the same offense be twice put in jeopardy, or, as is said in the Constitution, section 18, article I.: "No person after having been once acquitted by a jury shall again for the same offense be put in jeopardy of his life and liberty." The question is a mixed one of law and fact. The facts, however, are not disputed, and, therefore, the question of law is alone to be considered. Were the offenses the same? There is no doubt but that the same occurrence gave rise to all three indictments, *but it is equally clear that no two of these indictments on their face charged the same offense. Because the first charged arson, the second, burning an untenanted house, on December 19th, 1883, and the third, burning an untenanted house on December 19th, 1882. These were all different. The second charged no offense, as it was impossible for the accused to have committed the act on the day mentioned, and the first required essentially different facts to constitute it from the last. So that it is obvious that no two of the indictments on their face charge the same crime.

Let us subject the question to another test. Could the accused have been convicted at the first trial and under the first indictment of the offense charged in either of the other two? When put upon trial for arson, could he have been convicted of burning an untenanted house? Certainly not, as arson does not necessarily embrace the other offense. Nor, inasmuch as the indictment for arson did not contain a charge of facts constituting the other offense, could testimony have been introduced as to the other, as it is a rule of law, that the testimony must correspond with the allegations, a rule applicable to both civil and criminal cases, and especially so to criminal. If then the accused could not, under any circumstances, have been convicted of the present offense in the former trial, how then can it be said that upon the present trial he has been put in jeopardy twice for the same offense, or, in the language of the Constitution, "That after having been once acquitted by the verdict of a jury of an offense, he has again been put in jeopardy of his life or liberty for the same"? The same may be said as to the two last indictments—the accused could not have been convicted under either of the offenses charged in the other. The following authorities are referred to to sustain this conclusion: 1 Arch. Cr. Pl. 348–351; 9 East 441; State v. Taylor, 2 Bailey 49; State v. Glasgow, Dudley 40; State v. Risher, 1 Rich. 219.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Mauldin v. City Council of Greenville, 33 S. C. 21, 11 S. E. 434, 8 L. R. A. 291, as to facts.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Spartanburg, March, 1883.

This was an action by F. M. Trimmier, Lewis Yarborough, J. T. Pool, Alfred Tollerson and Joseph Walker against J. E. Bomar et al., county commissioners of Spartanburg county, and the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad Company.

The decretal order appealed from, was as follows:

This action was brought by plaintiffs, taxpayers of Spartanburg county, to restrain the county commissioners of said county from issuing certain bonds of said county in aid of the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad Company. The allegations of the complaint will be more specifically pointed out in the statement of facts on motion hereafter decided. At the commencement of the action an ex parte order was made, requiring the county commissioners of said county to show cause, before me, why they should not be enjoined from issuing said bonds until the final hearing of the cause, and restraining *them from issuing same until further orders of the court. The defendants county commissioners have filed their answer to the complaint, which it is unnecessary to set out in this decree. Upon due notice, the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad Company was made a party defendant, and allowed to appear and join in the return to the rule.

The return to the rule was heard before me at chambers at Union Court House, on the 6th and 7th of the present month. The affidavits submitted for and against the rule are voluminous, and it is impracticable to state the same fully. It is only necessary to say that the only matters in controversy were certain alleged irregularities at the voting precincts in said county, at an election held pursuant to act of general assembly of December 24th, 1880, authorizing a subscription by the county of Spartanburg to the capital stock of the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad Company, in that the managers and voters were not sworn according to law, and the oaths of managers were not filed in the clerk's office, and an alleged irregularity in counting the votes and the proper certificate of the result of said election to the county commissioners of said county.

As to the irregularities, either in the failure of the managers or of the voters at said election to take the oaths alleged to be necessary, no testimony has been offered by plaintiffs except as to five precincts. Such testimony was insufficient to sustain the allegations of the complaint, and was contradicted by positive affidavits on the part of defendants, except as to two small precincts in said county, and at one of these the record shows that at least the chairman of the board was properly sworn as a manager. But, admitting that the plaintiffs had shown fatal irregularities at any or all of said five precincts, so as to necessitate their being thrown out, the majority of votes for the subscription would still be more than one thousand. The case of the plaintiffs must therefore, necessarily, rest upon the alleged irregularity with reference to the counting of the votes and certification of the result of the election.

It is unnecessary now to consider what was under the act, the proper mode of counting the votes and certifying the result. The fact of a majority of thirteen hundred and eleven votes for *subscription is not disputed by plaintiffs, and is conclusively established by testimony for defendants. It is further clearly established that within three days after the election, on July 12th, 1881, it appeared to the county commissioners of said county, by the original returns from all the precincts in said county, then in their possession, and a tabulated statement of same made and certified to by a number of the managers at said precincts, that the majority for subscription was as hereinbefore stated, and that the board on said day adopted a resolution as above stated. No fraud or misconduct on the part of any officer connected with said election or any voter is alleged or proven. The sole question therefore is, whether, upon a technical irregularity which itself is disputed and is not satisfactorily established, the will of the qualified voters of Spartanburg county upon the question of subscription to the railroad company shall be defeated. On this question I can have no doubt. The purpose of this election was to discover the will of the voters of the county in the premises. That has been conclusively shown, and it ought not to be defeated by minute objections and mere irregularities of manner and form even when well established.

The other grounds for issuing the injunction, alleged in the complaint, are so clearly untenable as not to require extended discussion. I therefore have no hesitation in deciding, from the testimony, that there is nothing to invalidate the election, and that there has been such substantial compliance with the requirements of the act as should authorize and require the county commissioners to issue the said bonds in pursuance of the terms of subscription to said railroad company.

In addition to what has already been said,

I also consider that plaintiffs are estopped from bringing this action. From the date of the election in July, 1881, the plaintiffs have quietly rested, making no complaint and taking no action, although all the matters upon which they now rely were more accessible to them and susceptible of proof than now. In the meantime rights have vested in third parties. The county commissioners, on September 6th, 1881, subscribed the sum of $75,000, in bonds of said company, to the capital stock of the said railroad company, agreeing to issue said bonds as the work of construction of said road shall *progress. The defendant railroad company having received said subscription and obligation to issue bonds of the county therefor, have, in advance, pledged said bonds to certain contractors for the work of construction of said railroad through Spartanburg county. Some of these bonds have already been issued, and others should be pursuant to the terms of said contract. The contract was bona fide, and it seems to me that the promises under such contract stand in a court of equity on an equal footing with bona fide holders of bonds already issued.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the rule herein against the defendants, requiring them to show cause why an injunction should not issue, restraining the defendants county commissioners from issuing the aforesaid bonds, be and the same is hereby discharged, and the order for injunction heretofore granted herein be dissolved.

From this order the plaintiffs appealed, upon the ground stated in the opinion and upon two others, denying an estoppel.

Mr. Stanyarne Wilson, for appellants.

The action of the county commissioners is not res judicata. In the cases from 1 McCord 59, 2 Treadw. Com. R. 646, and 2 Rich. 7, there were special statutes for political elections, constituting the officers judicial officers as to the elections, and with no conditions precedent as here. In 16 S. C. 236, and 17 Id. 563, the matters were between parties litigant, and within the jurisdiction of the county commissioners. Big. Estop. 9. The principles upon which municipal decision has been sustained are, that where municipal officers have, by statute, power to determine whether the conditions precedent to the issue of the bonds have been complied with, and they so determine and place their recital to that effect in the bonds, this decision is final as to a bona fide holder for value before maturity, but not as to the original payees or purchasers with notice. 21 How. 539; Burroughs Pub. Sec. 272–320, 360; 4 Otto 429; Cooley Const. Lim. 196. There were fatal irregularities in the conduct of the election and making the return. the tax*ing power there is nothing pre-existing, and a strict compliance is necessary. Burroughs Pub. Sec. 262; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 108; 19 Barb. 558; Pot. January 15th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. By an act of the Legislature approved December 24th, 1880, (17 Stat. 497,) the county commissioners for Spartanburg county were authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad Company, such sum as the qualified electors of said county should determine by an election to be held under said act, and to that end the act further provided machinery for the election, among other things enacting, in section 8, "That it should be the duty of the managers to make returns, and meet at their court house and count the votes and declare the result, as in other elections, which result should be certified in writing by the chairman of each board of managers to the chairman" of the board of county commissioners. On July 9th, 1881, an election was held under this act, and out of a vote of 4,435 in the whole, the vote for subscription was 2,873, a majority of over 1,300 in favor thereof. The amount to be subscribed according to this vote was $75,000, which subscription was immediately thereafter made, and bonds to the amount of $10,500 issued and turned over to the company.

In 1881, a convention of the tax payers of the county was held for the purpose of electing commissioners to represent the *stock in a meeting of the stockholders of this railroad company, at which the plaintiff Trimmier was elected as one of three of said commissioners. Trimmier, Yarborough and Pool were members of this convention. The plaintiff Walker was elected one of the directors of the road, and it was upon his motion that a committee was appointed to receive the county bonds and to sell them; and Tollerson participated in the election. The subscription of the county was received by the company. A contract for grading was made, which was commenced, and $10,500 of the bonds issued before the action below was instituted, which was in February, 1883.

The purpose of the action was to obtain a permanent injunction, restraining the commissioners from issuing the bonds of the county, in payment of the said subscription, and that another election should be ordered, if necessary. The grounds upon which this relief was asked, were—first, that the plaintiffs were the owners of over $100,000 worth of property located in said county liable to be taxed for the payment of said bonds; second, that the subscription was illegal and void, because the act authorizing the election had not been complied with in the following particulars, to wit: (1) That the managers had not been sworn; (2) that their oaths had not been filed with the clerk; (3) that the managers had not assembled at the court house after the election, as required by section 8, supra, and, (4) that the chairman of each of said boards had not certified the result in writing to the board of county commissioners, as also required. The result of the election as above stated was not denied, nor was there any allegation of unfairness, fraud or irregularity in said election, either as to its inauguration or to its conduct, except in the particulars above stated.

The complaint having been filed, the case was presented to Judge Witherspoon at chambers, for a temporary injunction until the hearing of the cause, whereupon Judge Witherspoon issued an order requiring the defendants to show cause before him at Spartanburg on March 21st, thereafter, why the prayer of the plaintiffs should not be granted with leave on their part to appear at any prior day, upon 10 days' notice, at the same time granting a restraining order against the defendants upon certain con*ditions. The defendants answered, and on March 6th, 1883, after due notice, a motion was made and heard before Judge Witherspoon to dissolve this injunction, who, after full investigation with voluminous affidavits on both sides, granted the motion, holding as a matter of fact, that the allegation in reference to the failure of the managers to take the oath alleged to be necessary, had not only not been sustained by the testimony, but was contradicted by positive affidavits on the part of the defendants, except as to two small precincts, which, if thrown out, would still leave a majority of votes for the subscription of over 1,000; and as to the two other alleged irregularities, to wit, of the managers not meeting at the court house, and not certifying in writing the result of the election, by the chairmen of the different boards, he held, that while not satisfactorily established, yet, if having occurred, they were nothing more than mere technical irregularities which ought not and could not affect the result, in the face of the overwhelming fact, not denied, that a large majority of the vote had sustained the subscription. He also held the plaintiffs estopped from bringing the action.

The appeal seeks to reverse the rulings of the Circuit judge, first, "Because his Honor held that it did not appear from the pleadings and evidence that there were such fatal defects and irregularities, in the conduct of the election and making the return, as to prevent the issue of the bonds of the county." This ground involves two questions: first, the existence of the alleged irregularities, which is a question of fact; and, secondly, if any, their effect, which is a question of law. This being a case in chancery, both of these questions are within our jurisdiction. The Circuit judge held as to the alleged irregularities, in reference to the oaths of the managers, that they were not sustained by the testimony, and therefore could not be considered as to their legal effect. Under the law governing the findings of fact by a Circuit judge when brought before this court for review, we see no cause for disturbing the finding here. Upon a careful examination of the affidavits, it will be seen that this finding is neither not without any testimony to support it nor opposed to the preponderance of the testimony. It must, therefore be sustained, and this exception dismissed without further *consideration, except, it may be remarked, that it is not at all certain that the managers under the act were required to take any oath.

We think that the Circuit judge might well have found, as a matter of fact, that the other alleged irregularities had not been sustained, because it is pretty clear from testimony that all of the requirements of section 8, as to making the returns, the meeting of the managers, counting the votes, declaring the result and making the certificate, were substantially complied with; sufficiently so, at least, to have warranted him, in our opinion, in dissolving the injunction upon that ground. He assumed, however, that there may have been some irregularity; he held that yet this was merely technical, and was not of a character to invalidate the election. In this we concur. In elections the great matter is the result. When this is clearly ascertained it sweeps away all technicalities. The machinery provided should be observed, but in so far as it is not necessary to determine the result, it is directory and not mandatory. Certainly manner and form should not be allowed to defeat the undoubted will of the people clearly expressed. This would be indeed subordinating and sacrificing the substance to the shadow.

There is no allegation or pretense that, had section 8 been literally and exactly complied with in its entire particularity, the majority declared would have been diminished or the result altered in the least. What ground then is there for complaint? There seems to be no doubt that the managers desired and attempted to discharge the duty imposed upon them faithfully and fully as far as they understood it. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Kirby, the chairman of the county commissioners, that the managers met at the court house; that returns from all the precincts were received, with a tabulated statement of the same; that at said meeting the returns were recanvassed and verified; that to the best of his recollection the returns from the different precincts were duly signed by the managers thereof, and that no question as to the correctness of said returns or the general result had ever been made, suggested or heard of until this action. Under such circumstances it is needless to refer to authorities by which

The appellants' counsel seems to admit this, but contends that this doctrine, while applying to political elections, yet that it does not apply to the exercise of a taxing power. This may be true where such power is conferred to be exercised in a certain way, and according to certain prescribed forms or conditions. Where the power is vested to be thus exercised, it is a nullity when attempted through any other channel than that prescribed, and the authorities relied on by appellants are full to this point. Burroughs Pub. Sec. 262; Dill. Mun. Corp., § 108; People v. Schermerhorn, 19 Barb. 558; Pot. Dwar. 225, note; Clark v. Crane, 5 Mich. 154; Marsh v. Chesnut, 14 Ill. 223; Head v. Insurance Company, 2 Cranch 127 [2 L. Ed. 229] and others cited in the argument of counsel.

But that is not the character of this case. Here there is no contention that the county commissioners exercised the power of issuing the bonds already issued irregularly, or that they are likely to do so as to the bonds yet to be issued. The question is, Has any power to the end of issuing the bonds at all been conferred upon them? It is not a question of the proper exercise of a power, but it is whether a power has been created. The legislature has declared by act that the power might be created by election by the qualified voters of the county, and the question is, Has such election been held and the result ascertained according to law? This question is a very different one from that raised by the appellant, and must be decided upon different principles. It is a question as to the will of the people, to be heard through the ballot-box, and we think the authorities to be found in McCrary, supra, apply.

This disposes of the case, and it is not necessary to discuss the question of estoppel.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*STATE v. TREZEVANT.

[1. Criminal Law ⇐989.]

The failure of the Circuit judge to ask a prisoner convicted of murder, "If he has anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced on him," is error, and requires a resentence, although the prisoner did not demand that this question should be asked.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Jefcoat, 20 S. C. 383, 387; State v. Baker, 58 S. C. 114, 36 S. E. 501; State v. Knotts, 70 S. C. 402, 50 S. E. 9.

[2. Criminal Law ⇐1188.]

But as this error affected the sentence only, the prisoner is not entitled to a new trial, but must be resentenced after being so asked.†

Before Wallace, J., Orangeburg, May, 1883.

This was an indictment against William Trezevant for murder. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Andrew C. Dibble, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was tried and convicted of murder at the May Term, 1883, in the Court of Sessions for Orangeburg county. When called for sentence, the question "whether he had anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced on him," was omitted. The appeal assigns error on account of this omission.

There is no doubt that in capital cases the practice of asking this question before sentence has been universally recognized and followed in this State from the earliest period of our judicial history. State v. Washington, 1 Bay 155 [1 Am. Dec. 601]. And it seems that it has been the practice, not simply because it was formal and seemly, but because of legal requirement founded upon wise consideration, and, therefore, necessary and indispensable. Mr. Archbold (1 Cr. Pr. & Pl. 676) says, that in capital cases, before judgment is pronounced upon the defendant, it is indispensably *necessary that he should be asked "if he has anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced on him," referring to 1 Chitty Crim. L. 700; West v. State, 2 Zabr. 212, and Grady v. State, 11

†See State v. Jefcoat (3), post, page 383.

Geo. 253; and, also, that this should appear upon the record to have been done. 3 Salk. 358; Mill. Comp. 157; 3 Mod. 265.

This is necessary, because, on this occasion, the defendant may allege any ground in arrest of judgment, or he may plead a pardon, &c. 4 Bl. Com. 376. He further says, that the omission to do this in cases of minor felonies is not a sufficient ground for reversing the judgment, provided it appears that the prisoner and his counsel were both in court when the sentence is pronounced, and urge nothing against the judgment or in mitigation of the defendant's guilt. Grady v. State, 11 Geo. 253. The same doctrine is found in 1 Bish. Cr. Pro., § 865, where he says that "it is now indispensably necessary, even in clergyable felonies, that the defendant should be asked if he has anything to say why judgment of death should not be pronounced on him." 4 Burr. 2086; 3 Salk. 398; 3 Mod. 265. Under this uniform practice, founded, as we have seen, upon the law, the defendant here had the right to have this question propounded to him before sentence; and, although it was not demanded, yet, in a case of such serious magnitude, the omission to have the question asked, we think, was error.

Next, as to the effect of this error. We do not see why it should affect the whole proceeding, and, therefore, render a new trial necessary. The error occurred after trial and conviction, and applied to the subsequent proceeding, to wit, the sentence only; and in reason the remedy should extend only so far as the error extended. The weight of authorities sustain this view. 1 Bish. Cr. Pro., § 1293; McCue v. Commonwealth, 78 Pa. 191; 21 Am. Rep. 7; State v. Johnson, 67 N. C. 59.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as to pronouncing sentence, be reversed, and that the case be remanded for resentence after the question above is asked the defendant.

*PYLES v. BELL.

[1. Bankruptcy ⇐391.]

Fifteen years after defendant filed his petition in bankruptcy, this action was commenced on a note executed prior to the filing of such petition. Held, that defendant had been guilty of unreasonable delay in obtaining his discharge and, therefore, the action could be prosecuted in the State courts.

A sealed note was given in 1858, upon which payments were made in 1859, 1863, 1873 and 1874, and action was commenced in 1883. Held, that the right of action was kept alive by the credits indorsed, and that the note was not presumed to be paid from the lapse of time.

Before Witherspoon, J., Laurens, February, 1883.

This was an action by Permelia F. Pyles, as executrix of Newton Pyles, deceased, against W. B. Bell. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for appellant.

Under the terms of the bankrupt act of 1867, section 21, this action should have been dismissed. 1 Bank. Reg. 125, 165; 4 Id. 156; 5 Id. 125; 7 How. 627; 45 Miss. 209; 8 S. C. 315; 5 Id. 515. As touching the original contract, the bankrupt court having assumed jurisdiction, action in the State court should have been dismissed or stayed. 9 Wheat. 532; 10 How. 56; 10 S. C. 433. There is no proof of negligence. The testimony is that he applied for his discharge, but has never received it. The question may now be under consideration in that court. If these positions are correct, then action can be maintained only on a new promise, or new contract. Part payment is only evidence of a new promise. 15 Rich. 375; 18 Wall. 1; 11 Pa. 364. Action on the new promise was barred in six years. Hilliard Bankr. 265.

Y. 521; Lalor Supp. Hill. & D. 371; 1 Doug. 192; 12 N. Y. 635.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was commenced January 8th, 1883, for the balance of a sealed note, given by the defendant and one J. H. Bell, as surety, to Newton Pyles, testator of the plaintiff, on July 30th, 1858, for $1,000. The following credits appeared indorsed on the note, the last two in the handwriting of the defendant: February 3d, 1859—$165.52; April 24th, 1863—$106.95; September 8th, 1863—$162.42; March 12th, 1873—$49.77, and January 1st, 1874—$203.92, leaving a balance still due. The defense was that the defendant was declared a bankrupt in the United States Court in 1868, and that the note had been proved in bankruptcy by Newton Pyles, payee, in his life-time, and that the defendant, never having been discharged, is still in bankruptcy and the action should be "stayed" under the bankrupt law. He also pleaded that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, not having arisen within six years previous to the commencement of the action.

Upon the trial, it appeared that the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt on his own petition in 1868; that this note of Newton Pyles was proved before the register, C. G. Jaeger, Esq., and that Bell had applied for his discharge in bankruptcy, but never received the same. It also appeared that, afterwards, the defendant, Bell, being engaged in merchandise, Pyles, the testator of plaintiff, went to settle his account with him, $203.92, and asked that it might be credited on the note. "Bell at first refused, saying the note was worthless and that he was in bankruptcy, *but after some conversation agreed to do so on condition that Pyles would trouble him no more about the note." Bell then placed the credit of January 1st, 1874, on the note. Judge Witherspoon held that as the defendant had not, after such a lapse of time, obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, the State court had jurisdiction and overruled the plea of the statute of limitations. The plaintiff had a verdict for the balance upon the note, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the grounds: 1. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the State court had jurisdiction; and 2. Because his Honor erred in ruling that the plaintiff's cause and right of action was not barred by the statute of limitations."

As to the first exception. There can be no doubt that the State court once had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The parties were citizens of the State and the note was a South Carolina contract. It is true that, when the defendant was declared a bankrupt in the United States Court, the jurisdiction of the State court was suspended during the proceedings in the bankrupt court, and if the bankrupt had been there discharged, that discharge would have been a bar to all proceedings to collect the note in the State court. But this assumption of jurisdiction by the United States Court, and the consequent suspension of that of the State, was for the purpose of enabling that court to dispose of the matters of bankruptcy without embarassment, and upon the faith that it would exercise reasonable diligence in proceeding with the business to final judgment. Otherwise, the simple act of going into bankruptcy would, without further proceeding or any division of the assets, operate as a perpetual injunction against all creditors.

Section 21 of the bankrupt act of March, 1867, provides as follows: "Suits at law or in equity shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of discharge, provided there is no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge. Rev. Stat., § 5106. We suppose that the question of what is "unreasonable delay," under this provision, must be determined by the State court, which, but for the stay from the bank rupt court, would have jurisdiction. So *far as known to us, there is no case in our reports upon the subject, but it seems to have been held in North Carolina that a delay of five years was "unreasonable." The court say: "When there is unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in obtaining his discharge, as here, five years, the stay of proceedings against him in an action to recover a debt provable in bankruptcy, will not be continued, but judgment may be rendered." Calvert v. Peebles, 80 N. C. 334; Bump Bankr. Pr. 185, 356, 701 and notes.

In this case it was fifteen years after the defendant went into bankruptcy before this action was brought in the State court, and as no discharge was obtained in that time, we cannot say that it was error to hold the delay "unreasonable," and that the original jurisdiction of the State court re-attached, as if there never had been any proceedings in the bankrupt court. The bankrupt act has been repealed, and the proceedings may be regarded as abandoned.

The statute of limitations, as such, has no application to the case. The action was not brought on any new parol promise, but on the original sealed note itself, and at the time it was executed, in 1858, there was in this State no statute of limitations as to bonds or notes under seal; but, in the absence of such a statute, the courts held that there was a presumption of payment at the end of twenty years, if there had been no fact going to show that the debtor acknowledged the debt to be in existence within that time. Willingham v. Chick, 14 S. C. 95. We may say, in passing, that if the defendant had been discharged in bankruptcy, and this action had been upon an alleged new promise to pay the note after it was discharged, we agree with the defendant's attorney, that the simple payments on the note would not have been sufficient to make out that "clear, distinct and unequivocal promise to pay" which has been held necessary to revive a debt discharged by the discharge of the debtor under the bankrupt act. Allen & Co. v. Ferguson, 18 Wall. 1 [21 L. Ed. 854]. But in this case the bankrupt was never discharged, and, the action being on the original sealed note, the only question was, whether it should be presumed to be paid from lapse of time, the note *having been given in 1858, and the action not brought until 1883—twenty-five years thereafter.

In reference to the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of twenty years, it has been held that the presumption is not one of law, and therefore conclusive, but one of fact, which may be rebutted by acknowledgments in analogy to the principles regulating admissions to take a case out of the statute of limitations. Stover & Barnes v. Duren, 3 Strobh. 450. In regard to the statute of limitations the rule is well settled, that after the debt is barred nothing short of an express promise, or what is equivalent to such promise, will suffice to take a case out of the statute; but before the bar of the statute is complete, mere acknowledgments, as shown by part payments or otherwise, are sufficient to keep the original debt alive by giving at each acknowledgment a new starting point for the running of the statute. Rucker v. Frazier, 4 Strobh. 94; Lomax v. Robertson, Dudley 367; Bowdre v. Hampton, 6 Rich. 212.

Now, apply these principles to the presumption of payment of the sealed note in this case, as if twenty years had been expressly declared by statute to be a bar. Counting from the date when the note fell due, and thence successively from each payment, had twenty years expired at any of the periods when payments were made, or at the time the action was brought? They certainly had not expired when the first payment was made, in 1859, nor at the time the second and third were made, in 1863, nor when the two last payments were made, in 1873 and 1874, after the defendant had filed his petition in bankruptcy, nor when the action was brought, in 1883. The payments, though possibly not sufficient to revive a debt already barred, were enough as acknowledgments, to keep alive a debt which was never barred.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*YOUNGBLOOD v. LATHEN.

Certain lands of a bankrupt were excepted from the sale of his property by order of the United States District Court, but no formal assignment of such land as a homestead to the bankrupt was made by the United States Court, or by any State court, or ever filed for record with the clerk of court. Afterwards, the bankrupt sold a part of this land and then died intestate. Held, that the purchaser was entitled to this land, and that it could not be claimed by the widow of the bankrupt as a part of the homestead, nor by his heirs for partition.

[2. Bankruptcy ⇨396.]

The United States Court in bankruptcy does not assign a homestead, but only excepts from sale and conveyance such property as is exempt under the State law, leaving the title of such excepted property in the bankrupt, which he may afterwards sell if he pleases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 664; Dec. Dig. ⇨396.]

Before Kershaw, J., Lancaster, February, 1883.

Action for partition by Mary J. Youngblood against Nancy Lathen, John F. Lathen, Harriet M. McMillan, Elizabeth A. Robinson and Sarah A. Robinson, commenced in 1882. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The constitution of this State (Art. I., § 20,) declares that "a reasonable amount of property shall be exempted from seizure and sale for the payment of any debts or liabilities, except for the payment of such obligations as are provided for in this constitution." Article II., section 32, declares "that the family homestead of each family residing in this State * * * shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court," &c. The revised statutes of the United States, section 5045, re-enacting former acts, provides that "in no case shall the property hereby excepted pass to the assignee or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this title," &c. Among the exceptions referred to is the following: * * * "Such other property, not included in the foregoing exceptions, as is exempt from levy and sale, upon execution or other process, or order of any court by *the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each State as existing in the year 1871," &c.

It is contended, that if the estate of the bankrupt remained as declared in the section quoted, unimpaired or unaffected by the provisions of the bankrupt law, then he simply held his land by the former title, free from the debts provable against him in bankruptcy. In other words, that he had such title as he would have had if there had been no proceedings in bankruptcy and he was clear of debt. But this reasoning is certainly fallacious. The thing excepted in bankruptcy is that which is exempted by the constitution and laws of the State from liability to process for the collection of debts, to wit, the family homestead. The bankrupt court, having assumed jurisdiction, superseded the process of the State courts and settled the debts of the bankrupt and allowed him the same benefits which he would have been entitled to if the property had been subjected to the process of the State courts. In order to do this the homestead has been judicially ascertained and allotted to the bankrupt. It then acquired the specific character impressed upon a homestead by the State laws after assignment.

If that were not the case, then the exempted property never could have acquired that character, because, the debts being discharged in bankruptcy, there would be no proceedings in the State courts to enforce said debts, and consequently no proceedings to assign a homestead. The estate of homestead has been said to be not a new estate, nevertheless after its assignment it acquires certain new characteristics or incidents which largely qualify it. Among them is that it shall be the family homestead; which, though vested in the head of the family, is in him as the representative of the family; the family being the object of the protection afforded by the constitution in this respect. The subject of protection is the family, the head of the family being referred to as its representative. In re Kennedy, 2 S. C. 227; Howze v. Howze, Id. 229; Ex parte Strobel, Id. 311. The widow and children of the debtor, and even the widow without children, is entitled to this protection.

3 S. C. 227. The head of a family *is but a trustee and the family the beneficiaries. Moore v. Parker, 13 S. C. 490.

Such being the nature of the estate, as affected by the constitution and laws concerning the homestead exemption, it follows that from the time it acquired that character by the assignment of a court having jurisdiction, it became inalienable by the head of the family, at least so far as its alienation could affect the interests of the members of the family who are the beneficiaries of the trust. The widow, if she survive the children, in this case would be the sole beneficiary, and hence the children are not entitled to partition until her death. This would have been the result even in the absence of the statutory inhibitions of alienation. A reference to these will also lead to the same conclusion. 15 Stat. 371, §§ 4 and 5; Gen. Stat., § 1997. The act of March 13th, 1872, prescribing the mode in which the homestead may be sold by the head of the family, preserving at the same time the interests of the family, very strongly sustains the view here taken. 15 Stat. 229.

It follows, from what has been said, that the attempted alienation is void, and that plaintiff is not entitled to partition of the said lands. It is adjudged and decreed that the complaint be dismissed, and that plaintiff, Mary J. Youngblood, and defendant John F. Lathen, pay the costs in equal shares, to be adjusted by the clerk and entered in the judgment.

Mr. M. J. Hough, for appellant.
Mr. R. E. Allison, contra.

February 18th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for partition of lands among the heirs of the intestate, C. H. Lathen, under the following circumstances: The intestate, C. H. Lathen, seized and possessed of two small tracts of land—one containing 140, and the other 130 acres—went into bankruptcy in the United States Court in 1873, and was there adjudged a bankrupt and discharged in 1874. Under some claim that, under the laws of *South Carolina, he was entitled to homestead in the tracts of land above described, the United States Court declined to have them sold for the payment of debts; but it seems that no actual assignment of homestead was ever made by the United States or State court, or returned for record in the clerk's office of Lancaster, as required by law. All that appears is a certificate made for use in the bankrupt court as follows:

"The real estate to be set apart to C. H. Lathen as his exempted property, under the provisions of the homestead laws of South Carolina, lying in Lancaster, on which petitioner resides, containing 305 acres more or less, we have appraised and returned at $950.

(Signed) "John J. Graham,
"James Crockett,
"David M. Crockett,
"Appraisers."

Matters stood in this imperfect condition until July, 1878, when the intestate, C. H. Lathen, conveyed the smaller tract (130 acres) to his son, John F. Lathen, who was put into possession, and still retains it under his father's deed. In November, 1878, C. H. Lathen, the father, died intestate, leaving a widow, Nancy, one son, John F. Lathen, and several daughters, viz., Mary J. Youngblood, Harriet M. McMillan, and others. All the children are of full age, and have married and left their parents. At the death of her husband, the widow, Nancy, was left alone on the 140-acre tract, of which she still retains the possession.

Mrs. Youngblood, one of the daughters, commenced this action for partition of both the tracts of land, claiming that, upon the death of her father, C. H. Lathen, both tracts descended to his heirs-at-law, and are subject to partition among them. The widow, Nancy, claimed that both tracts had been set apart for the homestead of her husband in his life-time by the bankrupt court, and that now being the head of the family she was entitled to retain them during her life as such homestead. John F. Lathen claimed that, while it was true that the United States Court refrained from selling the lands as the property of his father on the ground that they might be assigned as his homestead under the law of the State, yet such homestead was never *actually assigned, and his father still had the right to convey the land, and his deed gave good title to the tract conveyed to him.

The cause was heard by Judge Kershaw, who held that the refusal of the United States Court to have the lands sold in bankruptcy was substantially an assignment of homestead to the debtor, "judicially ascertained and allotted to the bankrupt;" that from that time C. H. Lathen, as the head of the family, became a trustee for his wife and children, the beneficiaries under the homestead; that, therefore, he had no right to sell any of his land, and his deed to John F. Lathen was null and void. He held that the widow was entitled to both tracts as homestead during her life, and dismissed the complaint for partition, ordering John F. Lathen to pay half of the costs.

The defendant John F. Lathen appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the alienation of C. H. Lathen in his life-time to appellant, July 19th, 1878, is void. 2. Because, although the land conveyed by C. H. Lathen to appellant may have been a part of the land allowed him as a bankrupt by the United States Court in bankruptcy, still he had a right to convey it, and his Honor should have so held. 3. Because his Honor erred in holding that Nancy Lathen was entitled to homestead as against appellant in that portion of the land conveyed by C. H. Lathen to appellant. 4. Because his Honor refused to decree specifically whether the deed of J. F. Lathen was valid, or what part, if any, of the land Nancy was entitled to as homestead. 5. Because his Honor ordered that John F. Lathen should pay half the costs."

It will not be necessary in this case to consider what powers belong to the head of a family in respect to disposing of his property which has already been regularly assigned and set apart as a homestead. The general right to homestead under the constitution and law, and the having it actually laid off and assigned by the machinery for that purpose, are very different things. In a general sense, every insolvent debtor, who is the head of a family, may be said, in a proper case, to be entitled to homestead; but the law of the State has directed certain things to be done in order to locate the right and give it practical vitality; *and we suppose that the shield which the homestead affords can be secured only by a compliance with these requirements. It has been held that even the assignment does not protect the property; but in order to have that effect it must be made a record of court as prescribed. Ryan v. Pettigrew, 7 S. C. 146; Choice v. Charles, Ibid. 171; Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 355. The right to homestead is not a new estate taken from one man and given to another, but simply a negation of the ordinary rights of the creditor as to certain property for certain purposes—an "exemption" dealing only with the process for enforcing the contract, "but leaving the title to the property untouched."

Without now going into the question, whether the head of a family has the absolute right to dispose of property which has been regularly set apart as his homestead, it is very certain that at any time before such assignment (notwithstanding the existence of the general undefined right), the owner of the land may alien or mortgage it so as to defeat the right to homestead either on his own part or that of his family. Homestead Association v. Enslow, 7 S. C. 1; Rosenberg v. Lewi, Id. 344; Smith v. Mallone, 10 S. C. 39. It does not seem to us that these lands were regularly assigned as homestead to C. H. Lathen in his life-time. It is not even claimed that they were so assigned, according to the particular requirements of the South Carolina law, or that such assignment was ever returned for record in court, as required by that law. It is, however, suggested that when Lathen, the intestate, filed his petition for bankruptcy in the United States Court, that court assumed jurisdiction of the subject, and thereby "superseded the process of the State court, and in settling the debts of the bankrupt, allowed him the same benefit he would have been entitled to if the property had been subjected to the process of the State courts." In other words, that the refusal of the bankrupt court to include these lands in the conveyance to the assignee in bankruptcy and to have them sold in payment of the debts of the bankrupt, must be regarded as equivalent to an actual, formal assignment of homestead therein.

We do not so understand the bankrupt proceedings. It is true the bankrupt court, when informed by certificate that the lands did not exceed $1,000 in value, which the petitioner might *have assigned to him as homestead, declined to have them sold for the payment of his debts; but, as we understand, this did not amount to an actual assignment of homestead. It was merely "excepting" from sale lands which the bankrupt might have assigned to him as homestead under the South Carolina law, by which State law alone the assignment must be regulated, not only in the mere formal mode and manner of making it, "but its vitality as an existing right must depend on its conformity with all the requirements therein prescribed. * * * It would thus appear that not even the parties to the process, through which the assignment is to be made, are bound by any action under it until it is returned for record in court," &c. Choice v. Charles, supra.

It seems to us that this view is indicated by the terms of the appraisement (the only paper on the subject before us) made for the information of the bankrupt court, which, in appraising the lands, speaks of them as "to be set apart to C. H. Lathen as his exempted property under the provision of the homestead laws of South Carolina," and also to be in conformity with the law of the United States upon the subject of State exemptions. Section 5045 of the U. S. Revised Statutes provides as follows: "There shall be excepted from the operation of the conveyance (from the bankrupt to the assignee in bankruptcy) the necessary household and kitchen furniture, &c., * * * and such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution or other process or order of any court by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount allowed by the constitution and laws of such State as existing in the year 1871," &c.

It seems to us that this provision does not mean that the court shall undertake to go in detail through the whole process of assigning homestead according to the requirements of the statutes of the State, but only directs that so much property as is liable to be assigned as homestead under the State law, shall be omitted—left untouched—"excepted" from the conveyance of the property to be administered in bankruptcy, leaving such "excepted" property entirely under the State law as to the *details of assignment. This construction is shown by another part of the same section of the bankrupt act of March, 1867, which goes on to declare that "these exceptions shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property by the bankrupt to his assignee; and in no case shall the property hereby excepted, pass to the assignee, or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of the title," &c.

We think it was error in the Circuit Court to hold that C. H. Lathen, in his life-time, had not the right to convey one of his tracts of land to his son, John F. In our view he had that right, and the land so conveyed was not subject, either to the widow, as part of her homestead, or to the heirs, for partition. This ruling makes it proper to relieve John F. Lathen from half the costs imposed upon him. As to the widow, Nancy, the Circuit Court held that she was entitled to homestead in the tract still in her possession, and that part of the judgment, not being appealed from, is not before us and we make no ruling upon the subject.

The judgment of this court is that, subject to the modifications herein indicated, the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

KINARD v. BAIRD.

[1. Judgment ⊂⊃70.]

A. purchased from O. a land warrant and gave bond with sureties for the purchase-money, and then he confessed judgment to O. on the bond. Afterwards he assigned the warrant to B., who, finding it worthless, demanded and received from O. the amount of the original purchase-money. Held, that the judgment was a good and valid lien against A. for the use and benefit of O.

[2. Subrogation ⊂⊃31.]

A surety on such bond having paid a part thereof in ignorance of any defense thereto and before the repayment to B., was, without actual assignment of the judgment, subrogated to the extent of such payment to all the rights of O.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃31.]

[3. Subrogation ⊂⊃31.]

The right of action by the surety to recover the amount paid would be barred by the statutory limitation, but he would still retain his right of subrogation to the security of the judgment under which his payment was made.

[4. Principal and Surety ⊂⊃182.]

*The act of 1849 (11 Stat. 556; Gen. Stat., § 2180.) covers a case where a surety pays money on a judgment which is entered against the principal only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 524; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃182.]

[5. Payment ⊂⊃66.]

A judgment is presumed to be paid after a lapse of twenty years, but this presumption is not irrebuttable.

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

The opinion states the case. The action was commenced July 6th, 1880.

Mr. George S. Mower, for appellant.

If defendant received pay from Jones, and Jones was repaid by Lake, the bond would not be void. If it had been, this would not avail defendant. Cheves 15. Upon payment by a surety, he becomes, by operation of law, entitled to the benefit of a judgment against the principal. Actual assignment is not necessary. 11 Stat. 556; 2 Rawle 128; 3 Myl. & K. 183; 1 McCord Ch. 116, 443; 2 Id. 455; 1 Hill Ch. 250; Spears Eq. 543; 3 Strobh. Eq. 149; 5 Rich. Eq. 473; 7 Id. 112; 11 Id. 150. Lake was no longer ordinary when he satisfied the judgment, and it had been previously paid by the sureties, nor could a payment to Lake relieve Baird of his liability to re-imburse his surety. Cheves 15. The plea of the statute of limitations cannot avail the defendant. The presumption of payment from lapse of time was not considered by the Circuit judge; if he erred, a new trial should be had, when the circumstances may be shown. But the payment by Baird, of February 8th, 1869, while ineffectual to discharge his liability, was an admission of indebtedness at that date.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, contra.

Plaintiff's claim was by simple contract, and therefore barred in four years; not having taken an assignment of the bond or judgment, he is not subrogated to the rights of the payee. 4 Mass. 276; 6 Watts & S. 190; 1 Bush. 474; 8 Watts 384; 10 Id. 148. Whether payment by a surety is purchase or extinguishment, is a question of intention, the latter being presumed. *Freem. Judg. § 470. The rule should be the same under the act of 1849. The facts here show an intention by the surety to extinguish. Moreover, the plaintiff is barred by lapse of time. But the entry of satisfaction, in ignorance, by Baird, of Kinard's payment, destroys the judgment. If plaintiff had any rights under this judgment, he should have ordered a levy and sale, and not brought this action.

February 18th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The facts of this case are somewhat obscure, but, as far as can be gathered from the brief, they are as follows:

On October 6th, 1856, Elijah P. Lake, as ordinary of Newberry county, offered for sale a land warrant, issued by the United States government to one John Jones, then deceased. Spencer P. Baird bid it off at the price of $125, for which he gave his bond to the said ordinary in the penal sum of $250, with John P. Kinard and James S. Piester as his sureties. On February 22d, 1858, the said Baird confessed judgment to Lake, ordinary, for the whole penalty of the bond, and execution was regularly issued thereon. On April 12th, 1859, John P. Kinard, one of the sureties on the bond, secured by the judgment against Baird, paid to Lake his share of the same, viz., $74.10, and took from Lake a receipt, but did not take an actual assignment of the judgment and execution against Baird to the extent of the payment. This action was brought by Kinard against Baird to be subrogated to the rights of Lake in the judgment against Baird to the amount paid as surety, and to that extent to revive the said judgment.

The defense was three-fold, and to prevent confusion, we will state the matters separately. First. That the bond given to the ordinary was without consideration, and not recoverable at law, and the payment of the surety was voluntary. It seems that after Baird purchased the warrant and gave his bond, as stated, he transferred it to one D. F. Jones, who soon discovered that it was void, having been issued to the grantee, John Jones, after his death. Upon this discovery, he did not go back upon his *vendor, Baird, but applied to Lake, the ordinary, for rescission, who received back the worthless warrant, and, instead of canceling Baird's bond, paid himself to D. F. Jones (June 16th, 1859) the amount for which the warrant had sold. Neither Baird nor Kinard knew of this transaction between D. F. Jones and the ordinary, or that the warrant was worthless, until lately, when this action was brought. Second. But if the bond was recoverable, and Baird bound by his confession of judgment, the plaintiff Kinard cannot be subrogated to the rights of Lake, the plaintiff in execution, for the reason that in some settlement with Baird, in the year 1869, the said Lake, in his individual capacity, made the following entry in the case on the sheriff's books: "I hereby acknowledge that I have received full satisfaction of debt, interest and costs, February 8th, 1869," signed, E. P. Lake. Third. The defendant also submitted, that the claim was barred by lapse of time and the statute of limitations.

The Circuit judge dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "Because his Honor erred in ruling (1) That the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. (2) That the bond and confession of judgment of the defendant, not having been assigned to the plaintiff, the statute of limitations began to run against him on April 12th, 1859. (3) That the plaintiff could not recover, because of the entry of satisfaction, on February 8th, 1869, in the sheriff's execution book by E. P. Lake, in consideration of the conveyance to him by the defendant, Baird, of a tract of land. (4) That the said confession of judgment was satisfied as against the plaintiff herein. (5) That the payment to E. P. Lake would relieve the defendant of his liability to re-imburse plaintiff, as surety," &c.

It is not expressly stated, but we suppose that when Baird transferred the warrant to D. F. Jones, he received from him payment for the same. The whole transaction is unintelligible upon any other hypothesis. It could only be in this view that Jones received back the purchase-money from the ordinary, Lake. If, in the transfer, Jones had merely assumed Baird's bid, and taken his place on the bond, the simplest adjustment of the matter would have been to return the warrant and have the bond *canceled, thereby relieving both Baird and his sureties.

But, in the view that Baird received value for the property, and the ordinary made Jones whole, the bond was recoverable for his benefit, and the judgment a good and valid lien against Baird. In part payment of this judgment, Kinard, one of the sureties on the bond secured by it, on April 12th, 1859, paid Lake $74.50, and the question is, whether he is entitled to the use of that judgment for the purpose of recovery from Baird the money so paid as surety.

There is no doubt that the payment, in ignorance of any defense to the bond, even if there had existed one, made Baird liable to Kinard for the amount so paid. Stinson v. Brennan, Cheves 16. It is replied to this, that as a simple contract debt for money paid, it would now be barred by the statute of limitations. That may be so, but, as the debt was in judgment against the principal, has not Kinard the right to be subrogated to all the rights of Lake in the judgment to the extent of the money paid by him? It seems to us that he has that right and, although there was no actual assignment by Lake at the time of the payment, for which Kinard took his simple receipt, that he became thereby, ipso facto, the owner of the judgment to the extent of the money paid by him as surety, which right Lake, having knowledge of the payment made to himself, could not ignore or disregard.

Without going into the learning upon the subject of the nature and extent of the right of subrogation as a purely equitable doctrine, we think there can be no doubt as to the rights of a surety who has paid money for his principal on a debt in judgment against him, the said principal, since the act of 1849, which declares in terms, that "the payment by a surety of a debt secured by judgment or decree, shall not operate as a satisfaction of such judgment or decree against the principal debtor, but by such payment the said surety shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the plaintiff in such judgment or decree," &c. Gen. Stat., § 2180. It may be that this act was intended to provide for the case where a joint judgment was recovered against both principal and surety, and it was paid by the latter, but its terms are broad enough to embrace all sureties who come within its reason and spirit. See the case of Wilson v. Wright, 7 Rich.

400, in which *it was held that the terms of the act are large enough to cover the case of an indorser paying a debt which was in judgment against the drawer. The act was intended to dispense with the necessity of assignment, and we think Kinard became the equitable owner of the judgment and execution to the extent of the payment made by him on the day it was made.

It is true that a judgment may be presumed to be paid in twenty years, but that presumption is one of fact, and may be rebutted by circumstances going to show that the defendant in execution, within the time, made acknowledgments, by payments or otherwise, that the judgment was a subsisting and valid lien—such acknowledgments operating to give a new starting point for the commencement of the time from which payment is presumed. This point seems not to have been considered by the Circuit judge, who ruled that the lapse of twenty years was an absolute bar. The plaintiff had the right to be heard on that subject, and the case must go back for that purpose.

It was further opposed, that the plaintiff, Kinard, can have no benefit from the judgment and execution, for the reason that Lake, the plaintiff, entered satisfaction in full upon the execution in 1869, after he had ceased to be ordinary. We incline to think that he had no right to enter satisfaction on so much of the execution as at that time, to his knowledge, belonged to Kinard, the plaintiff in this action. But Lake is not before the court, and we will not now consider that point.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to amend his complaint by making E. P. Lake, or his legal representative, a party defendant, with proper prayers that the entry of satisfaction on the execution of Lake, ordinary, against S. P. Baird may be set aside, and the said judgment revived against the defendant, Baird, to the extent of $70.49 and the interest thereon.

Before Wallace, J., Orangeburg, May, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. Malcolm I. Browning, for appellant.

An indictment could not be amended at common law. 1 Arch. Cr. L. 313; 4 Burr. 2529; Bac. Abr. title Indict. G. II., title Amend. C. The statute of jeofails did not apply to pleas of the Crown. 1 Chit. Crim. L. 295; 2 Mason 145; 12 Mod. 229; 6 Mod. 281; 1 Bish. Cr. Pro. 97, 98, 707, 710, 711. While amendments in the caption have been permitted, in our State amendments of the body of an indictment is unprecedented. 1 Brev. 169; 2 McCord 301. Difference between body and caption. 1 Arch. Cr. As to the omission of the presiding judge to demand of prisoner whether he had aught to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him—this is absolutely and indispensably necessary, and it must appear on the record, to make the judgment lawful. 1 Arch. *384

3 Mod. 265. The appeal presents a *series of violations of the constitutional safeguards of liberty and life. Cons., Art. I, Sec. 14. Unless this court intervenes, a man—a very humble man—it is most respectfully submitted, will be deprived of his life, otherwise than by the law of the land.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

February 22d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. In this case a bill of indictment charging the appellant with the offense of murder, was preferred to and presented by the grand jury as a true bill. When the arraignment of the prisoner was in progress, and before the defendant had pleaded to the indictment, the solicitor, discovering a clerical error in the indictment, asked the counsel for the prisoner if he would consent to an amendment, which being refused, the solicitor made the amendment by striking out a word improperly inserted, and without entering a nolle prosequi upon the indictment, recommitted the same indictment, with said word erased, to the same grand jury who returned it with an indorsement, "True Bill, W. W. Wannamaker, foreman," their first finding having been erased. The error in the indictment, as first found, consisted in the insertion of the word "January" after the words "in the year of" in that portion of the indictment which specified the time when the offense charged was alleged to have been committed, so as to make it read "on the sixteenth day of January in the year of January, our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three," and the amendment consisted in the erasure of the word "January" after the words "in the year of."

The trial having resulted in a conviction of the defendant, he, by his counsel, made a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The Circuit judge refused the motion for a new trial, but held the motion in arrest of judgment under advisement. Subsequently, the motion in arrest of judgment was called up, and the Circuit judge, "after hearing some further discussion by defendant's attorney, overruled the motion; during which discussion and ruling the accused was not present in court." When *the prisoner was called up for sentence, the Circuit Judge, without demanding of him if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him," proceeded to render judgment in the usual form, that the prisoner "be hanged by the neck until the body be dead," &c.

The defendant appeals upon the following grounds: First. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the indictment was amended by the solicitor and recommitted to the grand jury, 'nolle prosequi' not having been entered thereon. Second. Because the accused was not in court when the motion in arrest of judgment was ruled upon and decided. Third. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, did not ask the accused if he had anything more to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, before such sentence was passed."

First, as to the effect of the amendment. The authorities leave no doubt of the proposition that mere clerical errors, or mere matters of form, in an indictment may be amended at any time, before plea pleaded, with the consent of the grand jury. In 1 Chit. Crim. L. 297, it is said: "It is the common practice for the grand jury to consent, at the time they are sworn, that the court shall amend matters of form altering no matter of substance, and mere informalities may, therefore, be amended by the court before the commencement of the trial." In Stark. Cr. Pl. 287, it is said: "It is the common practice at present to amend indictments in matters of form, whilst the grand jury are before the court; for which purpose they formally give their consent that the court shall amend matters of form altering no matter of substance." To same effect see 1 Bish. Cr. Pro. (first edit.), § 391; 2 Hawk. P. C., c. 25, § 98; and in Mill. Comp. 147, note c. (a work which is well known to have been compiled and annotated by that distinguished judge, D. L. Wardlaw,) it is said, in speaking of the grand jury, "The foreman hands the bills to the clerk and the clerk reads the title of each case and what the jury have written, taking care that the finding be written on the indictment. The clerk may then ask, 'Gentlemen, you agree that the court shall amend matters of form, altering no matter of substance?' To which the foreman may reply—'Yes.' This, *not usually done in this State, is always supposed to have been done, and is always done in England." In this case it is quite clear that the error which was amended, was, as Gibson, C. J., said, in Sparks v. Commonwealth, 9 Barr. 354, "One of those clerical slips which, it is well settled, the court has power, by the previous assent of the grand jury, to amend." And it is equally clear that the grand jury did, in the most formal manner possible, give their assent to the amendment. The first ground of appeal cannot, therefore, be sustained.

Next, we are to consider whether it was essential that the accused should have been present at the final discussion of the motion in arrest of judgment, and when the Circuit judge made his ruling thereon. The right of the accused to be present at every stage of his trial, is one that has long existed, and is especially guaranteed by section 13, article I., of the present constitution of this State; but a motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, is no part of the trial. That must necessarily have terminated before such a motion could be made, and we are not aware of any authority, or any reason, which establishes the right of the accused to be present at the hearing of such a motion. In England, it has been held that such a motion cannot be made by the accused unless he is present before the court, for the reason, as was said in one of the cases, that "the court will be sure of him" before he will be heard by counsel on such a motion. Rex v. Spragg, 2 Burr. 930; Rex v. Hayes, 2 Str. 844; Rex v. Gibson, 2 Str. 968; Rex v. Niccolls, 2 Str. 1227. But this was a rule for the benefit of the government, and not for the accused; and it is at least doubtful whether such a rule has generally prevailed in America. 1 Bish. Crim. Pro., §§ 691, 692. We think, however, that the question which we are called upon to decide is to be determined by the same principle which governed in the case of State v. David, 14 S. C. 428, and that there is no necessity for the presence of the prisoner at the hearing of a motion for a new trial, or a motion in arrest of judgment, either in the Circuit or Supreme Court, unless he claims the right guaranteed to him by the clause of the constitution above cited, of being heard by himself as well as by counsel.

In this case it does not appear that the prisoner claimed any *such right, but, on the contrary, was fully heard by his counsel. The second ground of appeal cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The third ground is well taken, as was shown in the case of the State v. Trezevant, ante, p. 363 [47 Am. Rep. 840], heard at the present term of this court. But as there held, the error imputed by this ground did not affect the trial, but only the sentence, and hence the appellant is not entitled to a new trial, but simply entitled to be resentenced in conformity with the forms of law.

The judgment of this court is that the sentence in this case be set aside, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling that court to sentence the prisoner according to law.

20 S. C. 387

STATE v. JOHNSON.

[1. Fraud ⇦68.]

Under the statute making it a misdemeanor willfully and knowingly to sell property covered by a lien without giving notice of the lien, a sale without giving notice of a lien, of which the vendor was ignorant, is no offense.

[2. Fraud ⇦68.]

Where a vendor, ignorant of a judgment having a lien upon the land, and himself the maker of two mortgages, told the purchaser that "he would arrange to meet or pay such matters as he had put upon the land," he is not guilty under this statute, as he did not intentionally suppress notice of the judgment, and did give notice sufficient to lead to knowledge of the two mortgages.

[3. Fraud ⇦69.]

But the vendor's ignorance of the judgment-lien being disputed, a request to charge, which ignored the lien of the judgment, was properly refused.

[4. Fraud ⇦69.]

The offense of selling is but one offense under this act, however many liens may have existed at the time, and the judge therefore properly refused both to require the solicitor to indicate which one of the three liens he relied upon, and also a motion in arrest of judgment based upon this objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. ⇦69.]

[5. Fraud ⇦68.]

The lien of a judgment is as much within the meaning of this statute, as a mortgage or other lien.

Before Wallace, J., Aiken, September, 1883.

This was a prosecution against J. E. Johnson for selling to G. W. Buzbee, on February 10th, 1882, a tract of land covered by liens without giving notice of such liens. On February 20th, 1883, the same land was sold by the sheriff to John Jordan *under a judgment and execution of 1877 in favor of Jordan against J. E. Johnson. There were also two mortgages resting upon the land at the time of sale. The balance due upon these mortgages was paid after defendant's arrest in this case, in January, 1883.

There was conflict of testimony as to G. W. Buzbee's knowledge of this judgment. The defendant testified that he "did not know that the Jordan judgment was a lien" upon the land, as he "bought the land some time after that judgment was obtained." Buzbee testified that defendant told him "there was not the scratch of a pen" against the land. Defendant denied this, and said: "I told him that there was nothing against the land, except what I had put over it, and that I was responsible for such things and would pay them." Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. W. Croft, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Gantt, contra.

February 22d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant was indicted under the act of 1873, (15 Stat. 332, incorporated in the general statutes of 1882 as section 2514,) for selling certain real estate, covered by certain liens, without giving notice thereof to the purchaser. The indictment specified three liens, to which the property sold was subject, viz.: A judgment in favor of John Jordan, a mortgage in favor of C. K. Henderson, and a mortgage in favor of P. W. Ferrell. At the close of the testimony, defendant's counsel moved the court to require the solicitor "to elect which lien upon the property sold, of which the defendant did not give notice, upon which the State would ask a conviction." This motion was refused, and exception was duly taken.

The counsel for the defendant then requested the Circuit judge to charge as follows: "1. That if the jury believe that at the time, or before the defendant made his deed to G. W. Buzbee, he was not aware that the judgment of John Jordan against him constituted a lien upon the land conveyed, and at *such time he also notified Buzbee that he would arrange to meet or pay such matters as he (the defendant) had put upon the land, and that he has done so, then he must be acquitted. 2. That if the jury believe that the defendant, at the time or before he made the deed to G. W. Buzbee, told him that there was nothing against the land except such matters as he had put on it, and he would arrange to pay such matters, such notice was sufficient notice of any lien that the defendant himself put upon the land; and that, in such case, Buzbee cannot now complain of any mortgage that the defendant had placed on the land which had been paid; and that the defendant should be acquitted."

The Circuit judge declined to charge as requested, and the jury having rendered a verdict of guilty, the defendant moved, in arrest of judgment, upon the following ground: "That the indictment is defective, in that it contains the charges in one count of selling with more than one lien upon the same, whereas it is respectfully submitted, that for every lien upon the land, the selling of which without giving notice thereof was a separate offense, and should have been laid in separate counts." This motion was overruled, and sentence was passed upon the defendant.

The defendant appeals, substantially, upon the following grounds: 1. Because the Circuit judge refused to require the solicitor to elect which of the liens mentioned in the indictment he intended to rely upon. 2. Because of error in refusing the requests to charge as above set out. 3. Because a judgment is not such a lien as is contemplated by the statute under which the defendant was indicted. 4. Because of error in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment.

It appeared in evidence that the Jordan judgment had been recovered against the defendant before he bought the land which he sold to Buzbee, and that the two mortgages mentioned in the indictment had been put upon the land by the defendant some time before the sale, and had both been satisfied before the trial of this case, though the final payments seem to have been made after this prosecution was commenced. The land was sold by the sheriff under the Jordan judgment and bought by Jordan. The language of the statute under which the defendant is *indicted is as follows: "That from and after the passage of this act, any person or persons who shall willfully and knowingly sell and convey any real or personal property on which any lien or liens exist, without first giving notice of such lien or liens to the purchaser or purchasers of such real or personal property, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c.

The manifest object of this act is to prevent intentional fraud or deceit in the sale of property by the suppression of facts which it would be important for a purchaser to know before the sale is completed. The words of the statute are "willfully and knowingly," hence if the act intended to be prohibited is done unintentionally, or ignorantly, the offense created by the statute is not complete. A man may sell and convey property to another which is covered by a lien, of which he gives no notice to the purchaser, and yet, unless he does so willfully and knowingly, he has not violated the statute in question. Keeping this view of the statute in mind, let us consider whether there was any error in refusing the first request to charge. That request substantially amounted to this, that if the jury believe that the defendant was ignorant of the fact that the Jordan judgment was a lien upon the land when he made the sale to Buzbee, and at the same time gave him notice that he would arrange to pay the liens—mortgages—which he himself had put upon the land, then the defendant must be acquitted.

We think there was error in refusing this request, for if the defendant ignorantly, and therefore unintentionally, made the sale without mentioning the lien of the Jordan judgment, it certainly could not be said that he did so knowingly and willfully, and hence he could not be convicted on account of that lien. And if he also brought to the attention of the purchaser the fact that he himself had put certain liens upon the land, by saying "that he would arrange to meet or pay such matters as he (the defendant) had put upon the land," it could not be properly said that he had sold the land without first giving notice of such liens as he had himself put upon the land, to wit, the mortgages. The statute, it will be observed, does not prescribe the degree or kind of notice to be given, and hence we must resort to the general rule upon the subject, and that is, that such notice *as will put a party upon inquiry is sufficient notice of every fact which such inquiry, properly prosecuted, would disclose. Now, if a purchaser is told by his vendor that he has arranged or will arrange "to meet or pay such matters as he had put upon the land" which is the subject of negotiation, he surely has such notice as would put him upon inquiry, for what else can such language mean but that the vendor had put incumbrances of some kind upon the land which he expected to remove?

The second request to charge was properly refused, as it entirely ignored the lien of the Jordan judgment. Substantially, it amounted to a request that the jury should be instructed to acquit the defendant if they believed that he had notified the purchaser of the mortgages, ignoring the necessity for any inquiry as to the Jordan judgment.

The first and fourth grounds of appeal will be considered together, as they both rest upon the mistaken idea that because the property sold was covered by three liens, three offenses should have been charged. The offense consists in selling property "on which any lien or liens exist, without first giving notice of such lien or liens." There was but the one sale, and but one offense charged. The number of liens, whether one or a dozen, had nothing whatever to do with fixing the nature of the offense, however much it might aggravate its character. By the express terms of the statute it is made "a misdemeanor" for a person to sell property covered by "a lien or liens, without giving notice of such lien or liens." As is said in 1 Bish. Cr. Pro. (first edit.), § 191: "It is not, therefore, an objection to an indictment that a part of the allegations might be lopped off and yet the indictment remain sufficient. Where, for instance, a statute forbids several things in the alternative, it is usually construed as creating but one offense; and the indictment may charge the defendant with the commission of all the acts, using the conjunction 'and' where the statute uses the disjunctive 'or'; or, on the other hand, the indictment may contain but one or two of the things at the election of the pleader. Thus, where the allegation was that the defendant sold spirituous liquors, to wit, rum, brandy, whiskey and gin, in less quantities than one quart, without license, and it was objected that there were here four *offenses set down in one count, the court overruled the objection, saying: 'The selling of any of the liquors named would be an offense; but there is no more reason why an offender should be indicted separately for each than there would be to charge a thief, who had stolen a suit of clothes, in separate counts for the coat, waistcoat,'" &c.

So, in this State, in the case of State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 172, it has been held that an indictment for retailing spirituous liquors without a license is not bad on the ground of duplicity or misjoinder, because various acts of retailing to different persons are grouped together in one count as constituting a single offense, and if the proof shows a retailing to either of the persons named, the defendant may be convicted. We do not think, therefore, that there was any error on the part of the Circuit judge, either in refusing the motion to require the solicitor to elect upon which lien he would rely, or in refusing the motion in arrest of judgment.

No authority has been cited; and we know of none to sustain the third ground of appeal. Nor do we see any reason upon which such ground can be sustained. The language of the statute is very comprehensive—any lien or liens—and, as a judgment is unquestionably a lien, we are unable to see by what authority we would be warranted in so restricting the terms of the statute as to exclude a lien by judgment. But inasmuch as there was error in refusing the first request to charge, there must be a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Wallace, J., Orangeburg, May, 1883.

This was a prosecution against George S. Shirer for breach of trust with fraudulent intent, and larceny, in taking money out of the safe of Banks & Smith, by whom defendant was employed. The defense was, that defendant was called out of his house after midnight, and then taken and tied by two men, who forced him to tell them the combination of the safe-lock. The opinion states the case.

The ruling of the presiding judge upon the motion to quash and the motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment and upon the demurrer, need not be given. His charge to the jury was as follows:

We have a statute that is in these words:

"Any person com*mitting a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent, shall be held guilty of larceny." The defendant stands charged under that statute. He stands further charged with the offense of larceny at common law. You have heard the testimony. You have heard that testimony discussed by experienced and able counsel. You are to collect from that testimony the truth of the facts. It is for that purpose in our courts that juries are organized. The law devolves upon me the duty of explaining to you the nature of the offenses with which the defendant stands charged. Then your duty is to apply the truth of the facts to those rules that I will state to you and to draw your conclusion whether, or not, those offenses have been committed by this defendant.

There are four counts in the indictment. The first count charges a breach of trust under the statute that I have read to you. Now, what is a breach of trust? Before there can be a breach of trust there must be a trust. Now what is a trust, in the sense in which that word is used in this statute? A breach of trust is where personal property of appreciable value and of which larceny may be committed is put into the possession of another; and when it is so put into his possession it becomes a trust, and while it so remains, if he conceives the purpose to convert that property to his own use, and does it with intention to deprive the owner of the use of that property, then that is a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent.

Now I will point out to you presently how that differs from stealing—from larceny at common law. There must be in the possession of the defendant charged, a sum of money in this case, either bank bills, or gold, or silver coin, or both, the property of Messrs. Banks & Smith. It must be in his possession—in his entire and complete possession. He must not share the possession with anybody else. If you should find, in this case, that money belonging to these prosecuting witnesses was in the possession of this defendant, and that he converted it to his own use, intending to deprive them of it, then that would be a breach of trust with fraudulent intent.

Now, in any one of the stores in this town, there may be proprietors and clerks—there may be in the store-room where the money is put, a drawer, and to which everybody, who has a *right to be there and participate in the transactions of the business, has a right to go. That money is not in the possession of the clerks, but in the possession of those to whom it belongs. But if those to whom it belongs should take that money or any part of it and put it in the hands of the clerk and send him to Charleston to buy goods with it for them, then it is in the possession of the clerk, and if under those circumstances he converts it to his own use, that is a breach of trust. You will see, therefore, to sum up on this subject, that there must be money in the possession of this defendant, belonging to these prosecuting witnesses, and that after it is in his possession he has converted it to his own use in order to find a verdict of guilty on the first count. Do the facts as ascertained from the testimony satisfy you, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the existence of that state of things? If so, you must find the defendant guilty on the first count. If not so, you must acquit him on the first count.

Now there are three other counts, all relating to the crime of larceny at common law. What is larceny at common law? It is the taking and carrying away of the goods or chattels of another with the intention to convert them to the taker's use. In that case, he takes goods that are not in his possession at the time of the conception of the fraudulent intention, and that is the distinction between larceny and breach of trust. In one case the goods are already in his possession and in the other case, to make out larceny, the goods are not in his possession until he feloniously takes them. Did this defendant do that? Are you satisfied from the testimony that he did do it—that he feloniously took the money, either greenbacks, gold or silver coin, or both, from the possession of Messrs. Banks & Smith, and converted it to his own use. If so, convict him of larceny. If you are not so satisfied, acquit him of larceny.

You will observe that in regard to the facts in this case I have not said one word to you. To say what degree of force and effect to attach to the statements of the witnesses—to say what is credible and incredible, is a matter which the law devolves entirely upon you, and prohibits the presiding judge to give his opinion on that subject. My duty is to declare the legal rules involved in the charges. You decide from the testimony *whether those charges have been made out to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt. If they have been, you must convict the defendant. If they have not been, you must acquit him. Whenever a defendant is charged in this court with a crime against the laws of this State, he comes into court under the presumption of innocence. Whenever he is arraigned at that bar he is under the legal presumption of innocence, and he stands an innocent man and must go an innocent man, unless that presumption is removed by the testimony adduced against him, to the extent of satisfying the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, of his guilt. He does not have to establish his innocence. There could be no phase of any criminal case in South Carolina where the obligation is upon the defendant to establish his innocence. He is an innocent man and is entitled to an acquittal until the testimony establishes his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. But whenever the testimony reaches that point of establishing his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, then all presumptions of innocence fade out of the case and stand no longer as a shield and protection against the charge of the crime.

So if you should think the defendant is guilty of a breach of trust committed with a fraudulent intent, if the testimony satisfies you of that beyond a reasonable doubt, say guilty on the first count. If you are not so satisfied, say not guilty on the first count. If you are satisfied from the testimony that the defendant is guilty of grand larceny—that is, of having stolen money, either bills or coin, or both, to an amount above $20, say guilty of grand larceny. If the proof does not satisfy you that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of either breach of trust or larceny, say not guilty generally.

The jury having failed to agree, and being sent for by the court, were asked if they desired to have the testimony read to them or any further instructions as to the law. At the request of jurors, extracts of testimony were read, and, in response to a request from a juror for further instruction as to the difference between breach of trust and larceny, the court charged as follows: If Mr. A. is in possession of personal property of his own, and B. takes the property away from A., intending to convert it to his own use, that is larceny. If A. owns property and puts it *in the hands of B. for B. to go to Charleston to buy goods with, and after he starts or while he is in Charleston, if it occurs to him that he will take that money and apply it to his own use, that is a breach of trust, because A. has trusted him and created a trust in his hands, and after that is done he conceives the intention of making use of the property put into his hands. He could not commit a larceny of property placed in his hands, for a larceny is to take, originally, and carry away the property of another with the intention to convert to the taker's use. In this case, if Mr. Shirer had put in his possession money belonging to Mr. Banks and Mr. Smith, and he had it in his possession, and after he had it in his possession he held it as a trust, and he conceived the idea of taking that money and appropriating it to his own use, and deprive Banks & Smith of it, that would be a breach of trust; but if it was not in his possession, and was in the possession of Banks & Smith, and he took it, it never having been intrusted to him, that would be a larceny.

Suppose that money was in this safe, and that Mr. Banks and Mr. Smith, either or both of them, as partners, had access to that money whenever they pleased, and Mr. Shirer, to enable him to carry out the purposes of his employment, had access to it too, then you see it is no more in the possession of Mr. Shirer than it is in the possession of Banks & Smith. If that should be the state of facts, Mr. Shirer could not commit a breach of trust with that money, because it was not exclusively in his possession. But Mr. Banks and Mr. Smith, having equal access and control of that money, in legal contemplation it was in their possession, and he could not commit a breach of trust of that money, for no trust of that money existed. But he could commit a larceny of that money, because, it being in the possession of Banks & Smith, if he took it out of their possession and appropriated it to his own use, that was larceny. Now, if Mr. Shirer had money belonging to Banks & Smith in his possession, by their consent, to which they did not have equal access with him, that was in his possession and put there separate and apart by him, and he appropriated that money to his own use, intending to deprive the real owners of their money, that was a breach of trust with a fraudulent intention.

*By a Juror—Do you mean to say that that money was in the drawers of that safe, and Mr. Shirer had the keys and took the money out of those drawers, and if he did that it was larceny?

By the Court—No; I mean to say that that is a matter of fact for you. The question of possession is a matter of fact for you to determine. If there was money in that safe, to which Mr. Banks and Mr. Smith had access just as much as Mr. Shirer had, and Mr. Shirer took it out of the safe, intending to divert it to his own use, that was larceny. If Mr. Shirer was arrested and tied by two men, and, under the threats of these men, surrendered the combination by means of which the safe was unlocked and those men went and took the money, then those men committed the larceny and Mr. Shirer did not. If Mr. Shirer took the money and then tied himself down there, then he committed the larceny, or the breach of trust, as you may determine. You must decide from the facts whether the money was in the possession of the defendant or in the possession of the real owners. If Mr. Banks and Mr. Smith had access to that money whenever they pleased, just like the proprietor of a store has access to his cash-box, and like the clerks have access to it, then the possession of that money was not in Mr. Shirer but in Messrs. Banks & Smith. But if that money was intrusted into the absolute possession of Mr. Shirer, and they did not have such an access, then the trust was created.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant, George S. Shirer, was indicted in the Court of General Sessions for the county of Orangeburg, at the October Term, 1882, under the statute of 1866, which declares that "any person committing a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent shall be held guilty of larceny," re-enacted in general statutes as section 2493. Upon motion of defendant's counsel, the presiding judge, Pressley, quashed the indictment upon the grounds, principally, that the facts set forth did not constitute a breach of trust, but simple larceny, and that the ownership of the property was not sufficiently alleged.

At the January Term of 1883 he was again indicted upon the same transaction, in four counts; one for fraudulent breach of trust, and three with some variations for grand larceny. Judge Cothran granted a motion to quash the first count for fraudulent breach of trust, leaving only the three larceny counts. Upon these the defendant pleaded "not guilty;" and a jury being charged with the issues, failed to agree upon a verdict, and were discharged by the court, and the cause was continued.

At the May Term, 1883, the solicitor entered a nolle prosequi upon this indictment without the consent of the defendant, and gave out a new bill based upon the same transaction, which contained a count for fraudulent breach of trust, and three counts for larceny as before. The first count charged as follows: "That the said George S.

Shirer, on the 20th day of June, *1882, with force and arms at Orangeburg, in the county of Orangeburg and State aforesaid, did unlawfully and feloniously commit a breach of trust with fraudulent intent, in this, that the said George S. Shirer, being then and there a clerk and in the employment of one Hugh R. Banks, and one T. Ogier Smith, trading as copartners under the firm name of Banks & Smith, by virtue and reason of such employment was authorized and empowered to collect, receive and keep certain sums of money then and there due unto and owned by the said Banks & Smith; and that the said George S. Shirer, by virtue of said employment, was furthermore intrusted with the key of the office whereat the said Banks & Smith did business, and in possession of the combination by which the safe of the said Banks & Smith was locked and unlocked, and of two keys by which were locked and unlocked two drawers within said safe; that the said George S. Shirer, by virtue of the employment and authority aforesaid, on the said twentieth day of June in the year aforesaid, at Orangeburg, in the county and State aforesaid, did receive and had in his custody and possession the sum of $395, lawful currency of the United States, of denomination and issue to the jurors aforesaid unknown, of the value of three hundred and ninety-five dollars, which said sum of money he, the said George S. Shirer, then and there had and held in trust for the use of the said Banks & Smith, and to pay the same over to the order and under the direction of the said Banks & Smith. And the jurors aforesaid, &c., do further present that the said George S. Shirer, then and there having in his custody the sum of money aforesaid, which he held upon the trust aforesaid, did fraudulently and feloniously take, use, divert and convert to his own use," &c.

Upon arraignment, a motion was again made to quash the count for fraudulent breach of trust above given; but the motion was refused by Judge Wallace. The defendant then pleaded "former jeopardy" for the same offense; claiming that the jury having been charged with the trial of the cause, and a mistrial entered at the previous term, the entry of a nolle prosequi afterwards was equivalent to an acquittal, and entitled the defendant to his discharge. To this plea the solicitor demurred, and the *presiding judge sustained the demurrer and overruled the plea. The defendant then pleaded "not guilty," and the trial was had.

Among other things, it appeared that Banks & Smith were in the rice milling business at Orangeburg; that they had an office in which the business was conducted, and the defendant Shirer was employed by them as a general office clerk. Smith had general charge of the outdoor work, and Banks looked after the finances and office work. Shirer and Banks together kept the books of the concern; Shirer had charge of the cash on hand; that there was a safe in the office, with a combination lock, of which no one had knowledge but the partners and Shirer. All could enter the office and the safe; but inside the safe there were two drawers, to which Shirer alone had access. The use of these had been assigned to him for the purpose of keeping at night the cash received during the day. Shirer alone had the key to these drawers; and the allegation was that, on the night of the larceny, he had in this drawer $394, money belonging to the proprietors, Banks & Smith, which said money he, Shirer, in breach of the trust reposed in him, fraudulently appropriated to his own use.

Under the charge of the judge the jury rendered a verdict of "guilty on the first count" (for breach of trust with fraudulent intent), and "not guilty on the other count" (for grand larceny). The defendant, by his counsel, moved in arrest of judgment, and, failing in that, for a new trial. The presiding judge refused both motions, and sentenced the defendant to twelve months imprisonment at hard labor in the State penitentiary, and he appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in denying the motion of the defendant to quash the first count of the said indictment.

2. "Because the said count, upon which the judgment was pronounced, is fatally defective in this, that it does not comply with the requirements of article I., section 13, of the constitution of this State in the description of the offense charged; and his Honor erred in refusing so to rule.

3. "Because the said count is not sufficient in respect to the *allegation of the ownership of the property alleged to have been feloniously converted; and his Honor erred in refusing so to rule.

4. "Because the said count is insufficient in this, that it lacks particularity of description of the property alleged to have been feloniously converted; and his Honor erred in declining so to rule.

5. "Because the said count is insufficient in this, that it does not allege facts and circumstances which constitute the statutory offense designated breach of trust with fraudulent intent; and his Honor erred in declining so to rule.

6. "Because, in two successive indictments against this defendant for the same offense as that charged in the said first count, and under the same prosecution, at two successive terms of the said Court of General Sessions, a count for a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent has been quashed by the judges presiding at said terms upon defects appearing in the said first count of the present indictment and contained in the foregoing exceptions; and his Honor erred in disregarding the said previous decisions in this cause.

7. "Because his Honor erred in overruling this defendant's plea of former jeopardy, and in sustaining the demurrer of the State thereto.

8. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, and in denying his motion for a new trial, and in overruling each and every of the grounds submitted in support of the said motions, which grounds were as follows, to wit: (1) Because the matter alleged in the said first count of the indictment does not constitute the offense of breach of trust. (2) Because the said count does not state that the property alleged to have been feloniously converted was of the proper moneys of the said Banks & Smith, or of any other person or persons. (3) Because there is no sufficient allegation of ownership of the property alleged to have been feloniously converted. (4) Because there is no sufficiently particular description of the property alleged to have been feloniously converted. (5) Because the defendant's plea of former jeopardy is good and sufficient in law. (6) Because there is entire failure of *proof of breach of trust. (7) Because there is no proof that the property stolen was out of the legal possession of Banks & Smith; but all the proof shows that the defendant had the care, charge and custody thereof, but had not the legal possession. (8) Because there is no proof of any sum of money received by the defendant for Banks & Smith from any third person. (9) Because there is no proof of the receipt and conversion of lawful currency of the United States as alleged in the indictment. (10) Because there is no proof to correspond with such allegation on the subject of ownership of the property alleged to have been converted as may be found in the indictment.

9. "Because, in refusing said motions, his Honor erred in ruling as follows: (1) That 'if certain moneys were in the custody of the defendant, but in the legal possession of his employers, any fraudulent conversion of the moneys so held by him was breach of trust, which the statute declares to be larceny. (2) That it was not necessary that it should be in proof that the money was out of the legal possession of Banks & Smith. (3) That it was not necessary that there should be any proof of any sum of money received by the defendant for Banks & Smith from any third person. (4) That in case a servant or clerk is intrusted with funds of the employer, and the servant or clerk subsequently converts those funds to his own use, in fraud of the rights of his employer, he is guilty of larceny; and 'that our act and the common law are in exact accord upon that subject.' (5) That our act which declares that 'any person committing a breach of trust with a fraudulent intention shall be held guilty of larceny,' is nothing more than the declaration of the principles of the common law in cases of this nature."

We will not attempt to consider the numerous exceptions seriatim, but to dispose of the points made in their regular order. First. The first and sixth exceptions allege error on the part of the Circuit judge, in refusing the motion of defendant to quash the first count of the indictment. We cannot say that this was error of law. To quash an indictment is not a proceeding as of right, but the motion is addressed to the discretion of the court. In ordinary circumstances, and according to what is believed to be the more common practice, the decision of the presiding judge *is not open to review by a higher court. 1 Bish. Crim. Pro., § 701. The modern practice is not to resort to the process of quashing except in extreme cases. At all events the same objections were afterwards urged on the motion in arrest of judgment and will be considered when we come to that subject. It may be proper to state, however, that the count for fraudulent breach of trust, which Judge Wallace refused to quash, differs in several particulars from the count in former indictments, which were quashed successively by Judges Pressley and Cothran.

Second. Exception seven complains that the Circuit judge committed error in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's plea of former jeopardy. The precise point made is, that the defendant, having been put to answer a former indictment which resulted in a mistrial, and the solicitor having entered a nolle prosequi on that indictment and given out another based upon the same transaction, is entitled to his discharge precisely as if the jury, on the former trial, had acquitted him. In some aspects this question is not free from difficulty. It is believed that in all civilized countries it is recognized as a fundamental principle of justice, that a man ought not to be twice punished for the same offense, but in carrying out the principle the authorities are not in accord; more particularly as to whether mere jeopardy shall be regarded as punishment, and, if so, as to when that jeopardy is to be considered as commencing and ending. "It is the universal maxim of the common law," says Blackstone, "that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offense." 4 Bl. Com. 335. The constitution of the United States declares, "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." Article V. of Amendments. There was no express law in this State upon the subject until 1868, when our present constitution declared that "No person after having been once acquitted by a jury, shall again for the same offense be put in jeopardy of his life or liberty." Section 18, Article I.

It seems to be now settled after some conflict in the authorities, that the provision in the constitution of the United States applies only to offenses and trials under the laws of the general government. 1 Bish. Crim. L.

981, and note. This being the *case, the courts in this State, up to 1868, could only conform to the doctrine as announced by the common law, which held that legal jeopardy was equivalent to punishment, and that necessarily brought along with it all the embarrassing questions as to when jeopardy attached and when it ended. Of course, by the very terms in which the rule is announced, both the first and second jeopardy had to be in regard to "the same offense;" and it will be observed that in this case the defendant, on the occasion of the mistrial, could not have been in jeopardy in regard to the offense of breach of trust, of which he was convicted on the last trial, for there was no such count in the indictment on which he was then committed to the jury. In reference to the question whether the offense is the same, the test is, "whether, if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction. Where there could, the second could not be maintained; where there could not, it can be." 1 Bish. Crim. L., § 1062. We take it that there could not have been a conviction on the first trial for larceny, upon proof only of what was set out in the count for breach of trust in the second indictment.

But it is claimed that the effect of the demurrer was to admit technically the statement of the plea that the offenses charged were the same, and we will let that matter pass. Taking it to be "the same offense," then, even in the view that the jeopardy attached as soon as the jury was charged with the trial, several exceptions had to be made from the necessity of the cases, in order to prevent a flagrant failure of justice. Our court held, in the case of State v. McKee, 1 Bailey 654 [21 Am. Dec. 499], that "a jury, after they are charged, can be discharged and the prisoner tried a second time for the following causes only: first, the consent of the prisoner; second, illness of one of the jury, the prisoner, or the court; third, absence of one of the jurymen; or fourth, the impossibility of their agreeing on a verdict." The case under consideration comes within the last exception. The jury could not agree and the judge had the right to discharge them and set down the case for a new trial.

So far there is clear precedent; but it is earnestly urged that this authority for a second trial was necessarily limited to a trial *on the very same indictment, and that the withdrawal of that by the entry of a nolle prosequi and the substitution of another, entitled the defendant to his discharge. Why so? The doctrine underlying these exceptional cases seems to be, that there never was any real, but only apparent jeopardy "whenever, either in felony or misdemeanor, the judge discovers anything which will render the verdict void, or subject to be avoided by the prisoner, or will render it impossible that a verdict should be rendered—anything, in other words, establishing that no jeopardy has really attached to the prisoner—and that any further proceeding in the trial will be fruitless, he may adjudge the fact, put the adjudication on record and discharge the jury." 1 Bish. Crim. L., § 1036.

Besides, there can be no doubt that even after trial, an indictment may be withdrawn, if it is discovered to be insufficient. There can be no legal jeopardy upon a bad indictment. 1 Bish., § 1021. Nothing appears upon the subject of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the indictment here, but we suppose that there was some objection to it or it would not have been withdrawn. Be that as it may, it would seem that setting down a case for further proceedings, would give all the rights incident to such position, one of which is, that the solicitor may enter a nolle prosequi and give out a new bill, at any time before the jury is charged with the case. State v. Gulden, 2 McCord 524; People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal. 334. In the case last quoted, as stated by the Circuit judge, Judge McKinstry substantially held, that the reason for the exceptions named, including the case of a mistrial, was that in these cases there never had been a real, but only an apparent jeopardy. We do not, however, think it necessary to make that ruling.

But there is another view. Our State constitution has a provision on the subject, which, in terms, differs both from that of the constitution of the United States, and from the maxim of the common law as announced by the learned judges. The words are: "No person, after having been once acquitted by a jury, shall again for the same offense be put in jeopardy of his life or liberty." We do not understand that this constitutional provision is to be considered as merely declaratory of the common law, but, on the contrary, as superseding and repealing it, *wherever the two are inconsistent with each other. "In England the common law maxim is a mere deduction made by some judge or text-writer from the adjudications, which must govern, if found in conflict with it; but with us the constitutional provision is supreme, and it must be the controlling power, though the result should be to overturn decisions." 1 Bish. Crim. L., § 982. We cannot doubt that this provision in the constitution, which deals with the subject and touches the very essence of the matter, was intended to be exclusive and exhaustive—indeed, our only law upon the subject.

If we are right in this, our duty in the premises is simply to give to the provision proper construction, according to its terms. It will be observed that it makes no reference to a first and second jeopardy, but in lieu of the first, under the old doctrine, substituted the words, "after having been once acquitted by a jury," thus, as it seems to us, cutting off all the difficult and intricate questions as to the first jeopardy, what it is, when it arises and where it ends, &c. This provision of the constitution declares, explicitly, where a party shall not be put in jeopardy again for the same offense, and this declaration involves the idea as to when he may be so put in jeopardy. In other words, the provision presents a proper case for the application of the maxim, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," the expression of one thing causes the exclusion of another. That is to say, the provision that "no one shall be put in jeopardy again for the same offense after having been acquitted by a jury," causes the exclusion of those from that immunity who have not been so acquitted. See Pott. Dwar. Stat., p. 321, where it is said, "As exception strengthens the force of law in cases not excepted, so, according to Lord Bacon, enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated." In this view, the Circuit judge was right in overruling the plea of former jeopardy, for, although the defendant had been previously put upon his trial, he had not been acquitted by a jury, and he was not therefore within the express terms of the constitutional provision.

Third. The 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th exceptions and the 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th grounds in arrest of judgment, allege that the count on which the defendant was convicted is fatally defective in many particulars therein indicated.

Section 13 of the declaration of *rights in the constitution declares that "No person shall be held to answer for any crime or offense until the same is fully, fairly, plainly, substantially, and formally described to him." The requirements of an indictment are comprehensively stated in the case of State v. Schroder, 3 Hill 65, where it is said, "The general rule in framing an indictment is, that the offense shall be so described that the defendant may know how to answer it, the court what judgment to pronounce, and that a conviction or acquittal on it may be pleaded in bar to any other indictment for the same offense." Taking this as our guide, was the indictment in this case sufficient?

1. It is first said the count is insufficient, in that it does not allege facts and circumstances which constitute the statutory offense, designated as "breach of trust with fraudulent intent." We are not sure that we clearly understand this objection. The statute does not describe or define the offense. The indictment charges the offense in the very words in which it is stated: "That the said Shirer, &c., did unlawfully and feloniously commit a breach of trust with fraudulent intent in this," &c., then stating the facts. But if it is meant that, in analogy to some of the English acts which create the offense familiarly known as embezzlement, the defendant being a clerk, could not be convicted under our statute for larceny by breach of trust, in taking money which had reached the possession of the proprietor, and had been delivered to him, coupled with the trust of his calling, and was in his drawer under his exclusive control, then we think the objection cannot be maintained.

As we understand it, we have no law creating the special offense known as embezzlement, and the object of our act was simply to enlarge the field of larceny, removing what before might have been a defense for those who received property in trust and afterwards fraudulently appropriated it. See State v. Thurston, 2 McMull. 395. The question under our act is, whether the party charged received the property in trust, which he afterwards violated, without depending at all upon the inquiry as to how the trust was created, or by whom, or what may be the character of the person so intrusted. There may be some danger of confusion, or of confounding the offense with that of *embezzlement, where its application is made to a servant or clerk, whose possession, for certain purposes, is regarded as the possession of the proprietor; but we think the Circuit judge committed no error when he said "that in case a servant or clerk is intrusted with funds of the employer, and the servant or clerk subsequently converts these funds to his own use, in fraud of the rights of the employer, he is guilty of larceny, and that our act and the common law are in exact accord upon that subject." That is to say, as to that class of persons who, although committing larceny by breach of trust, may yet be convicted of simple larceny, by virtue of the legal fiction that their possession is that of the employer. As to this class of persons who can be so convicted there may have been less use for the act, but property may be delivered in trust to those who are neither servants nor clerks, and for this class, especially, the act was necessary.

We do not understand, however, that our act was intended to apply only to cases where the common law could not reach. On the contrary, its terms are general, applying to all. "Any person committing a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent, shall be held guilty of larceny." We do not see why a clerk, who has received into his possession money of his employer in trust, and having it in his exclusive custody, appropriates it fraudulently to his own use, may not be indicted under the act for larceny by breach of trust, although for the same offense he might be indicted for simple larceny at common law. Indeed, since the statute, indictment under it would seem to be the proper proceeding, for, while a conviction for simple larceny possibly might be obtained by the aid of the fiction as to possession, the facts stated would make a case in precise accordance with the terms of the statute. As said by Mr. Bishop, "The statute declares that if one (any person) does so and so, his act shall be deemed simple larceny. Now, suppose the words are broad enough to embrace some things which were simple larceny before, are these things, in reason, less within the statute than those which were not larceny? I can see no reason whatever for the distinction. To make it is to violate analogies running through the entire field of the criminal law and the entire field of the law

2. It is further objected, that the indictment was not sufficient in respect to the allegation of ownership of the property alleged to have been converted. The statutory offense charged in the count on which the defendant was convicted, is nearly akin to that of larceny—indeed, is larceny committed in a particular manner—and we suppose that the ownership of the property must be alleged with the same accuracy and after the same rules as in common law larceny, in which the indictment must aver the ownership of the stolen property as a part of its description and to assist in its identification. We do not understand that there is any set form in which it must be done, but the fact must be stated substantially. The whole scope and tenor of this indictment indicate, unmistakably, who were the owners of the money alleged to have been converted; but in the count for breach of trust, now in contention, it is not stated as clearly in form and manner as it might have been.

The authorities say that "bank bills and promissory notes are not technically goods and chattels," and therefore they should not be laid as "the goods and chattels of," &c. Some other terms must be used to express their ownership. The count referred to does not use the words "goods and chattels," which are usually employed in expressing "ownership." It charges "That the said George S. Shirer, being then and there a clerk in the employment of one Hugh R. Banks and J. Ogier Smith, trading as copartners under the firm name of Banks & Smith, by virtue and reason of such employment, was authorized and empowered to collect, receive and keep certain sums of money then and there due unto and owned by the said Banks & Smith. That the said Shirer did receive and had in his custody and possession the sum of $395, which said sum of money he, the said George S. Shirer, had and held for the use of the said Banks & Smith," &c. Taking the different parts and considering the whole count together, we think the ownership was substantially alleged to be in Banks & Smith, and we cannot therefore say that the judge erred in holding "that the ownership was stated clearly enough for the defendant to understand what he was called upon to answer."

*3. It is still further urged, that the aforesaid count is defective in this, that it lacks particularity of description of the property alleged to have been converted. The words are, "the sum of $395, lawful currency of the United States, of denomination and issue to the jurors aforesaid unknown." The precise point of objection is, that the description is not full enough, in omitting the words "kind of currency" to the jurors unknown. The indictment must state with reasonable certainty what it was that was stolen, in order to individualize the transaction; and this object of the description should indicate how definite it must be. We do not see that the formal insertion of the words, "and kind of currency," would really have contributed anything in the way of individualizing the transaction. It would only have added another particular "to the jurors unknown."

When property is stolen it may be impossible to describe it fully. As was said by Judge Evans, in the case of State v. Smart, 4 Rich. 363 [55 Am. Dec. 683], "The law in relation to larceny requires nothing more than a general description, because often the thing stolen is never reclaimed from the thief, and a minute description would be impossible." This is especially true where the thing stolen is money, as to which few persons take any account, except, perhaps, as to the amount and denomination. Our statute makes it larceny to steal "any bond, warrant, bill or promissory note for the payment or securing the payment of any money, notwithstanding any of the said particulars are termed in law a chose in action." Gen. Stat., § 2486. In the case of State v. Evans, 15 Rich. 33, it was held sufficient to describe the article stolen as "a ten-dollar bill of the currency of the country, commonly called paper money." It seems to us that the phrase, "lawful currency of the United States, of denomination and issue to the jurors unknown," described the subject of the larceny with as much certainty as the nature of the case admitted. 1 Bish. Cr. L. 171.

All the other exceptions relate to questions of fact—mostly alleged insufficiency of proof as to the receipt of the money by the defendant, its being in his exclusive custody when taken, and as to the existence of the trust and its breach. These were all questions of fact decided by a jury after a clear and full charge. They were properly presented to the

Circuit judge, *upon the motion for a new trial, and we have no doubt were there fully argued by the zealous, able and indefatigable counsel for the defendant, but, as often before ruled, this court is not allowed to consider them.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. DAY.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸1008.]

Findings of fact by the Circuit judge on written testimony reported to him, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3955–3960, 3962–3969; Dec. Dig. ⟸1008.]

[2. Principal and Surety ⟸83.]

Where an intestate's wards, who were also her heirs-at-law, asserted a liability against a surety on the guardianship bond and accepted a settlement from such surety—in action afterwards brought by the surety to subject the lands of the deceased guardian to the repayment of the amounts so paid by him, these wards and heirs-at-law are estopped from objecting that the surety was not liable until after an accounting by the guardian.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 129; Dec. Dig. ⟸83.]

[3. Trusts ⟸102.]

Where money of wards is used in paying for land previously acquired by the guardian, there is no resulting trust in favor of the wards.

[4. Trusts ⟸84.]

Nevertheless, wards may claim the ownership of property paid for by their guardian, out of their estate, if they so elect, but having received money in settlement of the debt due by their guardian, they cannot afterwards claim the land also.

Before Wallace, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

Hon. J. B. Kershaw, Circuit Judge, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McGowan, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This action was commenced April 18th, 1881. The Circuit decree, omitting so much as is repeated in the opinion of this court, was as follows:

This cause was heard before me, February Term, 1883, on the pleadings and testimony, without a report by the master on the issues involved, which was not required by the order of reference. * * *

The testimony taken by the master has reference principally to *the terms of the compromise and settlement between the plaintiff and defendant, S. D. Day, and is directly contradictory. The plaintiff, Richardson, testifies that the first agreement for compromise of his claim against estate of Elizabeth Day was such as stated by defendant, Day, but that Day subsequently refused to abide by this settlement, and the second compromise and settlement was entered into, which is set forth in the receipt of date December 7th, 1880. The testimony of Richardson seems to me to be corroborated by the witnesses, Huff and Wright.

After a careful consideration of the whole evidence in the case, I am satisfied that the parties made the agreement and compromise set forth in the receipt and assignment and that plaintiff did pay to the defendant, Day, the sum of $400 specified in the receipt, in satisfaction of his liability as surety for the deceased guardian, Mrs. Day, and received from him the assignment of his interest, and that he paid to Mrs. Mary Sheppard, late Jackson, the sum specified in the receipt given by her on August 24th, 1880.

It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed in his complaint, and to subject the real estate of Elizabeth Day, deceased, to the payment of the liability incurred by him as surety for said Elizabeth Day. It is further ordered and decreed, that the master of this court do proceed to sell the real estate of the said Elizabeth Day, for the repayment of the sums paid by plaintiff, on her said guardian bonds, with interest from the respective days of payment at public outcry, &c. * * * It is further ordered that, if the said S. D. Day, or the heirs of said Elizabeth Day, pay the said claim of the plaintiff, with interest and the costs, the master forbear to make the sale herein above ordered.

Messrs. Perrin & Cothran, for appellant.

There was no liability on the surety until his principal's default had been established. 13 S. C. 580. There is no evidence of default: on the contrary it is shown that the guardian invested the money of her wards in this land. Plaintiff's payments were therefore voluntary, and cannot be recovered—at least in this *form of action. By the assignment, plaintiff took only the ward's rights and interest, which were to call on the sureties for the guardian's default when established. Richardson is estopped from denying Day's title. 13 S. C. 370, 375. This land belonged to the wards. Harp. Eq. 239; 2 McCord Ch. 265; Rich. Eq. Cas. 172; 2 Hill Ch. 426; 1 Strobh. Eq. 112; 3 Id. 134. The wards could elect to take the money or the land. 11 Rich. Eq. 408.

Mr. W. H. Parker, contra.

Respondent's only defense was on questions of fact decided against him by the Circuit judge. He cannot now assert other and affirmative defenses. Code, § 171; Pom. Rem., §§ 617, 690, 701, 706; 4 S. C. 48; 9 Id. 282; 12 Id. 8; 15 Id. 10; 16 Id. 255; Greenl. Evid., Part IV., § 157. The answer admits title to have been in Mrs. Day; the subsequent application of the ward's money to this land did not create a resulting trust. 19 S. C. 126. But if purchased with their money it only gave the wards a lien on the land, if they so elected. Perry Trusts, §§ 128, 458; 1 Rich. Eq. 448. Having elected to take money, they cannot now claim the land. Big. Estop. 503. There has been accord and satisfaction. 13 S. C. 370. Also an assignment. The possession of S. D. Day was the possession of all the heirs of Mrs. Day until actual ouster.

February 23d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice KERSHAW. This action was brought by the plaintiff to subject a tract of land, in the possession of the defendants, to the payment of an alleged debt of their ancestress, Elizabeth Day, deceased. The demand was stated in the complaint to have arisen out of the following facts, in effect: That Elizabeth Day had been the guardian of Mary Jackson, her granddaughter, and S. D. Day, her son, and received their estates; that T. S. Powers, John Day and plaintiff were sureties on the guardianship bond, of whom plaintiff alone survived; that she made no settlement with her wards, and died on or about *November 1st, 1874; that in 1879, Mary Sheppard, nee Jackson, one of said wards, came of age and instituted suit against the plaintiff, as surviving obligor on the guardianship bond, to recover the balance of her estate in the hands of her late guardian; that plaintiff effected a settlement with her for the sum of $260, which was paid August 24th, 1880, and a receipt given in full satisfaction of her said claim by the said Mary Sheppard; that S. D. Day was also about to commence suit against the plaintiff for the recovery of the balance due him by his late guardian, when, on December 7th, 1880, a compromise was made between him and the plaintiff for the sum of $400, which was also paid, and a receipt in writing given by S. D. Day to the plaintiff acknowledging full satisfaction of plaintiff's liability on the guardianship bond, together with an assignment by S. D. Day of all his interest in the bond to the plaintiff. The complaint demanded judgment for the amount so paid by plaintiff, with interest, and that the land described be subjected to the payment of the same.

B. F. Day and Rebecca Moore answered the complaint, denying that they were in possession of the land, and demanded, for that reason, that the action be dismissed as against them. Mary Sheppard did not answer, and S. D. Day alone resisted the demands of plaintiff. There was no personal property left by Elizabeth Day, and there has been no administration on her estate.

The answer of S. D. Day raised no issues upon any of the matters alleged in the complaint, except that he denied information as to the alleged payment to Mary Sheppard, and set up a defense in regard to the effect of the compromise made between him and the plaintiff, denying the allegations of the complaint in relation thereto. His answer states that the compromise of the indebtedness of the plaintiff was as follows: "The plaintiff was liable as surety on the bond of Mrs. E. Day, as guardian of the defendant, on which there was due the sum of $741.63, with interest from January 1st, 1872. This indebtedness the defendant agreed to compromise for the sum of $400, to be made up to him as follows: The plaintiff was to pay the said defendant $50 in cash, and the balance, $350, was the sum agreed upon *between the plaintiff and defendant as the value of the plaintiff's claims on said tract of land, in consideration of which the plaintiff agreed to release to the defendant the said tract of land from all the claims he had or might have by reason of his payment or surety on the guardianship bond of Mrs. E. Day. In consequence of said compromise, the said defendant went into possession of the said tract of land, and still claims the possession thereof; and the defendant further alleges, that he has never received from the plaintiff but $40 in money on said compromise."

Upon these issues the cause was heard and determined by the Circuit Court in favor of the plaintiff, who was adjudged entitled to the relief prayed, and the land was ordered to be sold for the payment of his demands. The defendants appealed from this decision, upon the grounds stated in the brief, as follows: "1. Because his Honor erred in ordering the tract of land, containing forty acres, in the possession of S. D. Day, to be sold to refund the amount paid by plaintiff on his liability on the bonds of Mrs. Day, as guardian of S. D. Day and Mary Sheppard. 2. Because his Honor erred in not holding that the said tract of land was part of the estates of the said wards, and not subject to sale for Mrs. Day's debts. 3. Because his Honor should have dismissed the complaint, as the defendants were not in the possession of any descended estate from Mrs. Day."

The Circuit Court has determined the questions of fact raised by the pleadings in favor of the plaintiff. The decision is well sustained by the evidence, and will not be disturbed by this court. From the facts so determined, it follows that the plaintiff has a valid demand against the estate of Elizabeth Day for the sums of money paid him as surety in settlement of her liabilities as guardian.

It is claimed by appellants that no valid claim was established by the plaintiff, for the reason that there must have been an accounting first had before the payment by the surety of the alleged liability of the guardian could operate to charge the latter. There is no doubt that such is the general rule, and if the defendants here were only heirs-at-law, there might have been, under other circumstances, some ground for its application. But the liability of Elizabeth

Day, discharged by the plaintiff, *was to Mary Sheppard and S. D. Day, who united in themselves the character of both heirs-at-law and creditors of the estate. They, themselves, asserted against the plaintiff the very liability which they now demand should be established by an accounting, and accepted a settlement with the plaintiff upon that basis. They are estopped to deny the liability, and the other defendants have admitted it by their failure to deny the allegation of the complaint in regard thereto.

As for the liability of the land. Appellants insist that Elizabeth Day, their guardian, invested the funds of her wards in the purchase of the lands in question, taking titles of the same in her own name, and that a trust resulted to them, in consequence, by virtue of which they claim the land, not as heirs-at-law, but in their own right under this trust. This ground was not taken in the Circuit Court, and there is no foundation for it in the pleadings, and objection is made by the counsel for the respondents, that the questions so raised cannot now be considered. The authorities cited in support of the objection would seem to support it, but we prefer to dispose of the subject upon its merits. The evidence upon this point, as contained in the "Case," is as follows: "That Elizabeth Day executed her note on December 4th, 1860, to Walter S. Richardson, agent for James Richardson, for the sum of $1,278.-75, for the purchase-money of the land in question, with T. S. Powers and John Day as sureties; that she took title to herself and lived on the land till her death in 1874; that she was appointed guardian of her wards, and gave bond February 28th, 1861; that among other things, W. S. Richardson testified that he knew that Mrs. Day had invested in the land, said forty-four acres, her wards' money; that S. D. Day and Mary Jackson lived with their mother and grandmother, on the land, till her death; that Mary Jackson, now Sheppard, continued to do so till her marriage in 1880, when she left, and that S. D. Day has, since the death of his mother, continued to live on the land, and is now in possession of it."

It will be seen that the purchase of the land was made by Mrs. Day, and the title vested in her before she became the guardian of defendants. This, therefore, is not a case of a trust *resulting from the purchase of the land, and the taking of title in her own name, by one person, and the payment of the purchase-money by another. In cases of that kind, the payment or advance of the money before, or at the time of the purchase, is indispensable to the creation of the trust. "The resulting trust, not within the statute of frauds, and which may be shown without writing, is when the purchase is made with the proper money of the cestui que trust and the deed not taken in his name. The trust results from the original transaction, at the time it takes place, and at no other time, and it is founded on the actual payment of the money, and on no other grounds. It cannot be mingled with any subsequent dealings whatever." Botsford v. Burr, 2 Johns. Ch. 414; Rogers v. Murray, 3 Paige 390; Ex parte Trenholm, 19 S. C. 126.

Nevertheless, it appears that this land was paid for, in part at least, with money of the wards of Mrs. Day. Under such circumstances the cestui que trust is entitled to the money or the land, at his option. Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. 517; Lewis v. Madocks, 17 Id. 58. Says Mr. Story: "In cases of this sort the cestui que trust is not at all bound by the act of the other party. He has, therefore, an option to insist upon taking the property, or he may disclaim any title thereto, and proceed upon any other remedies to which he is entitled, either in rem, or in personam. The substituted land is only liable to his option. But he cannot insist upon opposite and repugnant rights." 2 Eq. Jur. 1262.

From the facts here, it appears that the defendants, Mary Sheppard and S. D. Day, elected to proceed against the surety on the guardian's bond, and have received from that source satisfaction of their claims. It is manifest that this exercise of their right of choice operates to confirm the title of Mrs. Day, and to divest it of the trust which they might otherwise have enforced against the land. Their possession, therefore, is as heirs-at-law and not under the alleged trust. This being the nature of their possession, they hold as tenants in common with their coheirs, and the plea of B. F. Day and Rebecca Moore, denying that they are in possession, is negatived, for the possession of one tenant in common is the possession of all.

Jefcoat v. Knotts, *13 Rich. 60. There would have been no propriety, therefore, in dismissing the complaint as to them, as claimed by the third ground of appeal.

We perceive, therefore, no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court. It having been established that the plaintiff had a valid demand against the estate of Mrs. Day for money paid by him as surety on the guardianship bond in discharge of her liability as guardian; and it also having been established that the land in question was vested in her, and descended to the defendants as heirs-at-law, the judgment of the Circuit Court could not have been otherwise.

It is ordered and adjudged that the appeal be dismissed; that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the case remanded to that court in order that the judgment of the same may be carried into effect.

STATE v. HATHCOCK.

[Highways ⊂⊃151.]

Laborers employed in working upon the road-bed of a railroad company, which was engaged in carrying freight, passengers and mail, were summoned to work upon the public highways, but failed to appear. Upon being prosecuted for such failure, they interposed their daily and constant employment at that time as a justifiable excuse, which defense was overruled by trial justice and Circuit judge. Held, that there being no definition of what was a justifiable excuse in such cases, this court could not declare the ruling below to be error of law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Carroll, 30 S. C. 89, 8 S. E. 433, 14 Am. St. Rep. 883; Town Council of Chesterfield v. Ratliff, 52 S. C. 566, 30 S. E. 593, 41 L. R. A. 503.

For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 410; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃151.]

Before Fraser, J., Fairfield, September, 1883.

These were prosecutions against Oliver Hathcock, Walter Kelly, George McConnell, James McConnell and Rhett Jordan—five cases heard together, the same point being involved in all. In dismissing the appeal to the Circuit Court, the presiding judge said:

The defendants were convicted and sentenced to pay each a fine of $5 or be imprisoned ten days in the county jail. The defendants appeal on the grounds—1. That their employment, as *above stated, in the service of the railroad company is a "justifiable excuse." 2. That being so employed, they are not liable to road duty.

These defendants are not the employés of the government, either State or Federal. They have no claim on the government, and are in no way responsible to it. They are employed, and I take it, paid, and can be dismissed by the railroad company at its pleasure. Except that they are paid for the time they work and not by the job there is no difference between them and those who get out cross-ties, bridge and trestle timber, and fire-wood. I see nothing in the nature of their connection with the railroad company which exempts them from road duty. They are not exempt by statute as a class.

What is a justifiable excuse is not defined in the acts. I think, however, that it must be something in the nature of an emergency, which cannot, with reasonable care, be provided against as sickness or death in one's family or even of a near neighbor or friend, where the common interests of humanity demand that business shall be laid aside for the care of the sick and dying. Some heavy loss from fire or flood might be sufficient to excuse the sufferer during the temporary pressure on him. I take it that any sudden and unexpected demand on the railroad company to repair damages from a freshet or some accident on the railroad, might excuse the railroad hands. There is nothing of the sort in this case—nothing which could not have been provided for. The railroad company only employed hands enough to do their work, while it would have been easy to have employed sufficient force to do its work, making proper allowance for that which the State demands. I do not think that any class of persons not named as exempt in the act can plead their employment or occupation as ipso facto a valid or justifiable excuse for failure to do road duty.

The judgment of the trial justice in these cases is therefore confirmed.

The defendants' exception to this judgment was as follows:

For that his Honor did not hold that while a track-hand was working upon the track of a railroad, then in operation, at a *time when his so working was necessary for the safe transportation of merchandise, passengers and the United States mail, his being so employed constituted a "justifiable excuse" for not working upon the dirt highways of the State at that time.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

This is a criminal action; hence, a different construction as to what will be a justifiable excuse must obtain from what would be construed such excuse in a civil action for a penalty. Railroads are public highways. Gen. Stat., § 1550; Cheves 96; 16 Wall. 663, 685. The defendants work on these public highways every week-day in the year, and were so working on the day they failed to appear, doing work required by the charter. Railroads in operation in the United States are postroads. U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3964. Carrying the mails is a great public duty; and a right granted by charter. 11 Stat. 536, § 10. Taking these hands away would be impeding the operation of a constitutional power. 4 Wheat. 317; 2 Black 631. But these defendants cannot be convicted if they have a justifiable excuse. Gen. Stat., § 1085. They were keeping this great public highway and the bridges, &c., in safe condition, and employed in a public duty as to State and United States. Governors, judges, sheriffs &c., are not exempt under the letter of the statute, but if then engaged in public duties, they would have a justifiable excuse. Other hands employed instead of these would be likewise summoned. See 1 Bailey 170. In the case from Cheves 95, the railroad was not completed, nor in operation; they were not railroad hands, nor then engaged in work at the time necessary for safe transportation. Exemption is not claimed for these defendants; but that their employment on the same day was a justifiable excuse sufficient to prevent a conviction in a criminal case. Under act of 1825, white persons could not be imprisoned. The case in Cheves 210, would hardly be so ruled now. See, also, 2 McCord 401; 1 Bailey, 168, 169, 170.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendants were employed by the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company to work on the road-bed of said railroad, and it is said "that they were engaged on said work every day in the year, Sundays excepted, constantly employed in keeping said road-bed in condition, and that no more hands were employed than necessary for this purpose." While thus employed, they were warned to work on a public highway near by. This notice they disregarded, and failed to appear. Being indicted before a trial justice, they interposed the defense of "justifiable excuse," founded upon the facts above stated.

The act under which the defendants were indicted is found in general statutes, section 1085. It provides, "that if any person of legal age shall neglect to appear, or shall refuse to work upon the highways or roads (having no justifiable excuse), according to the directions of the overseer, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c. The defense thus interposed was overruled by the trial justice, and also by the Circuit judge upon appeal to the Circuit Court. The appeal here raises the question again, Should the facts, as stated, have been held to constitute a justifiable excuse?

The act, as it will be seen, simply provides that a justifiable excuse in such cases will prevent conviction, but it nowhere defines or declares what is meant by the term "justifiable excuse," nor have we ever been able to find any case where a principle has been established by which the meaning of these terms can be determined as matter of law. [State ex rel. Luten v. Commissioners of Roads for St. George's Parish] Cheves 95; [State ex rel. Campbell v. Commissioners of Roads for Laurens District] Id. 210. The cases relied on by the respondent, found in Cheves' reports, do not touch this question. The first case decides that railroad hands are not exempt from highway duty, and the second, that postmasters are not exempt. The question here, however, is not whether the defendants were exempt, but whether, being otherwise liable to do road duty, they could be excused in this instance on the ground that their employment as railroad hands constituted a justifiable excuse.

It is the province of this court under the constitution, to cor*rect errors of law in cases at law brought before it by appeal. The difficulty in this case is, that we find no law, either statutory or otherwise, declaring what facts will constitute a justifiable excuse in cases like these, and, consequently, we have no rule by which to test the facts relied on by the appellants, and to determine whether or not, as matter of law, they make out a justifiable excuse. In the absence of such rule, whatever might be our individual opinions as to the sufficiency of the excuse, as a matter of justice or expediency, yet we cannot say that the court erred as matter of law in disregarding it. The legislature, in failing to define, either generally or specifically, what facts in law would amount to a justifiable excuse, seems to have left this matter to the judgment and discretion of the tribunal before which the parties might be brought, and such being the fact, it does not appear that any question of law can be involved, except that the accused has the right to interpose such a defense. If the court below had held that the defendants had no right to rely upon a "justifiable excuse" as a defense, this would have been in direct conflict with the act, and would have been error of law, subject to correction by this court; but, holding that a certain state of facts did not constitute this excuse, we fail to see what principle of law he disregarded.

It is urged by the appellants' counsel, that this is a criminal case, and hence, "a different construction as to what will be a justifiable excuse must obtain from what would be construed such excuse in a civil action for a penalty." This may be so, and yet the difficulty still remains. We are considering the question, whether the Circuit judge committed error of law in his ruling, and we cannot say that such error exists until we find some law defining the term "justifiable excuse," and none has been referred to as applicable either to a civil or criminal case.

It is said that railroads are public highways; that they carry the mails, which is a great public duty, and that hands employed by them to keep the road-bed in repair, for the safe transportation of the mails and the goods and merchandise of the people, are employed in a great public work; that they stand like the governor, the judges and other

State officers while in the dis*charge of their official duties, and therefore should not be disturbed. We do not think that defendants occupy the position claimed for them. The railroads may in some sense be highways, but hands employed in keeping these roads in repair, by contract and under wages, are not giving their labor to the public under the road law, as other citizens are required to do. Neither are they public officials. On the contrary, they are ordinary employés engaged in work of an important character, it is true, but a work, so far as they are concerned, entirely of a private nature and for their own individual profit, not differing from any ordinary employment—on the farm or workshop. But, be that as it may, the question again recurs, Where is the law which holds that even a public officer could interpose his public duties as a justifiable excuse, under this act, if he is otherwise liable? No doubt, in the case of a public officer discharging important public duties, such a defense would avail, but if it was disregarded, in reference to one not exempted by the road law when properly construed, could this court hold that it was legal error? We think not, except by judicial legislation. See Harrington's Case, 2 McCord 401; Martindale's Case, 1 Bailey 168, 170.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, November, 1882.

This was an action by Lorick & Lowrance against L. C. McCreery, Sarah E. Blackwell and others, for partition. The opinion states the case. The exceptions raised the points stated in the opinion to have been interposed by defendants in their joint answer, as a defense.

Messrs. Jones & Mower, for appellants.
Messrs. Moorman & Schumpert, contra.

February 29th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This appeal involves the question whether a paper, of which the following is a copy:

"Columbia, S. C., March 27th, 1874.

"For value received I hereby assign, set over and deliver to Sallie E. Blackwell, all my right, title and interest, as legatee of the estate of John Glymph.

"Witness my hand and seal.

(Signed,) "Laura E. Blackwell. [L. S.]

"Thomas Rawls,

"William J. Van Ingen,"

can operate as a deed conveying real estate, as against a purchaser of the said Laura E. Blackwell's interest therein at sheriff's sale by execution issued on judgment against her, obtained after the execution of said paper.

The Circuit judge held, that *this paper was a good conveyance, and dismissed plaintiff's complaint, who brought the action below for the land, relying upon his purchase at the sheriff's sale aforesaid, and this appeal now raises the question stated above.

The facts of the case, upon which this question is raised, are as follows: John Glymph, late of Newberry county, died intestate, seized and possessed of a tract of land situate in Newberry county, containing some 200 acres. He left surviving him the defendants, his heirs-at-law. His personal estate was administered upon by the two defendants, David and Alfred, his sons. On March 27th, 1874, the paper above referred to was executed by the defendant, Laura E. A short time after this, the plaintiffs brought action against the said Laura, in Richland county, and recovered a judgment for $209.23, besides costs, which was duly entered and a transcript thereof filed in the clerk's office for Newberry county, in June, 1874. Execution on this judgment was issued from clerk's office in Richland, and delivered to the sheriff of Newberry, returnable within sixty days. This execution was entered in sheriff's office June 29th, 1874, and levied in July, 1874. The sheriff, however, failing to sell, on account of notice of adverse claims, a rule was issued against him in July, 1877, which, being heard by Judge Kershaw, an order thereon was issued directing the sale within sixty days, or that the rule be made absolute. Accordingly, the sale was made on September 3d, 1877, notice of the claim of Sarah E. Blackwell being given at said sale. The interest of Laura was bought by the plaintiffs at $60. The purchase-money was not paid in cash, as the sale was made under plaintiffs' execution.

In October, 1877, the action below was commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendants, as heirs-at-law of John Glymph, for partition. This action was commenced before the sheriff executed titles to plaintiffs, the complaint being heard on October 3d, and the deed of the sheriff executed on the 17th of the same month. The defendants answered, interposing as a defense: 1. The invalidity of the sale: (a) Because no transcript of the judgment against Laura had been filed in the office of the clerk of Newberry; (b) Because the execution was returnable in sixty days, and hence was without legal force when the sale was made. *2. Because at the time appellants commenced their action, they had not paid the purchase-money, nor had they received titles. And, 3. Because Laura E. had transferred her interest in said land by the written assignment set forth above, before the sale. The case was referred to the master, who reported the facts as above stated, holding that the sale, notwithstanding the irregularities as to the execution complained of, was valid and legal, and, further, as matter of law, that the assignment referred to, transferred all interest of Laura E. to her sister, Sarah, which being done before plaintiffs' judgment, that plaintiffs took nothing by his purchase. He therefore recommended that the complaint be dismissed.

No exception was taken to this report by the defendants. Plaintiffs, however, excepted to so much as held that the assignment operated to transfer the interest of Laura E. to her sister, Sarah E. His Honor Judge Wallace overruled plaintiffs' exceptions and dismissed the complaint.

In the argument on appeal, both parties have discussed the alleged irregularity of the sale by the sheriff, notwithstanding the fact that no questions have been raised thereto by exceptions appearing in the "Case." This is irregular, and should not be encouraged, but in this case it may be proper that the points involved therein should be disposed of, especially as the defendants, having been successful on the main question, were not in condition to appeal on this ground; and further, as both appellant and respondent seem to have regarded this question as involved in the appeal.

It appears, as matter of fact, that a transcript of the plaintiffs' judgment was properly filed in the office of the clerk of Newberry county. This is so reported by the master. Therefore, this objection must be overruled.

There is nothing in the objection that the execution was issued by the clerk of Richland county, or that it was made returnable within sixty days. The fact is, it was levied within the sixty days, and the law fixed the time for its return. Code, § 310.

Nor does the fact that plaintiff had not paid the purchase-money, or that the deed of the sheriff had not been executed before action commenced, fatally affect the proceedings. The *ruling of the Circuit judge, as to these questions, is fully sustained by the cases of Cobb v. Pressly, 2 McMull. 416, and Small v. Small, 16 S. C. 70. In the latter case, this court held, that in an action for partition, very similar to this, the equitable title of the plaintiff was sufficient, equity regarding that as done which ought to have been done.

So that, at last, this appeal must turn upon the construction which shall be given to the assignment. This paper is certainly a very informal and perfunctory paper. It is true, that it was executed under seal and in the presence of two witnesses; but it has not the other requisites of a conveyance of real estate. No land is described, nor even is its location, if any, State or county, mentioned, except inferentially. There is no habendum, tenendum or warranty clause. Yet, notwithstanding this, inasmuch as the intention of parties should prevail, it is proper to examine this paper, and to enforce it according to the intent legally reached. No doubt it is a valid paper as a bargain and sale as to any realty which it may cover, although informal. Sanders v. Hartzog, 6 S. C. 483; Sally v. Gunter, 13 Rich. 72; Chancellor v. Windham, 1 Rich. 161, and note [42 Am. Dec. 411]; Craig v. Pinson, Cheves 273.

But the question is, Did it cover the realty? It is reasonably certain that Laura Blackwell intended to convey something to her sister. The terms used are, "all my right, title and interest as legatee in the estate of John Glymph." At the time, Laura had an interest in the estate of John Glymph, both personal and real—in the first as a distributee, and in the latter as an heir-at-law; but she had no interest therein as a legatee. The term "legatee," as is well understood, technically describes the beneficiary of personalty under a will, and if this term is strictly construed here, inasmuch as Laura had no such interest, nothing would be conveyed. This would be manifestly against the true intent and meaning of the parties, and we must conclude that this term was not used in its strict technical sense, and we should attach to it some other meaning, if any, if this can be done without violating the rules of construction.

Now, some of the most important principles which govern in the construction of deeds, are as follows: the whole deed should *be considered together and effect be given to every part, if all can stand consistently with law; that an exposition favorable to the intention should be made, if not contrary to law; that the intentions should be regarded as looking rather to the effect to be produced than the mode of producing it; that too minute a stress should not be laid on particular words, if the intention be clear, and that, if the deed cannot operate in the manner contemplated by the parties, it should be construed in such manner as to operate, if possible, in some other way. Chancellor v. Windham, 1 Rich. 167 [42 Am. Dec. 411].

As we have said, when this paper is considered as a whole, we cannot doubt that the maker intended to convey some interest. This being the intention, the question is, What was this interest? The terms are, "all my right, title and interest" (as legatee) in the estate of John Glymph. If the term "legatee" was not incorporated, there would be no difficulty, because then the term "all," qualifying right, title and interest in the estate of John Glymph, her whole interest in said estate would pass. Shall the incorporation of the term "legatee," with its technical meaning attached, destroy the paper, and thus entirely defeat it? We think not. This would be laying too great stress upon a particular word to the overthrow of the manifest intent of the paper, considered as a whole, and is not demanded by the rules of construction. We must suppose that the term "legatee" was used in the sense of a party entitled to an interest in the estate, without regard to the manner in which this interest had vested. This supposition is necessary to sustain the paper as to any of its parts, or in any form, and it accords with the manifest intent arising from the paper in its entirety.

We think, therefore, that such interest of Laura in the estate of her father, real and personal, as the paper legally construed could convey, passed to her sister by its execution and delivery. As to the objection that there is no description of the land, it may be said, that is certain which may be made certain, and there is enough in the paper to show what land was intended.

But this does not dispose of the case, because the further question now arises, What estate in the land in question was conveyed to Sarah? That is a matter which must be determined by the terms of the conveyance.

The conveyance is a deed of bargain *and sale, and there are no words of limitation. The deed is to Sarah E. Blackwell, without the word "heirs," or any equivalent word. In such case, nothing but a life-estate is conveyed, the fee remaining in the grantor. This was subject to levy and sale under the execution of the plaintiffs, and passed to the plaintiffs by their purchase at said sale, and entitled them to institute the action below for partition, if said partition can be made consistently with the interests of all parties and without detriment to the interests and claims of the life-tenant. We think it was error, therefore, to dismiss the complaint.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below, dismissing the complaint, be reversed, and that the case be remanded for adjudication in accordance with the principles hereinabove announced.

McCONNELL v. KITCHENS.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Contracts ⇐339; Trial ⇐25.]

Where a defendant in his answer asserts that there are stipulations in the contract other than those stated in the complaint, he does not admit the plaintiff's cause of action as stated in the complaint, and, therefore, is not entitled to open and reply.

Under the acts of 1872 (15 Stat. 33) and 1879 (17 Stat. 72), the sale of commercial fertilizers is forbidden unless the regulations prescribed by those acts were complied with—those requirements not being solely for revenue, but to protect the public from imposition and fraud, and their violation being declared a misdemeanor and punishable by recurring penalties.

*Before Kershaw, J., Chester, March, 1883.

Action by W. H. McConnell against Addison F. Kitchens. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Jno. M. McNeel and G. G. Dent, for appellant.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

The contract was not illegal and void. 17 Stat. 75. The chemical composition is not to be stated unless certain specified ingredients are asserted to be present. The tax was for purposes of revenue, and, therefore, its nonpayment would not vitiate the contract. 14 Mees. & W. 452, 463; 11 East 180. As matter of fact it was paid, and receipt was exhibited at the trial. A sale without compliance with the requirements, is nowhere prohibited in the statute, and, therefore, the contract was not void. 26 Am. Rep. 149; 25 Id. 677. There are varying degrees of penalties for the several omissions; if the contract is void, there would be same for all. Absence of a tag would be as severely punished as a false analysis. The act of 1880 (17 Stat. 414), passed after these sales, provides for a forfeiture, thus showing that none previously existed. See 12 How. 85; 75 Va. 239 (40 Am. Rep. 720); 106 Mass. 435 (8 Am. Rep. 346).

March 1st, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action on a contract in writing, under seal, dated March 4th, 1880, by which the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff $310.50 on or before November 1st, 1880. The consideration expressed in the writing was eleven and a half tons of Lee's P. A. lime (meaning Lee's prepared agricultural lime). The defendant, in his answer, alleged that the contract upon which the action was founded was different in form, and contained other material stipulations from that described in the complaint, and set up two distinct affirmative defenses—one of failure of consideration, and the other that the contract was illegal, being made in violation of certain statutes hereinafter quoted.

*The defendant claimed the right to open and reply, both in evidence and argument, which was refused and exception duly taken. Testimony was offered to sustain both of the defenses set up in the answer. To so much of the charge as relates to the defense of failure of consideration, no exception was taken. "On the second point made by the defendant, viz., the plea of illegality of the consideration and of the contract, the following facts were proven: First. That the plaintiff sold to the defendant a commercial fertilizer, known as Lee's prepared agricultural lime, on March 4th, A. D. 1880; that the amount sold and delivered to the defendant was eleven and one-half tons, put up in bags, each one of which weighed one hundred and twenty-five pounds; that the bags had on them the name, location and trademark of the manufacturer, but did not have the chemical composition of the contents of the bags, or the date of its analysis, or that the privilege tax had been paid, or any tags at all. The plaintiff admitted the fertilizer was sold and delivered to the defendant in this condition, but proved that he had never asserted or claimed that this lime had any of the chemical ingredients named and specified in section 18 of the act of assembly creating the department of agriculture, approved December 23d, 1879, and was ready and offered to prove a receipt showing that the privilege tax had been paid to the department of agriculture, which was ruled out by the judge, said receipt being without date, and did not show when the privilege tax was paid. The further fact was shown that the note sued on for $310.50 was given by the defendant to the plaintiff on March 4th, A. D. 1880, for the fertilizer sold and delivered as described aforesaid."

The Circuit judge held that the contract was not illegal and could be enforced, to which exception was duly taken. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $250, and judgment being entered thereon, the defendant appeals upon two grounds, substantially as follows: 1. That the Circuit judge erred in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to open and reply. 2. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the contract sued upon was not illegal, and could be enforced by an action at law.

The question as to which party is entitled to open and reply *depends upon an inspection of the pleadings only, and must be determined without any reference to the testimony which may be subsequently offered. The rule seems to be that when the defendant admits upon the record the plaintiff's cause of action, as stated in the complaint, and relies solely upon an affirmative defense based upon new matter stated in the answer, he is then entitled to open and reply, as the plaintiff in such a case would have nothing whatever to prove, and the defendant would assume the burden of proving his affirmative defense, and thus in reality become the actor. But unless this is done, the plaintiff is bound to establish his cause of action, and, therefore, entitled to open and reply. Brown v. Kirkpatrick, 5 S. C. 267; Burckhalter v. Coward, 16 S. C. 435; Kennedy v. Moore, 17 S. C. 464; Boyce v. Lake, 17 Id. 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618]. In this case the plaintiff, in his complaint, stated as his cause of action a certain contract in writing containing certain terms and stipulations, while the defendant, in his answer, in effect denied that the contract was properly described in the complaint, and, on the contrary, alleged that the contract really contained other terms and stipulations, as appeared by a copy thereof set out in the answer. It cannot, therefore, be said that the defendant admitted the plaintiff's cause of action, as stated in the complaint, and hence, under the rule above stated, he was not entitled to open and reply.

For a proper understanding of the question raised by the second ground of appeal, it will be necessary to consider the terms of the statutes which it is alleged were violated in the contract sued upon. The first statute upon the subject is the act of February 2d, 1872, (15 Stat. 33,) the language of which is as follows: "All commercial fertilizers manufactured, sold or kept for sale in the State of South Carolina, shall have affixed to every bag, barrel or parcel thereof a written or printed label, which shall specify the names of the manufacturer and seller, their respective places of business, and the constituent parts thereof. Section 2. Whoever manufactures, sells or keeps for sale any commercial fertilizer or fertilizers, not labeled in accordance with the provisions of the preceding section, * * * shall be punished by a fine of twenty dollars for the first offense, and *a fine of forty dollars for the second and every subsequent offense," &c.

The next legislation upon the subject will be found in sections 18 and 19 of "An act to create a department of agriculture, defining its purposes and duties, and charging it with inspection of phosphates and regulation of sales of commercial fertilizers," approved December 23d, 1879, (17 Stat. 72.) The language used in those sections is as follows: "Section 18. That all persons or companies engaged in the manufacture or sale of fertilizers or commercial manures shall pay to the commissioner of agriculture twenty-five cents per ton for every ton of such fertilizer or commercial manure sold or offered for sale in this State, the said amount to be paid into the State treasury for the exclusive use and benefit of the department of agriculture. Any person, or officer or agent of any corporation, neglecting to pay the sum provided in this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined in the discretion of the court, which fine shall be paid into the State treasury for the exclusive use and benefit of the department of agriculture. Section 19. That every bag, barrel or other package of such fertilizers or commercial manure, as above designated, offered for sale, or delivered after sale in this State, shall have thereon a plainly printed label or stamp which shall truly set forth the name, location and trade-mark of the manufacturer, also the chemical composition of the contents of such package and the real percentage of any of the following ingredients, asserted to be present, to wit: soluble and precipitated phosphoric acid, soluble potassa, ammonia or its equivalent in nitrogen, together with the date of its analysis, and that the privilege tax, provided for in section 18, has been paid; and any such fertilizer as shall be ascertained by analysis not to contain the ingredients and percentage set forth, as above provided, shall be liable to seizure and condemnation, and when condemned shall be sold by the board of agriculture for the exclusive use and benefit of the department of agriculture. Any merchant, trader, manufacturer, agent or person who shall sell or offer for sale, or deliver after sale, or receive any commercial fertilizer without having such labels and stamps, as hereinbefore provided, attached *thereto, shall be liable to a fine of ten dollars for each separate bag, or barrel, or package sold or offered for sale, to be sued for before any trial justice, and to be collected by due process of law. The amount so recovered, after paying costs, shall be equally divided between the party or parties suing and the department."

It will thus be seen that by the act of 1872, which had not been repealed at the time the cause of action in this case arose, except in so far as any of its provisions conflicted with the subsequent act of 1879 (and the only conflict was as to the amount of the penalty and the mode of its enforcement), it was made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, for any person to sell or keep for sale any commercial fertilizer which did not have a label affixed to each bag or other package, specifying three things: (1) The names of the manufacturer and seller; (2) their respective places of business; (3) the constituent elements of such fertilizer. By the subsequent act of 1879, every person engaged in the manufacture or sale of commercial fertilizers was required: First. To pay to the commissioner of agriculture twenty-five cents per ton for every ton sold or offered for sale in this State, under a penalty of being deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subjected to a fine at the discretion of the court. Second. That every bag or other package of such fertilizer offered for sale or delivered after sale in this State, should have attached thereto a label setting forth five things: (1) The name, location and trade-mark of the manufacturer; (2) the chemical composition of the contents of such package; (3) the real percentage of certain specified ingredients, if such ingredients are asserted to be present as part of the chemical contents of such package; (4) the date of the analysis; (5) that the privilege tax of twenty-five cents per ton, above provided for, has been paid. Third. That any person who shall sell or offer for sale, or deliver after sale or receive any commercial fertilizer without having such a label attached thereto, shall be liable to a fine of ten dollars for each separate bag or other package sold or offered for sale, to be sued for and recovered before any trial justice.

Now, while it is true that the legislature has not, in so many words, declared that it shall not be lawful to sell any commercial *fertilizer in this State, unless the regulations above prescribed have been complied with, or that a contract for the sale of such fertilizer, without complying with such regulations, shall be illegal and void, yet it seems to us manifest that the real object of the legislation set out above was to prohibit the sale of commercial fertilizers unless the prescribed regulations are complied with, in order to protect the farming interest from deceit or imposition in the sale of an article which has come to be so extensively, if not universally, used by the farmers of the country, as commercial fertilizers.

In 2 Benj. Sales, § 825, the writer, after commenting at length upon the cases, deduces the following rules therefrom: "First. That where a contract is prohibited by statute it is immaterial to inquire whether the statute was passed for revenue purposes only or for any other object. It is enough that parliament has prohibited it, and it is therefore void. Secondly. That where the question is whether a contract has been prohibited by statute, it is material in construing the statute to ascertain whether the legislature had in view solely the security and collection of the revenue, or had in view, in whole or in part, the protection of the public from fraud in contracts or the promotion of some object of public policy. In the former case the inference is that the statute was not intended to prohibit contracts; in the latter that it was. Thirdly. That in seeking for the meaning of the law-giver, it is material also to inquire whether the penalty is imposed once for all on the offense of failing to comply with the requirements of the statute, or whether it is a recurring penalty, repeated as often as the offending party may have dealing. In the latter case the statute is intended to prevent the dealing, to prohibit the contract, and the contract is therefore void; but in the former case such is not the intention, and the contract will be enforced."

Testing the legislation in question by these rules, it is obvious that, though the sale of commercial fertilizers without a compliance with the prescribed regulations is not, in express terms, forbidden, the legislature did not have in view "solely the security and collection of the revenue," but, on the contrary, the purpose was to protect the public from fraud in such sales, and therefore *the inference is that the legislation was intended to prohibit sales of commercial fertilizers except where the prescribed regulations were complied with. It is quite clear that the act of 1872 contains nothing whatever to indicate a purpose to secure the collection of revenue, as there is not a word in it which looks to the imposition or collection of any tax whatever.

It is equally clear to our minds that the subsequent act of 1879 discloses no such purpose. So far from there being anything in this act which indicates that the sole purpose of the legislature was to secure the collection of revenue, the only thing which even looks that way is the provision in section 18, requiring the payment of twenty-five cents per ton for every ton of commercial fertilizers sold or offered for sale in this State, which, in section 19, is denominated a "privilege tax." But this was manifestly designed, not as a source of revenue to the State, but simply as a fund to meet the expenses incurred in enforcing the other regulations of the act, for though this tax, if it may be so called, was required to be paid into the State treasury, it was not put there like the other taxes of the State, but was placed there expressly "for the exclusive use and benefit of the department of agriculture," which by this act was specially charged with the enforcement of the regulations for the sale of commercial fertilizers.

Again, it will be seen that by the terms of both these acts, the penalty for failing to comply with the requirements of these acts is not imposed once for all, but is a recurring penalty, repeated as often as the offending party may have dealings. In the act of 1872 the penalty is "a fine of twenty dollars for the first offense, and a fine of forty dollars for the second and every subsequent offense;" and in the act of 1879 the penalty is "a fine of ten dollars for each separate bag, or barrel, or package sold or offered for sale." So, that, testing the legislation of this State upon the subject by the rules laid down by that eminent jurist, Mr. Benjamin, the conclusion is unavoidable that the object of the legislature was to prohibit the sale of commercial fertilizers in this State unless the requirements of the statutes are complied with.

The general rule, undoubtedly is, that a contract to do an act *which is prohibited by statute, or which is contrary to public policy, is void, and cannot be enforced in a court of justice. It seems, too, to be equally well established that it is not necessary that the act should be prohibited in express terms, but that a prohibition may be implied from the imposition of a penalty, because, as Lord Holt says: "A penalty implies a prohibition, though there are no prohibitory words in the statute." Miller v. Post, 1 Allen 434; Pray v. Burbank, 10 N. H. 377; Law v. Hodson, 11 East 300; Kleckley v. Leyden, 63 Ga. 216; Johnston v. McConnell, 65 Ga. 129; Dillon v. Allen, 26 Am. Rep. 145, (46 Iowa 299); Woods v. Armstrong, 25 Am. Rep. 671, (54 Ala. 150). The cases above cited from Alabama and Georgia arose upon statutes regulating the sales of commercial fertilizers, and the contracts were held void for noncompliance with the prescribed regulations. Especial attention is invited to the notes appended to the case of Woods v. Armstrong, by the editor of the American Reports, as containing a full collection of the authorities.

The cases of Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79 [13 L. Ed. 901], and Niemeyer v. Wright, 40 Am. Rep. 720 (75 Va. 239), mainly relied upon by respondent's counsel, do not, in our judgment, sustain his position. Both those cases recognize the doctrine that a contract founded on an act prohibited by statute is void, and that it makes no difference whether the prohibition is expressed or is to be implied from the imposition of a penalty. They, however, maintain the doctrine that whether a prohibition is to be implied from the imposition of a penalty is a question of legislative intent, to be ascertained by an examination of the various provisions of the statute in question, and where there are any terms in the statute which indicate that the legislature did not intend to avoid a contract made in contravention of it, such a contract may be enforced. But, to use the language of Mr. Justice Wayne, in Harris v. Runnels, which seems to have been the authority upon which the case of Niemeyer v. Wright was mainly based, "When the statute is silent, and contains nothing from which the contrary can be properly inferred, a contract in contravention of it is void."

In both of the cases the court went on to show that there were *other provisions in the statutes there brought under review, which, to their minds, indicated a purpose on the part of the legislature not to declare contracts made in contravention of the terms of such statutes void, but simply to impose a penalty for a failure to comply with the statutory regulations. So that, even if we should adopt the views announced in these cases, the conclusion which we have reached would not be affected, for in the statutes which we are called upon to construe, there is not only no provision which would indicate that the legislature did not intend to declare a contract for the sale of commercial fertilizers void, unless the regulations prescribed by statute were complied with, but on the contrary we are satisfied that the main object of this legislation was to protect the farmers from fraud and imposition in the sale of commercial fertilizers, and absolutely to prohibit such sales unless the regulations prescribed are complied with.

Indeed, aside from any authority, it would seem to us altogether anomalous, not to use any harsher term, to hold that a court of justice should enforce a contract founded upon an act which is absolutely forbidden by the law-making department of the government. As was well said in Bank v. Owens, 2 Pet. 539, "No court of justice can, in its nature, be made the handmaid of iniquity. Courts are instituted to carry into effect the laws of a country; how can they, then, become auxiliary to the consummation of violations of law? * * * There can be no civil right where there can be no legal remedy, and there can be no legal remedy for that which is itself illegal." Or, as is said in O'Donnell v. Sweeney, 5 Ala. 468, "It would indeed be a strange anomaly if a contract, made in violation of a statute, and prohibited by a penalty, could be enforced in the courts of the same country whose laws are thus trampled on and set at defiance."

The only remaining inquiry is, whether the sale, upon which the contract sued upon in this case was based, was made in violation of the law regulating the sale of commercial fertilizers. The undisputed facts set out in the "Case," show beyond all question that it was. It is conceded that the bags in which the fertilizer was put up, "had on them the name, location, and trade-*mark of the manufacturer, but did not have the chemical composition of the contents of the bags, or the date of its analysis, or that the privilege tax had been paid." They, therefore, lacked at least one thing, and, perhaps, the most important, required by the act of 1872—the constituent elements of such fertilizer; and at least three things required by the act of 1879, to wit: (1) The chemical composition of the contents of the package; (2) The date of the analysis; (3) That the privilege tax had been paid.

It is true that the counsel for respondent has contended that the act of 1879 does not require the chemical composition of the contents of the package to be stated, except where certain ingredients specified in the statute are asserted to be present, and that in this case no such ingredients were asserted to be present, but we do not so understand the terms of the act. On the contrary, we think the true reading of the act is, that in all cases the label or stamp shall set forth the chemical composition of the contents of the package, and if any of the particular ingredients mentioned in the statute are set forth as part of the chemical composition of the contents of a package of fertilizers, then the real percentage of such ingredients, as set forth or asserted to be present, must likewise be stated.

It seems to us that the chemical composition of a fertilizer is the important matter to be known, and to read the statute as if it dispensed with this important requirement, except where certain specified ingredients were asserted to be present, would not only emasculate the statute, but would pervert its language from its plain meaning. So, that, even if we should hold, as contended for by respondent, that the mere absence of a label showing that the privilege tax had been paid, would not invalidate the sale, (about which, however, we are not now called upon to express any opinion,) we would still be compelled to hold that the sale was illegal, as there was a failure to comply with other fundamental requirements of the law.

Inasmuch as we have seen that the object of the legislation under review was not to secure the collection of revenue, we have not deemed it necessary to consider the question, about which there seems to be some conflict of authority, whether a *sale made in violation of statutory regulations designed to secure the collection of the revenue, would be illegal and void. See Brown v. Duncan, 10 Barn. & C. 93; Johnson v. Hudson, 11 East 180; Cope v. Rowlands, 2 Mees. & W. 157; Griffith v. Wells, 3 Den. 226; Smith v. Mawhood, 14 Mees. & W. 452; Larned v. Andrews, 8 Am. Rep. 346, (106 Mass. 435).

We are therefore of opinion that the contract sued upon in this case is illegal and void, and that the Circuit judge erred in instructing the jury otherwise.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

STATE v. COLEMAN.

(November Term, 1883.)

The examination of a juror on his voire dire should properly be conducted by the court.

[2. Jury ⇐103.]

It is for the Circuit judge to decide whether a juror is indifferent or not. In this case, the judge did not abuse his discretion in permitting to be sworn a juror, who stated on his voire dire that he had read the newspaper accounts of the crime—had neither formed nor expressed any opinion of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar, but had said that "any man who commits such a crime should be hanged," and, further, "that a man committing so shocking a crime as this was reported to be, did not deserve a trial by jury."

The trial-judge refused to permit defendant's counsel, in a murder trial, to read to an expert what had been said by a physician proved to be high authority on the subject of transitoria mania, as found in a medical journal, and then to ask such witness whether he concurred in those views, but counsel was permitted to frame from such publication questions for the witness as to his own opinions, and also to read to the jury at pleasure from standard authors upon medical jurisprudence. Held, that there was no error in the judge's ruling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1077; Dec. Dig. ⟸487.]

[4. Criminal Law ⟸484.]

It is not proper to ask physician-experts their opinion of the prisoner's sanity from the testimony given in the case on trial, but they may be asked their views generally, or with reference to a similar case hypothetically stated.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1072; Dec. Dig. ⟸484.]

[5. Criminal Law ⟸772.]

The judge refused to charge the jury "that if they believe that the prisoner had no motive for killing the deceased, as shown by words or deeds previous or subsequent to the act, then they must acquit him on the ground of want of criminal intent," and instead charged "that the intent must exist and be shown to exist, but the motive may not be discovered; the absence of a motive revealed is a circumstance to be duly considered in weighing the question of guilt." Held, that in this there was no error.

*The judge refused to charge the jury "that it is the duty of the State to prove that the prisoner was of sound mind when he committed the act, and if, from the evidence, the defense create a reasonable doubt about the prisoner being sane, you must give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt," but on the contrary charged "that the burden of proving soundness of mind is not, in the first instance, on the State; it is a defense, and if established, will prevail when interposed by defendant; the jury must be satisfied of defendant's sanity before they can convict; the defendant is entitled to be acquitted if reasonable doubt of his capacity to commit crime is raised in the minds of the jury, but that the doubt to be raised in favor of the prisoner must be a serious, well-founded, substantial doubt." Held, that in this there was no error.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

This was an indictment against James Coleman for the murder of Sarah Willis, in the city of Columbia, on December 28th, 1882. The facts of the case are thus reported by the presiding judge:

The testimony disclosed the fact that the defendant was the husband of a sister of Sarah Willis; that he was in the habit of visiting the house of Sarah, and was, by her and her husband, received with the freedom and confidence usually accorded to a brother-in-law. With Sarah there lived an unmarried sister, by name Mattie Faust, a young and comely, bright, colored woman. On December 28th last, Sarah's husband was absent on a visit to relatives in the county of Barnwell. On the evening of that day the defendant called at her house, in the yard of Professor Davis of the South Carolina college, just as Sarah and her sister were about to go out to attend a fair in the city. The defendant was kindly welcomed, and gladly requested to remain and care for the house during the absence of Sarah and her sister, which he consented to do.

awaiting them. The unmarried sister, feeling fatigued, retired to bed, leaving Sarah and the defendant sitting by the fire, she having slipped off her shoes and unbuttoned her dress. The sleep of Mattie Faust was so profound that the noise which must have attended the killing of her sister did not awake her. About two or three o'clock a. m. she was aroused from sleep by finding a man in bed with her. She asked who it was, and the reply was, "It is Tom Brown." At this she cried aloud for her sister, when he seized her by the throat and threatened to kill her if she made further noise. She became passive, and he had connection with her. Having discovered that it was the defendant, she inquired for her sister, and was told that she was in the adjoining room with a man. Mattie attempted several times to quit the bed to find her sister, but he prevented her doing so, and several times himself arose and stepped out the door, when she could hear him scraping on the ground. The house had two rooms, each of which was entered from a door opening on the yard. On returning to the bed the defendant betrayed restlessness and said that he felt as if he was going to be hanged, and that she, Mattie, would be the cause of it.

Time passed on in this way until about dawn, when Coleman having again arisen and stepped out, Mattie sprang out of the house and saw him rapidly retreating. Looking into the next room through a window she saw her sister lying on the floor dead. The alarm was given, and upon the arrival of others the shocking scene was revealed. From the pool of blood in the room where Mattie slept, and the wounds upon the head of deceased, it was evident that with an axe or hatchet the defendant had cut Sarah down in the presence of the sleeping sister, and had then dragged the dead body into the yard, and thence along the ground to the next door of the house, and then lifted or dragged it into the adjoining room and there left it. Her head was deeply cut in several places. Having done this horrid deed, fiend-like, he repaired to the bed of Mattie and had carnal knowledge of her forcibly and against her will, all stained with the blood of his innocent victim, whom, in all probability, he *slew in cold blood for refusing to prostitute herself to his brutal lust.

Such is a brief narrative of this revolting homicide. So clear and convincing was the proof that the defendant after arrest and imprisonment did not, could not deny it, but freely and voluntarily confessed it, and said that he had no excuse for the act, except that he was instigated thereto by the devil. The attorney for the prisoner very prudently made no effort to deny nor disprove the fact of the killing, nor the circumstances attending it; but relied on the defense of transitory or temporary insanity. To establish this, he placed witnesses on the stand, including the parents and relatives of the defendant, who gave a history of his ills and ailments from childhood up to manhood.

The purport of this testimony was that James had, in boyhood, been at times affected with a strange hurting in his head, when he would pull his hair and complain of something moving in his head. He would, at times, awake at night with a scream, as if in a nightmare, and be much frightened. He talked in his sleep, and often in the daytime would talk to himself. At times he walked in his sleep. While a youth, he once lived at a Mr. McTeer's in Hampton county, when he became ill, and for a week was, in the opinion of Mr. McTeer, not in a sound state of mind. At school he was taciturn, and not inclined to play with the other children; but he learned as other children, and kept well up with his classes. On one occasion, during his career, he manifested a desire to get hold of a gun, to kill either himself or some one else. Such was the current of testimony regarding the defendant's mental condition and manifestations, running through a period of some years from boyhood to manhood. He is apparently twenty-four or twenty-five years of age.

Several eminent medical experts were examined by the defense upon the subject of insanity in general, and particularly transitory insanity. They were present throughout the trial, and heard all the testimony for the State and the defense, and gave the trial, in its progress from beginning to end, very close attention, and closely observed the defendant. These experts are Drs. Trezevant, Taylor, Talley, Green and Heinitsh.

All these *to whom the question was put very promptly stated that they could discover nothing in all the testimony indicating that the defendant was subject to transitory insanity, and without hesitation gave it as their opinion that at the time he committed the homicide he was sane and morally responsible. The jury, with little hesitation, arrived at the same conclusion, and found the defendant guilty. I have no hesitation in saying that I fully concur in the correctness of the verdict, as the defendant signally failed to make out his defense of insanity.

Other matters are stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant Coleman was indicted for the murder of one Sarah Willis. In impaneling the jury for the trial of the cause, one P. F. Toland, upon being presented, was ordered by the State to stand aside. When the panel was exhausted, he was recalled and again presented, the State and the prisoner having in the meantime exhausted their peremptory challenges. Upon the second presentation the juror, at the request of the prisoner's counsel, was sworn and examined upon his voire dire. The judge reports that "the prisoner's counsel was allowed to examine him, and proceeded to do so. The juror admitted that he had read the newspaper accounts of the crime shortly after it occurred, but said that he had neither formed nor expressed any opinion of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar. The counsel then asked him if he had not said that 'any man who commits such a crime should be hanged.' The juror replied that he had. I remarked at this point that the question was an improper one, and that any other answer would have been improper, because, had the juror answered that he had said that one committing murder should not be hanged, he would have been disqualified. The juror here volunteered the remark that he had said that a man committing so shocking a murder as this was reported to be, did not deserve a trial by jury. The defendant's counsel said, 'You are in favor, then, of lynch law.'

He replied, 'Yes, when the *circumstances demanded it.' In answer to questions by the court, the juror stated very positively and earnestly that he had no bias for nor prejudice against the prisoner; that he stood entirely indifferent—would be governed altogether by the law and the testimony, and could and would give him a fair trial." The judge directed him to be sworn, and the defendant's counsel excepted.

After the evidence for the State was closed, the defendant's counsel announced that the defense was insanity; that the prisoner was of unsound mind at the time of committing the offense. In order to make out this defense, he offered as a witness Dr. Frank Green, and proceeded to interrogate him as follows: "Q. Are you a practicing physician? A. Yes. Q. How long have you been practicing medicine? A. Ten years. Q. During that time, had you made the study of the mind a specialty? A. Yes. Q. Have you been connected with any institution for the insane enabling you to do so? A. Yes—for several years in an insane asylum at New York; also for two years I have been connected with the asylum for the insane in the city of Columbia, South Carolina. Q. Will you say whether or not transitoria mania or impulsive insanity is recognized by the best medical authorities? A. It is. Q. Do you regard Drs. Ray, Hammond, Beauford, Debergie and Jarvis as recognized authorities on the subject of transitoria mania? A. Yes. Q. I will read what Dr. Jarvis said in the American Journal of Insanity, July, 1869, and published at Utica, on this question; say whether or not the same is your view?"

Just here the solicitor interposed objection, on the ground that a printed pamphlet could not be read in the manner proposed because there was no proof of its authenticity. The judge reports: "I refused to allow such a course of examination for many reasons too obvious to dwell upon. I remarked that in such a course of examination the counsel would make the testimony of the New York expert in that case testimony in the one before the court; that the question was leading, as it plainly suggested the answer, and that for these and other reasons he could not be allowed to read the extract. I informed the counsel that he might use the pamphlet for the purpose of framing *therefrom proper questions, but that all questions must be framed with a view to elicit from the witness what he (the witness) knew, and not with a view to tell the witness what other experts had said, in order to get the witness to concur. By such a course a very unlearned expert could be made to give very profound and learned answers to questions on insanity. I also informed the counsel that, in addressing the court or jury, he would be permitted to read at pleasure from standard authors upon medical jurisprudence, their views upon insanity, and the law applicable thereto. That such works were authority in our courts." The counsel excepted.

After the testimony was offered the counsel for the prisoner made many requests to charge, all of which received careful consideration and were ruled upon. Some of them were charged as proposed, some were charged in modified form, and others were refused. Under the charge, the jury found the defendant "guilty," generally, and he appeals to this court upon various grounds, which are all fully set out in the "Case," and need not incumber this opinion by being repeated here. It will only be necessary to notice such of them as are formally embodied in the exceptions. We will not take up the exceptions in the order in which they are stated, but, to avoid repetition, dispose of the points made, in what seems to us their proper order.

First. Exception one alleges that it was error of law in the Circuit judge to admit Toland to be sworn as a juror in the case. It is not alleged that there was any cause for his exclusion, unless it arose out of his own statements when examined on his voire dire. This court has held that "whether a juror is indifferent in a cause is a matter of fact to be finally determined by the Circuit judge. As a matter of law, a juror is not incompetent who has formed an opinion from what he has read in the newspapers, or heard, but whose mind would not be thereby influenced, who is not sensible of any bias or prejudice, and would be governed by the evidence." State v. Dodson, 16 S. C. 453; State v. Coleman, 8 S. C. 239. This would seem to dispose of the question made here, but as the case is a capital one and the counsel for the prisoner earnestly urged that the ruling of the *judge below was an abuse of the discretion allowed him to the extent of being a violation of law, we will consider it.

It was formerly held in this State that the prisoner did not have the right to examine a juror on his voire dire to ascertain whether he had formed or expressed an opinion as to his guilt. His right to twenty peremptory challenges was regarded in practice as a very adequate security against being tried by a jury which had prejudged his guilt. State v. Baldwin, 1 Treadw. Con. R. 289; State v. Sims, 2 Bailey 33. But, to give effect to the declaration of the constitution, that every person shall have the right to a trial "by an impartial jury," the act of 1871, re-enacted in the general statutes as section 2261, provides that "The court shall, on motion of either party in suit, examine on oath, any person who is called as a juror therein, to know whether he is related to either party, or has any interest in the cause, or has expressed or formed any opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice therein, and the party objecting to the juror may introduce any other competent evidence in support of the objection. If it appears to the court that the juror is not indifferent in the cause, he shall be placed aside as to the trial of that cause," &c.

The object of the act was manifestly to secure "an impartial jury," and the method adopted to ascertain whether the juror stands indifferent was for the judge to interrogate him on certain points and decide the question. As was said by the court in the case of State v. Coleman, supra, "The presiding judge must determine on the character of the questions proposed and when the examination shall cease. In fact, the allowance of the examination by the counsel in place of the court, was an indulgence." It seems to us important, for several reasons, that this requirement should be observed in practice. When should one summoned as a juror, be held as disqualified for having formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt of the prisoner? Hawkins states the rule thus: "When he hath declared his opinion beforehand that the party is guilty, or will be hanged, or the like." Mr. Bishop says this rule has been more or less expounded and qualified in the States. "It has therefore no form which may be fitly termed the modern American doctrine. * * * In the nature of things *it is impossible, in any case, to obtain a jury, the mind of every one of whom shall be free from all that might incline it more to the one side than the other. Hence, in looking for rules, the court shall be guided as well by the consideration of what can be as by the dictates of abstract justice. It may only demand that a disqualification, to prevail, should be of some standard magnitude, dictated by practical wisdom. Now, the terms of our constitutions differ, so that what would be admissible under one may not be under another. But in none is it declared that the jury shall be an impossible one—of perfect men," &c. 1 Bish. Cr. Pro., §§ 909 and 910.

The juror in this case admitted he had said that "any man who commits such a crime should be hung," and "that a man committing so shocking a murder as this is reported to be, did not deserve a trial by jury."

These are strong expressions, not, however, directly in reference to the prisoner's guilt, but on the contrary, general, and pointing rather to the horrible character of the crime as stated. Considered in reference to the prisoner personally, they may be regarded as hypothetical in character; that is to say, if the facts are as stated, and the deed was done by one responsible for his act. Thus understand, they did not necessarily disqualify the juror. "A mere hypothetical opinion or impression, proceeding from no ill-will, is not alone cause for rejecting a juror." People v. Symonds, 22 Cal. 349. "An opinion merely hypothetical, and depending on the truth of rumors, or information, does not disqualify." Epes' Case, 5 Gratt. 676. "A juror, on a trial for murder, stated on his voire dire that he had not heard the matter talked over outside of his family; but he had read newspaper accounts of it, from which he had formed an opinion, which he then held, and which it would require evidence to remove; but that, notwithstanding such opinion, he could hear the evidence and try the case fairly and impartially. Held, that a challenge for cause was properly overruled. Manke v. People, 17 Hun 410, (and see a number of cases from most of the States in note to § 912, 1 Bish. Cr. Pro.)

In all these cases, there is concurrence in the view, that the Circuit judge is "the trier" to decide the question, and we can*not say that in admitting Toland to be sworn, the Circuit judge abused that discretion in this case.

Second. Exception two charges error "in not allowing the prisoner's counsel to read extracts from medical authorities on insanity as found in a printed pamphlet, and to propose questions to medical experts thereon." There seems to be some misapprehension on this subject. The Circuit judge reports that he refused the counsel permission to read what was said by a distinguished expert upon the trial of Fanny Hyde, charged with the murder of George W. Watson before a court in New York, and having read his testimony, to ask the witness whether he concurred in those views. The judge says: "I informed the counsel that he might use the pamphlet for the purpose of framing therefrom proper questions, but that all questions must be framed with a view to elicit from the witness what the witness knew, and not with a view to tell the witness what other experts had said, in order to get the witness to concur. I also informed the counsel that, in addressing the jury, he would be permitted to read at pleasure from standard authors upon medical jurisprudence their views upon insanity and the law applicable thereto," &c.

It thus appears from the official report, which alone must be our guide, that in fact the only cause of complaint relates to the manner of conducting the examination and interrogating the witness. Permission was given to use the pamphlet for the purpose of framing proper questions, but not to read what was said and then ask the witness whether or not he concurred in those views. It is elementary that, "in the direct examination of a witness, it is not allowed to put to him what are termed leading questions, that is, questions which suggest to the witness the answers desired. * * * Questions are also objectionable as leading, which, embodying a material fact, admit of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 434. We understand that an expert may be examined as to how far standard works sustain or conflict with his opinion, but we do not see that such indulgence dispenses with the necessity of reaching his own opinion in the regular way. People v.

*Wheeler, 60 Cal. 581; People v. Hall, 48 Mich. 490; 42 Am. Rep. 477.

While upon the subject of the testimony of scientific experts it may not be improper to say, that their testimony consists of judgment in relation to matters not supposed to be familiar to the jury, and should be given in the abstract rather than in the concrete upon the facts proved, and not the general merits of the case, though they may give an opinion upon a similar case, hypothetically stated. 1 Greenl., § 440. It was, therefore, not in accordance with the strict rule applicable to such testimony, when Drs. Trezevant, Taylor, Talley, Green and Heinitsh, who heard all the facts developed on the trial, stated "That they could discover nothing in all the testimony indicating that defendant was subject to transitory insanity, and, without hesitation, gave it as their opinion, that at the time he committed the homicide he was sane and morally responsible." The subject of the mind and its influence upon the body, is very difficult and obscure, to the most learned—a region of twilight, subjecting the wise and the unwise, the philosopher and the judge alike to a reverential humility, and we think it would have been safer for the experts to have given their views generally, or with reference merely to a hypothetical case. But no objection or exception was made at the trial to the manner in which the evidence was stated, and it is referred to here only through abundance of caution.

Third. Exceptions three and five complain that the judge refused to charge the jury as requested, "That if they believe that the prisoner had no motive for killing the deceased, as shown by words or deeds previous or subsequent to the act, then they must acquit him on the ground of want of criminal intent," but instead charged the jury "That the intent must exist and be shown to exist, but the motive may not be discovered; the absence of a motive revealed is a circumstance to be duly considered in weighing the question of guilt." There is no necessity for confounding the terms "intent" and "motive." We suppose there can be no doubt about the prisoner's "intent" to kill the deceased. He did it with an axe, in the most brutal manner, in her own house, dragged off the body and then fled. *It would be going very far to assume that in this sense the "intent" did not exist—that he did not intend what he actually did. But can it be supported, either by reason or authority, that such intent to kill, carried into effect, must be held to be wanting in criminality if, so far as can be shown by words or deeds, there was no rational motive for the killing? There may have been some motive deep down in his heart.

It would be alarming, indeed, if no one could be found guilty for committing the most horrible deed, unless some external evidence could be shown of the motives which prompted him. If one, not shown to be insane, were to shoot into a crowd and slay another who was a stranger to him, he would certainly be convicted of murder, on the ground of malice against all mankind. Blackstone says: "Malice prefence, malitia precogitata, is not so properly spite or malevolence to the deceased, in particular, as any evil design in general—the dictate of a wicked, depraved and malignant heart." The whole class of cases in which malice is implied rests on the principle that "all homicide is presumed to be malicious, until the contrary appeareth upon evidence." We suppose that the perpetrator of every great crime, at the moment of the act, is, in one sense, more or less insane—demented by some raging passion or driven by some wicked impulse; but such want of self-control alone may not amount to that incapacity to distinguish between right and wrong, which the law humanely recognizes and covers with its mantle of charity. Upon this subject we think there was no error below.

Fourth. Exceptions four, six and seven complain that the judge refused to charge as requested, "that it is the duty of the State to prove that the prisoner was of sound mind when he committed the act, and if the defense, from the evidence, create a reasonable doubt about the prisoner being sane, you must give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt;" but, on the contrary, he charged "That the burden of proving soundness of mind is not, in the first instance, on the State. It is a defense, and, if established, will prevail when interposed by defendant. The jury must be satisfied of defendant's sanity before they can convict. * * * That the defendant is entitled to be acquitted if reasonable doubt of his capacity to commit crime is raised in *the minds of the jury. * * * But that the doubt to be raised in favor of the prisoner must be a serious, well-founded, substantial doubt," &c.

As we understand it, these rulings were not inconsistent with the requests of the defendant. There seems to be a difference in the authorities as to the nature of the issue when the defense of insanity is made, whether the defendant must make out his insanity or the State must prove his sanity beyond a reasonable doubt. But all the authorities agree that every man is presumed to be sane, and that, as a consequence, it is not incumbent on the State at the outset to prove it. Some of them, however, hold that, once the issue is made and evidence offered tending to shake the presumption, then the State must establish sanity like any other material point in dispute. This view the Circuit judge adopted. He held that, on account of the presumption of sanity, the burden of proving soundness of mind is not, in the first instance, on the State, but that insanity, if established, will prevail. He reports that he charged, "That the jury must be satisfied of defendant's sanity before they can convict him [and must give him the benefit of every reasonable doubt on this point]. The works in brackets are not on my notes, but they were spoken, and defendant's proposition was charged in full against a strong New Jersey case, cited by the solicitor to the contrary, in which the learned judge holds that insanity must be fully established in order to prevail as a defense. I held with defendant's proposition, that if the evidence of insanity was such as to create a reasonable doubt of the sanity of the prisoner, he should be acquitted." This ruling was certainly more favorable to the prisoner than that in our own case of State v. Stark, 1 Strobh. 506, which was a very remarkable case, somewhat like this but stronger. It was there held, after mature consideration, "That the positive existence of that degree and kind of insanity that shall work a dispensation to the prisoner, in a case of established homicide, is a fact to be proved, as it is affirmed by him, to the satisfaction of the jury, who are the safest and proper arbiters of the question."

As to the form of the verdict, section 1589 of general statutes does "authorize" a judge "to send to the lunatic asylum any person who shall, upon trial before him, prove to be non compos *mentis." This is not mandatory, and we know of no law or practice which would permit this court to hold a Circuit judge in error for charging a jury to render a general verdict of guilty or not guilty of the offense charged, or for instructing them that the phrase "reasonable doubt," used in the books, means a "serious, well-founded, substantial doubt."

Fifth. Exceptions five and eight complain that "the judge erred in charging 'That the atrocity of the deed was presumption of malice, as where a person kills a child, or one unoffending, the law presumes malice. The law truly applied to a case in which the evidence shows, or even the plea of insanity is set up, makes the reverse of his Honor's ruling only true. The atrocity of a deed may be commented on as matter of law, but the deed and its character was a fact for the jury. Moreover, the general rule will not apply, for the atrocity of the deed, when the plea of insanity is set up, is presumptive of innocence and not of malice, for the law presumes no sane man to act but according to the ordinary course of human conduct." Bish. Cr. L., § 482.

It may be true that, where there is evidence of insanity at the time of the commission of the act, the atrocity of that act may not, as in the ordinary case of a sane man, afford evidence of malice. But it seems to us that it would be a dangerous doctrine to allow the mere plea of insanity to reverse, entirely, the general well-established rule, so as to make the atrocity of the deed itself evidence of the innocence of the perpetrator. In this respect, also, the case is like that of State v. Stark, supra. In its circumstances that case was, if possible, more wanton, unnatural and atrocious than this. Stark inhumanly butchered his unoffending wife and his two little children, and then made an unsuccessful effort to cut his own throat. In that case, as well as in this, the argument was most earnestly made that insanity was shown by the very wickedness and unexampled barbarity of the deed, but the court held that "Where no more than the homicide is proved the overwhelming barbarity of the act will not be admitted as a presumption of insanity; for, then, the more unnatural and brutal the crime, the stronger would become the ground of defense."

*As I can say nothing more appropriate to the present case, I shall close this opinion in the touching words of Judge Withers, who delivered the judgment of the old Appeal Court in that case: "But, upon a review of the whole case, what are the considerations really relied on to establish the insanity of the prisoner? 1. The overwhelming barbarity of the act. The prisoner has put to death the unoffending mother of his children, and those children themselves still more unoffending. It is quite clear that if we admit the dispensing power of such reasoning, no man can ever be convicted for the murder of his family, if no more can be proved than the homicide itself, for the more atrocious and brutal the crime, the stronger would become the ground of defense. Nor should we find encouragement for this in the courts of England, for it is but recently (see the case of Regina v. Higginson, 47 Eng. Com. L. 129,) a prisoner was on trial for the murder of his little son, and the question being whether he had first killed him or had buried him alive, he rose in court and said, 'I buried him alive.' No presumption of insanity was urged, and he was convicted. * * * Our painful conclusion is, that there is nothing to justify the interference of this court, and that, though we can not certainly prove the prisoner's sanity, the jury have found it; and having had a fair trial, with all the humane allowances of the law, before a jury of his peers, their solemn arbitrament must seal his fate."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling that court to assign a new day for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed.

STATE v. GADSDEN.

[Trespass ⇐⇒80.]

A., the owner and cultivator of a field, gave to B. a verbal, vague and voluntary permission to plant therein a patch of turnips, without consideration, or particular mention of any part of the field, and afterwards the wife of A., with his consent, cut the turnips up. Held, that B. did not have such possession of real property as would support an indictment against the wife of A. for malicious trespass under the statute. Gen. Stat., § 2501.

*Before Aldrich, J., Georgetown, March, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. R. Dozier, for appellant.

No counsel contra.

March 1st, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an indictment for malicious trespass under the act of 1857, Gen. Stat., § 2501. Billy Gadsden, the husband of the defendant, owned a field and worked it, but it seems that he gave to one Moses Myers permission to plant a patch of turnips in it. There was no writing and there was conflict of testimony as to whether permission was given. If so, it certainly was a mere verbal, vague, voluntary permission, without consideration or particular mention of any part of the said field. Myers did plant turnips in a part of it, and in October, Silvy Gadsden, the wife of Billy, the owner, and with his consent, cut them up; and for that act Myers indicted her for a malicious trespass.

The counsel for the defendant requested the judge to charge, "That if they come to the conclusion that Myers only had permissive use of the land to plant, without contract or consideration, such use was what is known in law as 'leave and license,' and the party giving it, or one with his consent, could put a stop to it at any time without being liable to a criminal prosecution under the statute." The judge refused the request, but charged, "That if they believed Moses Myers had permission from Billy Gadsden to have the land from the first of March until the crop was made and moved, and in consequence thereof he had expended his time and labor in preparing the land and in planting and cultivating the crop, then he had the possession mentioned in the statute, and the act complained of was the trespass contemplated by the law—that he could not be removed from the land until the crop was removed."

The jury found the defendant "guilty," and she appeals to this court and makes substantially these points: First, that "the possession of real property," necessary to sus-tain a criminal prose*cution under the act, is that actual, exclusive possession of the soil, or some part of it, which would authorize an action of trespass, q. c. f., against an intruder thereon; and second, "that the evidence showed that the prosecutor, Myers, had no such possession of any part of the field, but at most had only a vague, verbal license to plant turnips, which, being without consideration, was revocable at the pleasure of the owner; or, if not so revocable after the turnips had been planted, that for a revocation or interruption of it his only remedy was a civil action for damages."

Before the act of 1857, a mere trespass upon property, real or personal, was not a criminal offense punishable with fine and imprisonment, and therefore, when one is indicted under that statute, it is necessary to show that the act complained of is covered and provided for by the statute. It is not pretended that this case falls within section 2500 of general statutes, for "cutting, shooting or maiming" live stock or personal property of that kind; but the claim is that the facts bring it within section 2501, which provides as follows: "Whoever shall willfully, unlawfully and maliciously cut, mutilate, deface, or otherwise injure any tree, house, outhouse, fence or fixture of another, or commit any other trespass upon real property in possession of another, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," &c. It cannot be claimed that the defendant Silvy defaced or injured any house, fence or other fixture of Myers, so that the only question is, whether, in cutting up the turnips on her husband's land, she committed a trespass upon "real property in the possession" of Myers.

What was meant by the phrase, "real property in the possession of another"? There are several kinds of possession of land described in the books: constructive, virtual and actual, and sometimes these different kinds overlap each other and conflict. McColman v. Wilkes, 3 Strobh. 465 [51 Am. Dec. 637]. But it is clear that, in no point of view, can Myers be considered to have constructive or virtual possession. He held no such relation to the property as to give him such possession. If he did not have actual possession he had none. As the field belonged to Gadsden, and was cultivated by him, Gadsden had actual, or, at least, virtual possession of the whole, which excluded the actual possession of *another unless that other could show that some particular part of it had been placed in his exclusive possession, as in the case of the owner putting another into possession of a house on his land. Caldwell v. Julian, 2 Mill. Con. R. 294.

The question then is reduced to this, Did the permission to plant turnips on the land amount to a verbal leave of so much of it as Myers chose to plant, or only a license to plant turnips on the land in the possession of Gadsden? Whether it was a leave or a license depends upon the intention of the parties, and all the circumstances would seem to indicate that it was a mere license, and gave no exclusive possession to any part of the field itself. A license is defined to be "an authority to do an act which would otherwise be a trespass. A license passes no interest, and, therefore, if A. grants to B. a right to fasten barges to moorings in a river, this does not amount to a demise, nor give the licensee an exclusive right to the use of the moorings, nor render him liable to be rated as the occupier of part of the bed of the river; hence, also, if a person by deed grants an exclusive license for the use of land, this may amount to a lease or to the grant of an incorporeal hereditament." 2 Rap. & Lawr. Dict. 753, title "License." "A right to erect a mill upon the land of another is an incorporeal hereditament." Trammell v. Trammell, 11 Rich. 471. So, also, is a grant of the use of timber on the grantor's land, and trespass quare clausum fregit will not lie for injury done to an incorporeal right. Clark v. Way, Id. 621; Vance and Wife v. Beatty, 4 Rich. 104.

We do not decide the question as to whether the license was revocable after Myers had so far executed is as to plant the turnips. If it was then irrevocable, the remedy of the party was by civil action for damages. We only hold that there was no such possession in Myers as to sustain an indictment for malicious trespass under the act.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*BISCHOFF & CO. v. BLEASE.

[1. Partnership ⟸213.]

In action brought by A., B. and C., styling themselves in the title as A. & Co., the complaint alleged that defendant had executed his notes to A. & Co., and that plaintiffs were the owners and holders thereof, but it did not allege a partnership between A., B. and C. Held, on demurrer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 408, 409; Dec. Dig. ⟸213.]

[2. Partnership ⟸213.]

Where plaintiffs sue as partners, their right to sue as such depends upon the existence of a partnership, which therefore is an issuable fact, and must be alleged in the body of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kerr & Co. v. Cochran, 29 S. C. 62, 6 S. E. 905; Lookout Mountain Medicine Co. v. Hare & Co., 56 S. C. 462, 35 S. E. 130.

For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 408, 409; Dec. Dig. ⟸213.]

[3. Partnership ⟸216.]

The notes being payable to a partnership, only the members of the partnership can sue thereon; therefore, the existence of the partnership, and that plaintiffs are members thereof, are material and essential facts to the plaintiffs' cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 409, 412, 416–418; Dec. Dig. ⟸216.]

[4. Partnership ⟸213.]

The allegation that plaintiffs were the owners and holders of the notes sued on, did not show that they had the right to sue in the character of partners, as stated in the title of their complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 408; Dec. Dig. ⟸213.]

[5. Bills and Notes ⟸487.]

The demurrer to this complaint being sustained, plaintiffs should have leave to amend.

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

This was an action against H. H. Blease. The opinion states the pleadings and the exceptions. The order of the Circuit judge was as follows:

This is an action on three promissory notes. The complaint in its caption sets out "Henry Bischoff, C. Wulbern and J. H. Peiper, trading under the name and style of Henry Bischoff & Co.," as the plaintiffs. Each allegation on the separate notes states that "defendant gave his promissory note in writing, whereby he promised to pay the plaintiffs, Henry Bischoff & Co.," the sum stated. There is no statement whether they sue as partners under the name of "Bischoff & Co.," or only as joint owners of said notes, using the name of Bischoff & Co. in that particular transaction. Defendant demurs on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

My judgment is, that the complaint does allege that the persons named as plaintiffs in the caption are the Henry Bischoff & *Co. to whom said notes were given, and to whom defendant promised payment of the amount of said notes. To maintain their action, it is not necessary that they allege or prove whether they are partners or only joint owners of said notes. Proof that the notes were given to them under that name by the defendant, would clearly entitle them to recover, and that proof would be clearly admissible under said allegations.

The demurrer is overruled, and plaintiffs have leave to enter judgment and issue execution for the amount of said notes, with interest and costs.

Messrs. Jones & Mower, for appellant.

Averment is necessary in the body of the complaint that plaintiffs are partners. 2 Wait Pr. 373; 58 How. Pr. 1. The complaint should state every fact which plaintiff must prove to enable him to maintain his suit, and which defendant has a right to contradict in his answer. 7 N. Y. 478; 10 Id. 363; 3 Duer 632; 9 Barb. 158; 20 Barb. 455. Allegation that plaintiff is owner and holder is surplusage. Voorh. Code (10th edit.) 163, note f.; 7 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 146; 33 Mo. 364; 32 Cal. 569; 40 Id. 440. The defects here are substantial and are reached by this demurrer. 5 N. Y. 357; 22 How. Pr. 30; Wait Anno. Code 238. The defendant should have been allowed to answer.

Messrs. Moorman & Schumpert, contra.

The title of the cause is a part of the complaint, and the names of the plaintiffs should there be stated. Code, § 163. A copartnership as such cannot sue, but the members thereof may sue jointly; they do so, however, as individuals and in their individual names. 6 S. C. 173; 2 Wait Pr. 370. Therefore, the authority cited, 2 Id. 373, does not apply. Besides, the allegations, with the copies of the notes sued on, imply that plaintiffs are the owners and that the notes are due. Code, § 183; 2 Wait Pr. 315–327. But the notes being given to Bischoff & Co., testimony would be admissible to show that the notes were given to plaintiffs under the name of Bischoff & Co. 2 Wait Pr. 310, 333,

*462

453. The facts stated could be put in *issue only by a denial in an answer. Id. 416. No motion was made for leave to answer, and such leave was within the discretion of the Circuit judge. Id. 455.

March 3d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was upon three notes executed by the defendant to Henry Bischoff & Co. The complaint, in its caption or title, named Henry Bischoff, C. Wulbern and J. H. Peiper, trading under the name and style of Henry Bischoff & Co., as plaintiffs. In its body it stated as to each of those notes, that the defendant had made his promissory note in writing, whereby he promised to pay to the plaintiffs, Henry Bischoff & Co., or order, &c., the amount specified in each. It was also alleged, that said plaintiffs were now and ever had been, the legal owners and holders of said notes, copies of which were attached, and judgment was demanded for the amount of each, besides interest, costs and disbursements. The defendant demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This was overruled, and plaintiffs were granted judgment, with leave to issue execution. No motion seems to have been made by defendant for leave to answer.

The appeal raises two questions: First. Whether the demurrer should have been overruled. Second. Being overruled, whether the defendant should have been permitted to answer over. As to the first question, it is urged: 1. That if the plaintiffs sued as partners, the complaint is defective in the fact that a partnership is not alleged in the body of the complaint, and, consequently, no testimony could be offered as to that fact. 2. If they sued as individuals, and not as partners, that the complaint does not state facts showing title as individuals, as the notes in their terms are made payable to Henry Bischoff & Co., and not to the parties named. Upon these grounds it is contended that the demurrer should have been sustained.

The code requires that the names of the plaintiffs shall be set out in the title of an action, and when this is done, it is familiar law and practice that such name should not be repeated in the body of the complaint; because having once given the names *and styled themselves plaintiffs, all that is necessary afterwards, is simply to refer to themselves as plaintiffs. 2 Wait Pr. 370. This is so when the plaintiff sues in his individual capacity. When, however, he sues in a representative capacity, such as executor, administrator, guardian and the like, where his authority or right to sue arises only from his representative character, the statement in the title that he occupies such a position will not in itself be a sufficient statement, nor will it dispense with an allegation of that fact in the body of the complaint, because the right to the character in which the party sues in such case becomes one of the facts upon which his action depends, and, like the other material facts, it must be proved, and to authorize testimony thereto it must be alleged in the body of the complaint, as no testimony can be offered as to facts not thus alleged.

This is the doctrine laid down in 2 Wait Pr. 373, and in other writers on the code, the reasons for which are obvious when applied to parties suing in a representative capacity. The title informs the defendant of the character in which the plaintiff sues. If that character be any other than his natural and individual character, the facts by which he has become entitled to such character are issuable facts, and must be alleged in a formal way in the complaint; otherwise, it fails to state facts showing a right of action and would, therefore, be subject to demurrer. Now, the title in this case stated the names of the plaintiffs, and that they were partners trading under the name of Henry Bischoff & Co. These statements notified the defendant that the plaintiffs were suing as partners. But there is no allegation in the complaint that a partnership existed between these parties, and that, therefore, they were entitled to sue as partners, and if it was necessary that a partnership should have existed so as to entitle them to sue as such, (of which there can be no doubt,) then it was necessary that this fact should have been alleged in the body of the complaint; otherwise the defect would be fatal. It would then be like the case of an executor who styled himself as executor in the title and failed to allege his right to that character in the complaint, in such way as to give *the defendant an opportunity to demand proof thereof by denial or otherwise.

But was it indispensable in this case that a partnership should exist in order to enable the plaintiffs to sue in their names as styled in the title? There can be but little doubt of this. True, there is no difference between a contract made with individuals by name and a partnership by its name, so far as the obligation of the maker is concerned or the right to enforce is involved, but there is a difference between them as to the facts by which the plaintiffs become entitled to enforce. In the first case, the contract itself shows on its face with whom it is made and to whom it belongs, and, therefore, nothing is necessary in the complaint beyond the fact that it was made with the plaintiffs named in the title; but in the latter, the plaintiffs become entitled to sue, not because they are named in the contract, for they are not thus named, but because they are members of a firm which is named therein; and it is only on account of this fact that they can maintain the action. It is only through the partnership that they have any standing in court; hence the existence of the partnership and that the plaintiffs are members thereof, are material and essential facts to the plaintiffs' cause of action, and must be alleged and proved; otherwise, no cause of action is stated.

This distinction will, perhaps, be more clearly seen by again considering the distinction between suits by executors, administrators, receivers, and such like officials in their own right as individuals and those in their official and representative capacity. Where they sue as individuals, they need only state their names in the title as plaintiff and then in the body of the complaint make reference to themselves simply as plaintiff; but where they sue in their representative character and they are entitled to the action in that character only, the facts by which they have become clothed with such character must be alleged in an issuable form.

This case is distinguished from Scranton v. Farmers and M. Bank, 33 Barb. 527; Smith v. Levinus, 8 N. Y. 472, and Fowler v. Westervelt, 40 Barb. 374, in the fact that in those cases words were used in the complaint which in substance alleged the *character in which plaintiff sued, while in this case no such words are employed. This case is like Gould v. Glass, 19 Barb. 179, where the complaint was defective because there was nothing therein indicating that the action was brought by the plaintiff in the character represented in the title. In the title the words "commissioners of highways" were added to the names of the plaintiffs, but there was no averment in the complaint showing that the plaintiffs occupied such a position. So, in this case, in the title it appears that these plaintiffs sue as partners, but the complaint fails to allege a partnership and composed of the plaintiffs.

The allegation that the plaintiffs were the owners and holders did not cure the defect. This had reference to the character in which they were plaintiffs, as styled in the title, to wit, as partners, but still there was nothing in the complaint showing that they were entitled to assume that character.

According to strict rule, the demurrer should have been sustained, but we think, in such event, the plaintiffs should have leave to amend so as to incorporate the averments as to partnership in the body of the complaint, should they desire to do so. 2 Wait Pr. 455.

It is not necessary to discuss the second question, as the matter already considered disposes of the case.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded, with leave to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint in accordance with the opinion herein.

STATE v. MOSES.

[1. Costs ⇐51; Pleading ⇐239, 272.]

Pending trial on a clerk of court's official bond at the suit of the State, verdict was rendered in another action on a second bond of the same officer, and the Circuit judge then granted leave to defendants to amend their answer by pleading such verdict. Held, that the motion was in effect for leave to plead puis darrein continuance, and leave so to plead will generally be granted on a proper showing, but it should always be upon the payment of costs.

[2. Judgment ⇐715.]

*The record in the action on the second bond may have been admissible in evidence in this action, but if breaches were established under the first bond, as e. g. failure to deposit the official funds in bank, the State would be entitled to judgment for the penalty for the use of such persons as were damaged by such breaches, notwithstanding judgment had been recovered on the second bond for the same defaults continued after its execution.

[3. Clerks of Courts ⇐74.]

Where two bonds are successively given by a clerk of court during the same term of office, both sets of sureties may be liable to the State and to the aggrieved parties, provided defaults occur under both bonds and damages result therefrom.

[4. Clerks of Courts ⇐75.]

[In an action on the bond of a clerk of a common pleas court, the breach alleged was that he had received money in certain specified cases, which he had neither deposited in bank, as required by law, nor turned over to his successor, nor paid to the parties entitled to it. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff against such clerk and the sureties on a second bond given by him was not a bar to such action, under Act March 24, 1875 (15 St. at Large, p. 942), providing that the sureties on the first bond shall be released from responsibility for all acts or defaults of such officer which may be done or committed subsequent to the approval of such new bond.]

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Jones & Jones and George S. Mower, for appellant.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

March 4th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant Moses, having been appointed clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Newberry, on February 16th, 1875, entered into bond to the plaintiff, with the defendants Michael Foot and John P. Kinard, and William Mayes, the intestate of the defendant, Nancy Mayes, as his sureties, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of said office. On March 10th, 1877, the defendant Michael Foot applied to the county commissioners to be relieved from his suretyship upon said bond, and thereupon the said Moses, on April 4th, 1877, executed a new bond, with Catherine Moses, D. R. Phifer, Thomas P. Lane, P. Oliver and H. B. Scott, as his sureties.

On October 1st, 1879, this action was commenced on the bond first above stated, sundry breaches of which were assigned; among others, that the said Moses had received large sums of money in certain cases specified, which he had neither deposited in bank, as required by law to do, nor turned over to his successor, nor paid the same to the parties entitled thereto. Pending the trial of this case, and before the close of the testimony, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in another case *brought by the plaintiff against said Moses and his sureties on the bond second above mentioned. Thereupon, an order was asked for and granted, permitting the answers in this case to "be so amended as to plead in bar to this action the recovery and verdict this day rendered," upon the second bond above mentioned. To which plaintiff's counsel duly excepted.

The Circuit judge was requested by the plaintiff's counsel to charge the jury as follows: "(1) That if the funds in the hands of defendant H. Claremont Moses, as clerk, are not found on deposit, as required by law, the presumption arises that the funds are no longer in his hands as clerk thereby constituting a breach of the bond in suit. (2) That if they should find that a breach of the bond of H. C. Moses, Michael Foot and others was committed prior to April 4th, 1877, then the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for the penalty of the bond. (3) That a failure by H. C. Moses to deposit the funds in his hands, as clerk, in some national or State bank in the Seventh Judicial Circuit, would constitute a breach of the bond in suit, if such failure occurred before April 4th, 1877. (4) That the verdict in the suit on the bond on which Mrs. Catherine Moses, David R. Phifer, Thomas P. Lane, Peter Oliver and Harry B. Scott are sureties for H. C. Moses, as clerk, does not bar this action."

These requests were refused, and the jury were instructed: 1st. That the verdict in the action on the second bond barred a recovery in this action. 2d. "That they were to inquire whether, as a fact, there had been any substitution of a new bond for the bond under consideration; and, if so, they were to find, from the evidence, the date of such substitution. That if it be true that there was a substitution, the effect was to release the old bond from all liability for acts subsequent to date of such substitution. 3d. That a recovery on the second bond, upon a claim for damages, founded on certain allegations, barred a recovery on the first bond upon a like claim for same damages, founded upon the same allegations. That if the breaches and damages resulting therefrom, set forth in this action, were the same as those for which a recovery had already been obtained in the other action, then there should not be a recovery in this action. That the case might be different had some damages other than those for *which a verdict had already been rendered, been alleged and proved as resulting from a breach or breaches of the bond. That this being a civil action, it was not sufficient for a recovery that there had been some technical breach of the bond prior to April 4th, 1877, as, for instance, a failure to make regular returns to the court, or to deposit funds in a national or State bank. It was necessary for the plaintiff to go further, to allege and prove some specific damages resulting from such breach or breaches, and such damages must be other than those for which a recovery had already been had."

To this charge and the refusal to charge, the plaintiff's counsel duly excepted, and a verdict having been rendered in favor of defendants, and judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals upon numerous grounds set out in the record. We do not deem it necessary to state, specifically, the various grounds of appeal, but will consider the several questions made by the appeal, except that made by the second ground, which has been abandoned: 1st. As to the order granting leave to amend the answers. 2d. As to the admissibility of the verdict in the action on the second bond, and its effect. 3d. As to the effect of the failure to deposit the money collected by Moses, as clerk, prior to the execution of the second bond, in bank, as required by law.

We cannot say that there was any error in law on the part of the Circuit judge in granting the defendants leave to amend their answers by pleading the verdict recovered in the action on the second bond in bar to a recovery in this action, unless it be in failing to annex terms—the payment of the costs accrued up to that time. But, under the view which we take of the case, this is not a matter of practical importance, and does not warrant any extended observation or call for any specific ruling. The application was, in effect, for leave to plead puis darrein continuance, and such leave will generally be granted upon a proper showing, but it should always be upon the payment of costs.

Nor can we say that the record in the action on the second bond was not admissible in evidence, as it might be competent for certain purposes. The main question, however, is as to the effect of it. Did it bar a recovery in this action? This, it will *be observed, is an action brought by the State to recover judgment for the penalty of an official bond, and if it is established that there has been a breach of the condition of such bond, the judgment must go for the penalty, which will stand as a security for all persons who may be able to establish any damages which they have sustained by reason of such breach of the condition of the bond, according to the practice indicated in State v. Moses, 18 S. C. 366. This is in strict accordance with the terms of the contract of the parties. The obligors bind themselves, under a designated penalty, that the officer shall perform all the duties required of him by law; and if he fails to perform any one or more of such duties then the contract is broken and the obligee (the State) is entitled to judgment for the amount agreed upon as the penalty for the breach of such contract. What amount of damages any aggrieved person may be entitled to by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond, given for the protection of the public generally, is a totally distinct and different question, to be determined in the mode above indicated.

If, therefore, the defendant Moses had received money, as clerk, and failed to deposit it in bank, as required by law, before the execution of the second bond, or, if before that time he had committed any other breach of the condition of his official bond, then the plaintiff unquestionably was entitled to judgment against him for the penalty of his bond, even though judgment had been recovered on his second bond for a similar default. It is an entire mistake to suppose that the second bond was a substitution for the first, in the sense that it operated a release of the sureties on the first bond from all liability. The act of March 24th, 1875 (15 Stat. 942,) expressly provides that the sureties upon the first bond "shall be released from responsibility for all acts or defaults of such officer which may be done or committed subsequent to the approval of such new bond. So that the act does not purport even to release the sureties from liabilities incurred prior to the giving of the new bonds to say nothing as to the question whether the legislature would have the power to release a party from the consequences of a breach of his contract after such breach had been committed.

*If, therefore, Moses committed any breach of his official bond prior to the giving of the second bond, either by failure to deposit in bank moneys collected by him officially, or otherwise, such default would render the sureties on the first bond liable to judgment for the penalty which would stand as security for any damages which any party aggrieved might be able to establish by proper proceedings for that purpose. And if such default continued after the second bond was given, the sureties on that bond would also be liable, as we have held in the case of the State v. Moses, supra. Which set of sureties would be primarily liable, as between themselves, is not a question in this case, and need not, therefore, be considered here; but both sets of sureties may be liable to the plaintiff and to the aggrieved parties, provided defaults have occurred under both bonds and any damages have resulted therefrom.

We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in instructing the jury that the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, in the action on the second bond, barred a recovery in this action, and that he also erred in refusing plaintiff's second, third and fourth requests to charge, as set out above; but we do not think there was any error in refusing the first request to charge, for it may be that though the funds were not found on deposit, yet they may have been paid out according to law, and therefore the simple failure to find them on deposit was not, of itself, sufficient to establish a breach of the bond. So much of the judge's charge as relates to the subject of damages, whether both sets of sureties may not be liable for the same damages, resulting from the several breaches of the conditions of the two bonds, is not now properly before us, inasmuch as the persons claiming such damages do not now appear to be before the court. The only question in the case, as at present presented is, whether there was a breach of the condition of the first bond before the second bond was given, and, if so, then the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the penalty of the first bond, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff has already recovered judgment for the penalty of the second bond. When parties come in by proper proceedings to establish any damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the breach of the condition of either or both of the *bonds, these questions will then properly arise and can then be determined.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

In re COVIN'S ESTATE.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1011.]

On appeal from the Probate Court, the Circuit judge, upon the testimony taken below and upon additional testimony taken by consent before the master, sustained one of the Probate judge's findings of fact and reversed another. On appeal to this court, these findings of the Circuit judge were approved.

Testator devised his lands specifically but directed all of them to be valued and "each legatee to be equal." After making his will, testator caused twenty-four acres of the tract devised to his daughter, T., to be surveyed and laid out for her, and put her and her husband in possession, but executed no deed; and upon this land T. and her husband put improvements. Held, that in making the devisees equal, the increased value of these twenty-four acres by reason of the improvements, should not be estimated.

Before Wallace, J., Abbeville, February, 1883.

This was a petition filed in the Probate Court on May 11th, 1881, by P. A. Covin and S. R. Morrah, qualified executors of Louis Covin, deceased, for final discharge and settlement. The will was dated November 3d, 1875, and testator died July 9th, 1880. S. R. Morrah died August 2d, 1882. The case is otherwise fully stated in the opinion of this court and the Circuit decree. The latter was as follows:

This case is an appeal from the decree of the Probate judge and was heard by me upon exceptions, as follows:

*The executor appealed upon the ground that the Probate judge erred in deciding that Mrs. M. M. Tarrant, one of the legatees under the will of Louis Covin, deceased, should be allowed $1.50 per acre for improvements placed upon the land devised to her and her children in the will, she not being entitled to any deductions in regard to said improvements. The testimony shows that the testator sold to M. M. Tarrant, during his life-time, the improvements put upon the place by the said Tarrant, and it further appears that Mrs. Tarrant subsequently made improvements on the place, believing that the place belonged to her. This exception is overruled, and the decision of the Probate judge affirmed.

Mrs. M. E. Tarrant appeals from the said decree upon the grounds: 1. Because the Judge of Probate erred in not giving to a certain instrument of writing, executed by the testator, by which he gave to the said M. E. Tarrant twenty-four acres of land and the improvements thereon, the effect of a deed. The plat of said twenty-four acres, and the possession of the land having been delivered by the testator to the said M. E. Tarrant, this exception is overruled, and the decision of the court below affirmed.

2. Second exception. Because the Judge of Probate erred in not charging J. L. Covin with the amount of the purchase-money of the tract of land on which the said J. L. Covin now lives, he having executed his promissory note for $500, dated April 1st, 1873, for the same in favor of the testator, Louis Covin. It being in proof that J. L. Covin had not paid said note, and that it is still a subsisting demand against J. L. Covin, in favor of the estate of Louis Covin, Judge Cothran referred the following issues to a jury. Subsequently the parties agreed that the testimony should be taken by the master, and upon his report this exception came before me. The issues were: 1. Did J. L. Covin execute and deliver to Louis Covin a note for $500, dated April 1st, 1873? 2. Did the testator destroy the said note for the purpose of forgiving the debt? 3. Was said note assigned and transferred to a third party?

The testimony satisfies my mind that J. L. Covin did execute and deliver to Louis Covin, a promissory note for $500, dated

*April 1st, 1883; that the said note has not been destroyed by testator with the intention of forgiving the debt, and that the said note has not been assigned and transferred.

This exception is sustained, and it is ordered and adjudged that J. L. Covin be held to account for the said note of $500, with interest from April 1st, 1873, from his share of the estate of the said Louis Covin, deceased. That the Probate judge take testimony, and allow such credits as appear to be due on this note. Further ordered, that the case be remitted to the Probate Court for such proceedings as are necessary to carry out this decree, and that the settlement of said estate be made in accordance therewith.

From this decree an appeal was taken by the executor, and by James L. Covin. The exceptions raise the precise points considered by this court.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, for executor, appellant.

Mr. W. A. Lee, for J. L. Covin, appellant, in whose behalf was also read argument of Mr. A. Burt, deceased.

Mr. L. W. Perrin, for Mrs. Tarrant, respondent.

March 4th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The petition below was filed in the Probate Court by the qualified executors of Louis Covin, deceased, for the settlement of his estate. The testator left a will in which he devised certain tracts of land to his wife and children, directing said lands to be valued, "each legatee to be equal." He then directed that the balance of his lands and other property be sold, and the proceeds be divided equally among his wife and children, appointing James L. Covin, P. A. Covin and S. R. Morrah, his executors, the two last of whom alone qualified.

Upon the hearing by the Probate Court, Mrs. Martha E. Tarrant, a daughter of the deceased, and to whom a tract of land had been devised as above, claimed that upon the equalization of the lands, she should not be charged with the improvements on *her tract, because, as to the house, her husband, M. M. Tarrant, had bought it from her father in his life-time, and that she herself had put the other improvements on the place, after she went into possession, which was also during the life of her father, he having placed her in possession before his death. The Probate judge upon testimony found, as a fact, that M. M. Tarrant had bought the house from the deceased at the price of $500, for which he gave his note, which note went into the possession of the executors and was sold by them as part of the testator's estate. He also found as matter of fact, that the additional improvements had been put on the place by Mrs. Tarrant after her possession, and he directed that Mrs. Tarrant should have credit in the appraisement for $1.50 per acre for these improvements, including the house, which reduced her land to $6.50 per acre.

J. L. Covin, one of the devisees, had been indebted to his father in the sum of $500, by note dated before April, 1873. This note was barred by the statute of limitations in the life-time of the father, and had been destroyed by him. The Probate judge held, that the testimony before him was not sufficient to charge the said J. L. Covin with this note in the settlement.

From this decree an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, where the issues involved were heard by Judge Wallace, by agreement of parties, upon testimony taken and reported by the master, as well as that previously taken by the Probate judge, who, concurring with the Probate judge as to the matter of improvements claimed by Mrs. Tarrant, affirmed his rulings in that respect. He, however, differed in reference to the note of J. L. Covin, and finding, as matter of fact that this note had not been destroyed by the testator with the intent to forgive it, he decreed that Covin should account for it, ordering the case remanded to the Probate Court, to be carried out in accordance with his findings and rulings. The questions now before the court are the same as those raised below with the additional ground that the Probate Court had no jurisdiction over the question of the equalization of the lands, nor as to the accountability of J. L. Covin for his note of $500. The case as heard below involved questions of fact as well as of law, all of which are presented in this appeal. First, as matter of fact, had M. M.

Tarrant pur*chased the house which was on the land devised to his wife, and did she erect the other improvements on the place, after she went into possession and during the life of the father? Secondly, was the Circuit judge correct in finding that the note of J. L. Covin had not been destroyed by the testator with the intention of forgiving it. As to these findings we do not see that manifest error which alone would warrant us in overruling them; we cannot say that there is an absence of all testimony or that the evident weight of it is adverse. We must, therefore, regard the facts as found by the judge, to be established, and must declare the law applicable to such facts.

In leaving directions in his will that the land devised should be valued so that each devisee should be made equal, did the testator intend that his daughter should account for the house, which before his death he had sold to her husband, or for the other improvements which she had put upon it, after he had had it surveyed for her and had himself placed her in possession? It is true that he had not executed a deed to her, and therefore the title was still in him, but it is in evidence that he directed a survey to be made, upon the plat of which was indorsed by the surveyor, "That by the request of Louis Covin, he had surveyed and laid out for Mrs. Tarrant the twenty-four acres" upon which the improvements were placed. This survey was dated March, 1878, some three years after the date of the will. Under this survey Mrs. Tarrant went into possession, and was in possession at the death of her father. She had every reason to believe that the land had been given to her by her father, and especially that the improvements which, in his presence and by his acquiescence, if not by positive permission, she was putting on the place, would redound to her benefit. We think there is enough in the case to bring her claim under the principle of equity which allowed improvements in the cases of Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 368; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 476, and Johnson v. Harrelson, 18 S. C. 604, or at least that the executors are estopped by the conduct of the testator. Big. Estop. 480; Bollmann v. Bollmann, 6 S. C. 46; Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 370.

C. 216, seems con*clusive on the question of the note of J. L. Covin, so far as to exclude him from any participation in the residue of the estate, unless he accounts for his note, but he cannot thereby be debarred from getting the land devised to him. The will gives him title against everybody except creditors, and the note, even if it were not barred by the statute, could not be counter-claimed against the land. But his interest in the residue is in a different position. The will directs this residue to be sold, and the proceeds to be equally divided between the testator's wife and children. J. L. Covin's portion of these proceeds, after the sale, will be in the hands of the executors, his creditors, and they will have the right to apply it to the debt which he owes, which, although protected from suit by the statute, is yet not paid as found by the Circuit judge.

We do not see the force of the jurisdictional question raised. The matter of equalizing the lands devised is embraced in the will. The executors are before the Probate Court seeking a settlement and a discharge from their trust. The Probate Court has jurisdiction in matters testamentary. The settlement which is sought must be made in accordance with the provisions of the will. This is certainly testamentary. The executors cannot be discharged until they make a settlement such as the will demands. This involves the judgment of the Probate Court as to the terms of settlement, and the rights of the parties, subject to appeal, of course, to the Circuit Court.

This objection cannot avail, nor can the other, that the Probate Court has no jurisdiction of the note of J. L. Covin. The most of the positions taken by appellant's counsel on that subject are no doubt correct, to wit: That J. L. Covin is not liable to account to a legatee, nor to creditors of the estate, nor could the executors sue him in the Probate Court on his note. But neither of these principles are involved here. There is no attempt to enforce payment of his note by either legatee, creditor or the executors. The question on the contrary is, whether the executors shall be required to pay over to him certain interests which, under the will of his father, he seems to be entitled to. He is a devisee and legatee under this will and the estate cannot be settled without determining his interests, as well as that of all *the other parties, and in defining and adjudging his interests all the facts connected therewith must be considered. The executors are seeking no judgment on the note against him, but they are seeking a decree as to the conditions upon which they shall pay over to him such interest as he may have in their hands.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified in so far that the devise of the tract of land to J. L. Covin shall not be affected by his unpaid note to the estate. In all other respects it is affirmed. Let the case be remitted to the Probate Court to be carried out as herein announced.

Before Hudson, J., Newberry, November, 1883.

This was an action by William T. Huff against William Watkins, commenced May 16th, 1879. The complaint alleges that, about January 1st, 1879, the plaintiff employed one Jordan Butler to serve him as an agricultural laborer for and during that year, and that he did so serve the plaintiff for about the period of two months, receiving advances in the meanwhile from the plaintiff; that about March 1st the said Jordan Butler, secretly and without cause, left the employ of the said plaintiff and hired to the defendant; that the plaintiff at once gave notice, by public advertisement and to the defendant personally, that the services of Jordan Butler were due to the plaintiff for said year, and required the defendant to discharge him from his employ; that the defendant failed to discharge the said Jordan Butler, and still *continued to employ him, to the plaintiff's damage of $1,000, and demands judgment for $1,000 and the costs and disbursements of this action. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

March 8th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to recover damages for enticing a servant employed by the plaintiff to leave his employment. The case has been in this court twice before. See 15 S. C. 83 [40 Am. Rep. 680], and 18 Id. 510. At the last hearing here, the verdict for defendant was set aside and the case sent back for a new trial, but before it was heard on Circuit for the third time, the defendant died, (October, 1883,) leaving a will, of which James F. Watkins became the qualified executor. At the next term (November) of the court the plaintiff moved to substitute the executor as defendant, and to continue the action against him under section 142 of the code. The Circuit judge held, that the cause of action, being the wrongful act of defendant, in hiring and retaining in his employment a servant of the plaintiff, is not such as survives against the personal representative of the defendant, and refused the motion. He "ordered that the cause be stricken from the calendars of this court, each party paying his own costs in this court, and nothing herein shall, in any manner, prevent the clerk of this court from taxing the costs on the two judgments heretofore rendered in the Supreme Court, granting new trials to the plaintiff—the clerk in so doing to be governed by the rule of court and the law regulating costs on appeal to the Supreme Court."

From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the ground that "the judge erred in refusing the plaintiff's motion *to continue the action against the executor of the defendant, and in granting the order abating the action." The parties, also by agreement, submitted for the judgment of the court thereon, the following questions of law: "1. Whether the plaintiff herein, having prevailed in his two appeals heretofore to the Supreme Court, and on each appeal obtained an order for a new trial, is entitled to costs against the estate of the defendant. 2. Whether, under rule 40 of the Circuit Court, the clerk of that court is now authorized to record the judgments of the Supreme Court herein, and enter abstracts thereof against the defendant, and thereunder to adjust the costs and disbursements in the Supreme Court—the defendant having died since the remittiturs were filed below. 3. And, if so, whether the clerk is authorized to do so before final judgment below, in case this court should reverse the order herein appealed from."

In reference to the questions of law submitted for the judgment of the court, it is only necessary to say that the matter of costs, either for services in this court or the Circuit Court, are not within our original jurisdiction. We have no right to adjudge anything upon the subject until it has been heard by the proper tribunal below and comes here on appeal, by way of correcting some alleged error of law. Any decision we might make could be nothing more than the opinion of three lawyers, and without the force of law.

As to what actions survive against the executor of one deceased, our law has not been changed by the late revision of the statutes. Section 2187 simply re-enacts the old statute of 4 Edward III., c. 7, as to the right of executors to bring actions against trespassers upon the property of their testators in certain cases; and section 123 of the code provides as follows: "If a person against whom an action may be brought, die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his executors or administrators," &c. So that the question is still left open, as to what actions survive against the representatives of one deceased.

Without going into the learning upon the subject, and citing the array of authorities, which are not always in accord, we do *not know that the rule is better stated anywhere than by Judge Munro in Chaplin v. Barrett, Adm'r, 12 Rich. 284 [75 Am. Dec. 731], where, citing from 1 Chit. Pl. 68, he says: "We have seen that the right of action for the breach of a contract, upon the death of either party, in general survives to or against the executor or administrator of each; but in the case of torts, where the action must be in form ex delicto for the recovery of damages, and the plea is not guilty, the rule at common law was otherwise, it being a maxim that actio personalis moritur cum persona, and we shall find that the statute 4 Edward III., c. 7, has altered this rule only in its relations to personal property, and in favor of the personal representative; but if the action can be framed in form ex contractu, the rule does not apply."

Then the important inquiry is, whether this action was for a breach of contract or for a tort, where the action must be in form ex delicto. The old forms of the different actions have been abolished, and there is now only one general form, so that the mere form throws very little light upon the subject. But it is not the form of action but the substance which furnishes the test of survivorship. Although the forms of action have been changed, the causes of action remain the same as formerly, and we agree with the Circuit judge, that the cause of action here was not ex contractu, but for damages on account of an alleged wrongful act of the testator, Watkins, in his life-time, like the old action on the case.

But it is urged that the old rule of the common law, as announced above, was found to be harsh and unjust, and, as a consequence, it was gradually relaxed until the doctrine was finally established, "That in all cases where the deceased actually had the property of the other party, so as to derive a benefit therefrom, so that a promise to pay therefor could be presumed or implied, while an action for tort could not be maintained, yet the tort could be waived and assumpsit maintained for the value of the property." 2 Add. Torts 539 and note. Accepting this to be the rule, it might be enough to say that this action, now proposed to be revived against the executor of Watkins, was brought against the testator in his life-time, not assumpsit on any supposed promise, express or implied, but clearly ex delicto for a *wrong done. The action has already taken form, and we have no authority to change its whole nature in order to revive it against the executor. Upon the face of the record itself the cause of action arose ex delicto, and, as it seems to us, was buried with the offender.

But if we had the power to change the form, as was said by Judge O'Neall in Chalk v. McAlily, 10 Rich. 94, "We do not see how the defendant's injury could by any ingenuity be turned into a contract." Among the numerous cases upon the subject, we have not been able to find one that decides the identical point as to an action on the case for harboring a servant. But we think that case falls within the principle upon which some of them proceed. Thus it has been held, that case for diverting a watercourse to the injury of another, dies with the person. Holmes v. Moore, 5 Pick. 257. Also an action for mesne profits while the testator was wrongfully in possession. Harker v. Whitaker, 5 Watts 474, and authorities in note to 2 Add. Torts 541.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Greenville, July, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

*Messrs. Perry & Perry, for appellant.

Defendant is estopped from denying plaintiff's right to recover. 13 S. C. 370; 6 Wait Ac. & Def. 681, 685. Plaintiff's lien followed the proceeds of the property sold. 3 McCord 484. The case of Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 552, does not apply to a case like this, where there was a different lien, enforceable in a different way, viz., by distress. But, under section 1824 of the general statutes, defendant had no right to levy or sell without paying one year's rent. 3 McCord 38, 378; 12 Rich. 349; 1 Treadw. Con. R. 120.

Messrs. Wait & Westmoreland, contra.

The facts here do not constitute an estoppel. Big. Estop. 431, 437, 438; 17 S. C. 7. If defendant promised to pay plaintiff, such promise would be void because not in writing. Acceptance of a note for rent after the year was half gone, was a waiver of the statutory lien. In 18 S. C. 179, the contract for rent was verbal. But if not waived, the lien did not follow the proceeds of sale. 15

S. C. 552; 14 Id. 35; 1 Bailey 237. Defendant is sued in his official capacity, and there is no evidence of any violation of official duty. The proper remedy would have been a rule issued by the Circuit Court. This case does not come under any of the subdivisions of section 71 of the code, and therefore the trial justice was without jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Irvine Davenport leased land from Hewlet Sullivan for the year 1882, for which he gave an obligation, of which the following is a copy:

"$80. On or by the 1st day of November next, I promise to pay H. Sullivan, or order, eighty dollars, the same being for the rent of the place I now live on; and I further promise and agree to take good care of the premises and houses, &c., and return the same to said Sullivan at the end of this year. This 21st August, 1882.

"Witness my hand and seal.

(Signed,) "Irvine Davenport. [L. S.]

"Test—Charles D. Smith."

*Part of the rent was paid, leaving due $23. Some time in the fall of the year, Davenport, the tenant, absconded, and it seems that David Ellison, a constable, levied sundry executions in his hands upon the property left on the place, viz., corn, shucks, cotton-seed, bee-gums, farming tools, a cow, &c. After the levy, but before the property was removed from the place or sold, Hewlet Sullivan, the landlord—taking with him a trial justice, F. M. Davenport, Esq.—went on the place, as the trial justice states, "for the purpose of issuing an attachment or rent warrant, or something of the kind, to take charge of the property," in order to secure the balance on the obligation for rent. Sullivan sent for Ellison, and gave him notice of his claim for rent, and he replied, "That is all right; let it stand; and when the property is sold, your claim will be first paid, as it is for rent." Upon this assurance, Sullivan forebore to seize the property under any process.

Afterwards, the property was sold by the constable, but he refused to pay the balance of his rent to the plaintiff, who then brought this action against him before trial justice J. M. Cureton; and he gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $23. The defendant appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, and Judge Witherspoon reversed the judgment. From his judgment, the plaintiff appeals to this court, upon the following grounds: "1. Because the defendant, having induced the plaintiff to forbear enforcing his landlord's lien by the promises made to him, is estopped from denying his liability in this action. 2. Because the plaintiff had a lien upon the specified property levied upon by the defendant, which followed the proceeds of the sale of said property into the hands of the defendant, and made him liable in this action. 3. Because the defendant, as constable, had no right to take the corn by virtue of any execution, unless the party at whose suit said execution was sued out had paid to the plaintiff in this action the rent then due him as landlord, and was therefore liable to the plaintiff in this action."

It does not appear precisely when the levy was made, but as there was no allegation that the rent was not due, we suppose it was after November 1st, 1882. There is nothing in the objection that the plaintiff, Sullivan, is not entitled to the rights of a land*lord, for the reason that he had taken a sealed note for the rent. Rent is usually, as we think, secured by writing, and what is here called a sealed note, is substantially a lease of a certain tract of land, and at the same time securing the rent therefor. See Fife v. Irving, 1 Rich. 226; Fiske v. Judge & Dennis, 2 Speers 436 [42 Am. Dec. 382]; Bailey v. Wright, 3 McCord 484.

The plaintiff, as landlord, clearly had an agricultural lien on one-third of the crop made on the premises leased, (16 Stat. 411; Carter v. DuPre, 18 S. C. 182,) but such a lien can only be enforced according to the machinery provided by the statute itself, viz., through a warrant issued by a clerk of the court against the crop itself in specie, and not against the proceeds of the crop. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 550. It appears that the plaintiff, misled by the assurances of the defendant that the rent claimed should be first paid, pretermitted his right to have the crop itself seized before it was sold; and it is now insisted that he cannot enforce that lien against the money, the proceeds of sale. This may be so, and in this, the defendant certainly misled the plaintiff to his injury. But from the view which the court takes, it will not be necessary to consider the question whether the constable is personally liable and estopped from making a defense. He is a mere stakeholder and possibly was required by the creditors, in whose behalf he levied the property, to make the defense for their benefit. If recovery is had, it must be paid out of the money officially in the hands of the constable, and, therefore, we will regard the defense as actually made by the judgment-creditors.

Assuming, then, that he was deceived into an inactivity which practically lost him the benefit of his agricultural lien, we think that the plaintiff, as landlord, had another right entirely distinct from his agricultural lien on a part of the crops made on the leased premises. A landlord had the right to distrain for rent in arrear under our law, as it existed down to 1868, when distress for non-payment of rent was abolished. 14 Stat.

106. In 1878 the law was restored as it formerly existed, with the single exception that no property could be taken except such as belonged to the tenant in his own right. 16

Stat. 511; Mobley v. Dent, *10 S. C. 472. At any time after November 1st, the landlord had the right to distrain any property of the tenant on the place, whether it was, or was not, a part of the crop made there. But when he reached the premises he found that the property had been levied under executions in the hands of Ellison, the constable; it was then in custodia legis, and his duty was, not to proceed to seize the property, thereby creating a conflict of authority, but to give notice of his claim, which he did, under section 1824 of the general statutes, which provides as follows: "No goods or chattels whatsoever, lying or being in or upon any messuage, lands or tenements which are or shall be leased * * * shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any execution or any pretense whatsoever, unless the party at whose suit the said execution is sued out shall, before the removal of such goods from off the said premises, by virtue of such execution or extent, pay to the landlord of the said premises, or his bailiff, all such sum or sums of money as are or shall be due for rent for the said premises at the time of the taking of such goods or chattels by virtue of such execution; provided the said arrears of rent do not amount to more than one year's rent," &c.

The plaintiff having given notice of his claim for rent, the duty of Ellison, the constable, was, in accordance with his declarations and promises made before the property was sold, to retain out of the proceeds of sale so much as was necessary to pay to the plaintiff first the balance due him for rent of that year. Hamilton v. Reedy, 3 McCord 39. See the Matter of F. W. Connor, Landlord, 12 Rich. 350. The constable violated his duty, damaging the plaintiff to the extent of the balance of rent, $23, and Trial Justice Cureton was right in giving judgment against him for that amount.

It is insisted that the trial justice had no jurisdiction in the matter. It was "an action for damages for injury to rights pertaining to personal property." See Paragraph 2, Section 71 of the Code.

It is said the plaintiff should have applied to the Circuit Court for a rule on the respondent. Perhaps he might have done so, but he had no status in that court, and we do not see why he *could not sue the constable for an injury done him, as was done in the similar case of Margart v. Swift, 3 McCord 379.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside and that of the trial justice affirmed.

GRIFFIN v. GRIFFIN.

[1. Insane Persons ⟸92.]

Action by the committee of a lunatic to recover money of the lunatic erroneously paid to defendant by the county commissioners, is an action at law, and the Circuit judge committed no error in overruling a demurrer to the complaint, and in permitting plaintiff to amend by making the lunatic a party, giving defendant leave to answer thereto. And to such action, the county commissioners were not necessary parties.

The Circuit judge, while hearing a case on exceptions to the report of a referee, to whom it had been referred to hear and determine the issues and report to the court, called for the production of a paper which had not been put in evidence, and based his decree upon a fact therein stated. Held, that in this there was error. The case should have been decided upon the report and exceptions, or else recommitted for further testimony.

[This case is also cited in Jefferies v. Allen, 34 S. C. 191, 13 S. E. 365, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Hudson, J., and Pressley, J., Spartanburg, April, 1881, and March, 1882.

This was an action, which came up on appeal under the title of Elizabeth A. Griffin, by her committee, William L. Morgan, against John H. Griffin. The action was commenced September 8th, 1878. It was referred March 29th, 1879, to a referee to "take testimony and decide all the issues of law and fact arising herein, and that he do report the same to this court." The report of the referee, sustaining the demurrer, was overruled by Judge Hudson, who referred the cause back to the same referee "for trial of issues of law and fact, with directions to report to this court his findings and conclusions." The second report of the referee was made on March 8th, 1882. In other particulars, the opinion states the case.

*Messrs. Duncan, Cleveland & Sanders and J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Evins, Bomar & Simpson and Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Elizabeth A. Griffin, a declared lunatic, living with her nephew, John H. Griffin, had a small sum of money in the hands of the commissioners of the county of Spartanburg. The said John H. Griffin instituted some proceedings in the Probate Court, by which he, representing that his aunt had recovered her mind, got possession of the money as her agent and next friend. He afterwards made an application to be appointed her committee, alleging that she had relapsed, but the Judge of Probate, declining his application, appointed the plaintiff, W. L. Morgan, who commenced this action in his own name as committee against Griffin for the said fund. The case was referred to C. P. Wofford, Esq., "as special referee to take testimony and decide all the issues of law and fact, and report the same to the court."

The defendant demurred upon two grounds: first, that the county commissioners were necessary parties, and, second, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The referee sustained the demurrer and gave judgment for the defendant, but, exceptions being taken. Judge Hudson reversed the judgment, and overruled the demurrer, but providing, "as the defendant may have expended justly a part of said fund in support of the lunatic, he must be allowed credit for all such expenditures, bona fide made, and to this end he is allowed to answer over," &c. He also gave the plaintiff leave to amend his complaint by joining the lunatic, Elizabeth A. Griffin, as party plaintiff with himself, and directed that after the pleadings were perfected, the cause should be remanded to the same referee "for the trial of issues of law and fact."

Accordingly, the case as amended went back to the referee under the aforesaid order of reference, who took all the testimony that was offered and reported that, as a matter of fact, he found "that the support furnished by the defendant exceeds in value *any sum with which he is chargeable, and, as matter of law, that the complaint should be dismissed with costs." Exceptions were filed, which came on to be heard by Judge Pressley, who reports as follows: "In the progress of the case, it transpired that defendant had been the actor in the Probate Court when the plaintiff was appointed committee of the lunatic, and I required production of defendant's petition, that I might see what statement he therein made concerning the estate of the lunatic. Defendant's counsel objected, because the same was not in evidence. I ruled, that a chancellor trying a case could, during the trial, call for and put in evidence any paper pertaining to the matter, and to this exception was taken. It appears, by such petition, that the defendant therein set forth the estate of the lunatic as amounting to $400. I regarded that as an express waiver of so much of his charges for maintenance as would reduce said estate below that amount, and gave judgment for that sum."

From this judgment, and that also of Judge Hudson, the defendant appeals to this court, and moves to reverse them upon the following alleged errors: I. In sustaining plaintiff's exceptions to the first report of the referee. II. In overruling first report of referee. III. In not allowing defendant to answer over fully when the demurrer was overruled. IV. In overruling the demurrer and giving judgment absolute against the defendant, and at the same time allowing plaintiff to amend his complaint. V. In not holding that the defendant in the second reference had the right to answer over fully. VI. In that, while the case was being heard on exceptions to the second report of the referee, his Honor, of his own motion, and against the objection of defendant, put in further evidence to sustain the claim of plaintiff. VII. In holding that the petition so put in evidence amounted to an express waiver of so much of plaintiff's (defendant's) charges for maintenance as would reduce said estate below that amount. VIII. In overruling the second report of the referee. IX. In giving judgment against the defendant for $400 and costs. X. In not dismissing the complaint. XI. In not giving credit to the defendant for the maintenance and support of the *said lunatic after the date of said petition, and of sums paid out for her benefit after said date," &c.

It seems to us that the action was at law as for money had and received—money in the hands of Griffin, which, ex equo et bono, belonged to the plaintiff. Buchanan v. Buchanan, 4 Strobh. 68. We have no doubt it was in this view that Judge Hudson gave permission to amend the complaint by making the lunatic, Elizabeth A. Griffin, a party plaintiff (see Cathcart v. Sugenheimer, 18 S. C. 128). The judge did not render judgment absolute against defendant, but gave him further time to answer the complaint in the amended form, and he was therefore in no way injured. Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C. 491.

Nor do we think it was error to overrule the demurrer. That only decided that there was enough to sustain the action for money received and due, the possession of which was obtained by the defendant expressly as the property of the plaintiff and for her use and benefit. We cannot see why it was necessary to make the county commissioners parties. It is true they once had control of the money, but they had paid it to defendant, in accordance with a judgment of the Court of Probate, obtained through the representation of the said defendant, and which, so far as they knew, was free from fraud and was legal and binding.

But the case must go back, and it would therefore be injudicious to consider the merits at this time. We think it was error in the Circuit judge, whilst hearing exceptions to the report of the referee, appointed to decide the issue, to call for the production of a paper which had not been in evidence before the referee, and to base upon it his judgment in the case. While, as a general rule, the sound theory of judicial action, based upon experience and reason, requires that the judge shall remain passive until moved in the right of those interested, we may say that we agree with the Circuit judge "that a chancellor trying a case may, during the trial, call for and put in evidence any paper pertaining to the matter." But it is not so certain that in the instance before us the chancellor was, in the full sense of the words, "trying a case" upon the proofs offered before him, but rather hearing exceptions to the decision of a referee already made. We do not think the cases are precisely the same.

*The code contemplates and provides for three distinct modes of trial—by a jury, by the court and by referees. The case had been heard and decided by the referee, who had made his report; that report was being considered on exceptions, and it should have been heard upon the evidence alone which the parties offered before the referee; or, if that was considered perfunctory or imperfect, the case should have been recommitted to the referee with instructions to take further testimony, subject, of course, to rebuttal, cross-examination, exceptions, &c. Under the New York code, the decision of a referee to decide the issues was not subject to review at all by the Circuit Court who appointed him, but, subject to certain rights of appeal, stood as the judgment of the court. The provision was: "The report of a referee upon the whole issue shall stand as the decision of the court, and judgment may be entered thereon in the same manner as if the action had been tried by the court." Wait Anno. Code, p. 487.

Our code was taken from that of New York, and contained the same declaration as to the force and effect of the decision of a referee to decide issues until the late revision (1882), when the aforesaid provision was omitted, and our code now simply declares, "that the decision of a referee or master may be excepted to and reviewed in like manner and with like effect in all respects as in cases of appeal under section 290. * * * Where the case shall have been decided upon the report of the referee and exceptions, the decision may be reviewed upon appeal to the Supreme Court." Code, § 294. We suppose that the effect of this alteration must be to change the character of a referee from being, as it were, an independent tribunal to that of an adjunct to the Court of Common Pleas, which appoints him and retains the right of receiving and reviewing his report before it can be considered a judgment, or, by appeal, reach the Supreme Court.

But, assuming that such must be the effect of the changes in the code, still, as it seems to us, a referee or master under the code (for its provisions are made to apply as well to masters in counties where they take the place of referees) must be something more than a commissioner in equity or master under the old practice in equity; and it is important to keep the different kinds of trial separate and distinct. In reference to the old *master in chancery, it was the practice to hear his report alone upon the evidence offered before him, and to recommit rather than produce confusion by supplementing further proof in open court. "At the hearing of a report the practice is, that the court hears no evidence but what was before the master and reported by him as evidence upon which his report is founded." Bank v. Rose, 1 Strobh. Eq. 257.

And such has certainly been the practice in regard to reports of referees under the code. It is said in the case of The State v. S. & U. Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 170: "We are obliged to accept the testimony as reported by the referees. Although some exceptions were taken to its omission of certain facts, averred to have been proved, and to error in the report of some of them, we have nothing before us by which it can be corrected. The proper course for the appellants was to have moved the Circuit Court to recommit the report on the exceptions thus taken, that they might have the opportunity of showing wherein they were prejudiced by its statement of the evidence. No such application was made, and we are not at liberty to go outside of the report." In the case before us the appellant had no complaint to make of the report, which was in his favor, and if the respondent wished the use of testimony not embraced in the report, it devolved upon him to make the motion to recommit.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment below be set aside, without prejudice, and the cause remanded to the Circuit for such orders as may be necessary to give effect to the conclusions herein announced.

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, July, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Messrs. Evins, Bomar & Simpson, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These cases were heard together. They were proceedings supplementary to execution against one C. L. Casey. The cases were referred to J. K. Jennings, Esq., as special referee, before whom Casey was ordered to answer concerning his property. He did so answer, and the referee reported the following state of facts:

The said Casey was administrator de bonis non of the estate of one James Rhodes, deceased, and upon final settlement of the estate in the office of the Probate Court (1875), the Judge of Probate decreed against him certain sums, in favor of the distributees, as follows: To James Rhodes, $109.20; to William Rhodes, $109.20; to Nancy Rhodes, $109.20; to B. F. Rhodes, $164.02; to Montgomery Rhodes, $164.02; to Sarah Rhodes, $164.02; to Jane Casey and J. R. Casey, $111.91; to the estate of Nancy Casey, $141.12; and gave to said distributees, respectively, leave to issue execution for the same against the said administrator, C. L. Casey. In the settlement, the Judge of Probate charged the administrator with certain good debts due the intestate, and, to his relief, directed the distributees to take said debts in part payment of said judgments in their favor. Among these notes was one on A. C. Sherbert and James Nesbitt for $187.94. On August 3d, 1876, after the aforesaid settlement and judgments against Casey, the administrator, he recovered judgment upon the Nesbitt note against the executor, L. Twitty, for $192, besides interest and costs; and this is the judgment *which is the matter of contention. Casey, the administrator, is insolvent, and one of the sureties upon his administration bond (Tolleson) has been discharged in bankruptcy.

Under these circumstances, two of the distributees, in whose favor judgments were rendered in the Court of Probate, viz.: J. M. Rhodes and Sarah Rhodes, had their executions against him returned "unsatisfied," and commenced these supplementary proceedings to have the said judgment standing in Casey's favor against Twitty, executor, paid to them, in satisfaction pro tanto of their judgments against Casey. The referee reported in favor of the plaintiffs, that they are entitled to an order directing Twitty to pay to them the judgment in favor of Casey, their debtor. Upon exceptions, Judge Wallace sustained the report; and from his judgment Casey appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: Because it is most respectfully submitted the Circuit judge erred: 1. In not sustaining the exceptions of appellant to the report of the referee. 2. In passing a final order in the case, after it had been docketed for a hearing. 3. In ordering appellant to pay to respondents money which has never been in his hands, and which, if paid to appellant, would be held by him in a fiduciary capacity. 4. In ordering respondent (appellant) to pay money in his hands as administrator, which he has never refused to apply in due course of administration. 5. In granting the order herein under the facts and circumstances of the case. 6. In refusing to dismiss the proceedings.

If the judgments of plaintiffs had been rendered against Casey individually, and not as administrator, and his judgment against Twitty, executor, had also been recovered by him in his own name, and not as administrator, there could not possibly be the least doubt of the propriety of the order, under section 317 of the code, part of the chapter concerning "proceedings supplementary to the execution," which provides that "the judge may order any property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in the hands of either himself or of any other person, or due to the judgment debtor, to be applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment," &c. But it is contended, in the first place, that the judgments of plaintiffs were not recovered against Casey individually, but as administrator of the estate of Rhodes, and, *therefore, their tenor should be payable de bonis testatoris, and not de bonis propriis. We think this is error. A judgment recovered against an administrator, on final settlement of the estate of his intestate, is a judgment against him individually. The words "as administrator" only indicate the matter out of which the judgment arose and are merely "descriptio personæ." Ford v. Administrators of Rouse, Rice 222; De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C. 470. In the case from Rice, Judge O'Neall, after referring to the different modes of establishing a devastavit, says: "The only other mode of reaching him (an administrator) personally, is by an account before the ordinary or in equity, preparatory to a suit on his bond."

It is also contended that the judgment against Twitty, executor, is due to Casey in his fiduciary character of administrator, and therefore does not come within the provision of the code above cited; that the judgment is not really "the property of Casey, the debtor," but of the estate of his intestate, Rhodes. This may be so in appearance, but it is not so in reality. As the note originally belonged to the estate, Casey sued and recovered upon it as administrator, but he was charged with it in the final settlement, and it became absolutely his own property, subject to a strong equity that it should be paid to the distributees of the estate, whose judgments, at least in part, were based upon it.

The matter of greatest difficulty in the case, is, to whom should the proceeds of the judgment be paid—to all the distributees on their shares pro rata, or only to the two who instituted the proceedings; and we suppose that must depend somewhat upon the manner in which the executions were issued. We are not informed whether they were issued separately, or following the decree, collectively in one process; but we incline to think that the judgments and executions may properly be regarded as separate, and the proceeds should go to those whose vigilance made the discovery and whose activity instituted the proceedings. At all events the appellant has no interest in that question.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*ACKER v. COUNTY OF ANDERSON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Bridges ⇐41.]

A county is not responsible for injuries to a mule and buggy, caused by the mule taking fright at a placard placed on a public bridge without the knowledge of the county commissioners, and removed by them so soon as it was brought to their attention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bridges, Cent. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. ⇐41.]

[2. Bridges ⇐41.]

Doubted, whether the county could have been held liable, even if the commissioners had allowed the placard to be posted, as, under the statute, action is given against the county for injuries only "through a defect in the repair of a highway, causeway or bridge."

Before Aldrich, J., Anderson, February, 1882.

Action by Joshua Acker against the county of Anderson. The charge to the jury was as follows:

The legislation on which the plaintiff relies to support his action is good law. It makes the taxpayers mutual insurers for the protection of persons and property. This is right. If injury is done to the citizen by the carelessness, negligence or ignorance of its officers, whom the people have elected to perform the duties required by law, the whole body of the people who elected him should be held responsible for his acts.

The first question you will have to consider is, Was this sign or advertisement a public inconvenience, and did the county commissioners know not only of its existence but of its tendency to frighten horses and mules passing on the bridge? Second. Did they have it removed as soon as it came to their knowledge? The commissioners are bound by law to keep the bridge in repair. Was it safe?

There is a feature in this case you are bound to consider before *you make the county liable: Did the plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to this accident? Would a prudent man have driven his mule across the bridge, with two ladies in his buggy, with the sign staring him in the face? If you conclude that this plaintiff contributed by his own negligence to the accident, he cannot recover. Would a man of ordinary prudence have driven, or led, across the bridge, as Mr. Brazeale said he did?

You will bear in mind that the commissioners cannot keep a guard at each bridge to prevent ingenious persons from painting their signs and placards on the bridges spanning the streams of the county. They are not insurers against accident. Their duty is to keep the highways and bridges in repair so as to facilitate travel and commerce. If the bridge was in good repair, and the placard not sufficient to frighten good work animals in harness, the county has done all it was required to do. Bridges are not to be constructed so as to make them safe against vicious, fractious and obstinate horses and mules, but to secure safe travel for well-broken animals. If you conclude this "force-pump" placard was a nuisance well calculated to scare horses; that it was not removed when the county commissioners had it brought to their notice, and that the plaintiff did not by his own negligence and imprudence contribute to the accident, then you will determine what damage he has sustained and render your verdict accordingly.

As to all other matters, the opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. C. C. Featherston, for appellant.
Mr. B. F. Whitner, contra.

March 8th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action against the county of Anderson for damages to the plaintiff, in attempting to cross a public bridge over Rocky river, in said county. It seems that, in October, 1881, the plaintiff, with his daughter and granddaughter, in a buggy, was crossing the bridge when the mule drawing the buggy shied at an advertisement of a "force-pump," in large black letters, posted on the bridge. The mule *backed the buggy towards the edge of the bridge and the plaintiff and his daughter managed to get out, but, striking the railing of the bridge, the railing gave away, and the mule and buggy, with the granddaughter, went over and fell eighteen or twenty feet. The buggy was broken to pieces, and the mule so crippled that he died in a day or two. The complaint charged that the injury was caused by the unlawful and negligent act of the officers of the county, in permitting the placard to be placed and to remain posted upon the bridge, and in negligently failing to repair the defects in the railing of the bridge—claiming damage to the extent of $300. The answer denied all the material allegations of the complaint.

The cause came on for trial, and under the charge of Judge Aldrich, the jury found a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because it was error for his Honor to comment upon the facts by saying, 'Would a prudent man have driven his mule across the bridge with two ladies in his buggy, with the sign staring him in the face? If you conclude that the plaintiff contributed by his own negligence to the accident he cannot recover. Would a man of ordinary prudence have driven or led across the bridge, as Mr. Brazeale did?' 2. That it was error in his Honor to charge the proposition of contributory negligence when it was not charged in the answer, nor argued, and when under such general denial of negligence, evidence of contributory negligence was not admissible. 3. That if his Honor had the right to charge, he ought to have charged the whole of the doctrine and not a part thereof, and it was error to charge 'That if you think the plaintiff acted imprudently in driving his buggy across the bridge, instead of leading his mule, then the doctrine of contributory negligence will apply,' without charging further that the negligence on the part of the plaintiff to prevent a recovery must have been the immediate cooperative cause of the injury complained of. 4. That it was error on the part of his Honor to refuse the motion for a new trial when there was no evidence of contributory negligence, and, in fact, no evidence to support the verdict."

*By the act of 1874, re-enacted in the general statutes as section 1087, it is provided that "Any person who shall receive bodily injury or damage in his person or property through a defect in the repair of a highway, causeway or bridge, may recover, in an action against the county, the amount of damages fixed by the finding of a jury," &c. This action was brought under this authority, and the only question was, whether the plaintiff's injury was received "through a defect in the repair" of Rocky river bridge. It appeared that the county commissioners had nothing to do with putting the placard on the bridge, which was placed there as a public place by some enterprising business man, intent on advertising the merits of the "force-pump," and that as soon as it was brought to their attention they had it taken down. If, therefore, any responsibility as to consequences arose out of the placard being on the bridge, it would seem not to attach to the county.

Even if the commissioners had allowed it to be placed there, it is more than doubtful whether the county could have been made liable. The only matter for which the act gives an action against the county is "a defect in the repair of a highway, causeway or bridge." If there was no defect in this bridge, there was no right of action against the county, and whether there was such a defect was a question of fact, which was submitted to the jury, upon what we must assume to have been a fair charge, as no complaint is made here on that point. The jury had to decide that there was a defect in the bridge before the question of contributory negligence could arise. It may be that they came to their conclusion on the main point, as to the alleged defect in the bridge; and, if so, the secondary question of contributory negligence had nothing whatever to do with the case.

But, as the jury may possibly have reached the question of contributory negligence, we will consider it. All the exceptions relate to this subject. The second is abandoned. The third insists that the judge should have charged the whole doctrine, but he omitted to tell the jury that negligence on the part of the plaintiff, to be considered contributory, must be the immediate and co-operative cause of the injury complained of. We *do not see how the omission complained of could affect the case, but it is enough to say there was no request to charge, and, so far as we can discover from the "Case," the alleged omission was in no way brought to the attention of the judge at the trial. In such case a mere omission to charge cannot be considered error. Sullivan v. Jones, 14 S. C. 565; Hogg v. Pinckney, 16 S. C. 387.

The first exception complains that the judge not only charged upon the subject of contributory negligence, but commented on the evidence, and, in doing so, exceeded his constitutional powers in saying, "Would a prudent man have driven his mule across the bridge with two ladies in his buggy, with that sign staring him in the face? Would a man of ordinary prudence have driven or led, as Mr. Brazeale did?" In order to make his charge intelligible, it is necessary for a Circuit judge, in charging the jury, to make some reference to the facts of the case; but it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to define with precision the extent to which he may go. We do not see that the interrogatories of the judge in this case were stronger than those put by the judge in Lynn v. Thomson, 17 S. C. 137, in reference to which the chief justice said: "It is difficult to lay down an inflexible rule, by the application of which it can be determined in any case whether section 26, article IV. of the constitution, has been violated. A clear violation is where the judge decides a question of fact about which there is dispute, and so instructs the jury; but where there is no dispute as to the immediate fact testified to, and the question is as to the effect of such fact, it being susceptible of one or more inferences, we do not see that it would be an invasion of the province of the jury for the judge to point out to them the different conclusions which may be drawn, and the circumstances which might incline them to believe the one or the other, reserving his own opinion. We do not know, nor can we say, that the presiding judge in this case intended to do more than this by the question which he propounded to the jury," &c.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

This case came up on appeal upon the following exceptions to the Circuit decree:

1. "Because his Honor overruled the exceptions of P. F. Frazee, the respondent, to the master's report, and confirmed the said report.

2. "Because his Honor ruled, and erred in ruling, that this matter was a special proceeding, and not an action, and that no summons need be issued and served in said cause.

3. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the contract between Johnson and Frazee was complied with and fulfilled, when the preponderance of the testimony, in fact, all of it, except the plaintiff's, showed that the contract was not completed.

4. "Because his Honor held that this cause was a special proceeding, yet, in his judgment and decree, gives judgment against Phineas F. Frazee, the respondent, for any deficiency which may arise, with leave for execution to issue—this being the touchstone to ascertain and determine whether it be an action or special proceeding."

Other matters are stated in the opinion.

*Mr. John Bauskett, for appellant.

Mr. John T. Sloan, Jr., contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Two questions of law are presented in this appeal, to wit: 1st. Whether, in the enforcement of a mechanics' lien under the statute, the owner of the property may be brought into court by an order based upon the petition of the creditor, or is a summons necessary? 2d. Whether judgment may be given for the excess of the claim in the event that the property fails to pay the debt.

The sections of the statute applicable to this subject are found in general statutes, pages 669 and 670, sections 2356, 2359 and 2363. The first provides "that the lien may be enforced by petition to the Court of Common Pleas for the county where the building or structure is situated. The petition may be filed in term, or in the clerk's office in vacation, and the date of the filing shall be deemed the commencement of the suit." The second, that "the petition may be served with the summons or filed with the clerk, and shall be returned and entered as other civil actions." And the third, "that the court in which the petition is entered shall order notice to be given to the owner of the building or structure that he may appear and answer thereto at a certain day in the same term, or at the next term, by serving him with an attested copy of the petition, with the order of the court thereon, fourteen days, at least, before the time assigned for the hearing; and the court shall also order notice of the filing of the petition to be given to all creditors who have a lien of the same kind upon the same estate by serving them with a copy of the last-mentioned order in like manner."

The proceeding below was commenced by petition, upon the reading of which, and it appearing by the certificate of the clerk of the court for Richland county that said petition had been filed in his office, Judge Kershaw, in pursuance of the provisions of the last section of the act above, ordered that the appellant, Frazee, be served with a copy thereof, and also with a copy of *his order, and that he do appear and answer the same on November 14th, 1882, "provided the said court is in session, and, if not, then on the first day of the next term of the Court of Common Pleas to be holden for the county of Richland, on the Monday after the fourth Monday of March, 1883."

The defendant, Frazee, in obedience to this order, appeared and answered, submitting, with other defenses, that the action had been improperly brought, as no summons had been issued, and that the case should have been commenced by issuing a summons with the petition, and should have been returned and docketed by the clerk as any other civil case. The argument of the appellant is, that this proceeding is a civil action, and the mode of proceeding therein must be the same as in other civil actions under the code, except that the statement of the cause of action is presented by petition instead of by complaint. Whether the proceeding is to be styled a civil action or a special proceeding makes but little difference; whatever it may be, it is governed by the act which provides it, and not by the code. It is a statutory proceeding intended to enforce a specific statutory right, and it is apropriate only where that right is in question. Its character, nature and mode of procedure, therefore, depend upon the act which affords it. The sections of this act applicable to the question have been stated above.

No doubt, had section 2359 been followed, and, accordingly, had the petition been served with a summons instead of being filed in the clerk's office and an order of notice obtained, as was done in this case, the proceeding would have been valid and unobjectionable; but this mode is not imperative or exclusive; if so, section 2363 is a nullity. We can see no reason why section 2363 should apply only in cases where the proceeding is, in the first instance, against the contractor, and it becomes important to make the owner a party, as contended by appellant. There is certainly nothing in the language of the section which confines it to such cases, and there can be no reason peculiar to such a case why the owner should be brought in under a fourteen days' notice by order from the court then, and by a twenty days' summons in other cases when he is the only defendant. Section 2363 is explicit, that the court in which the petition is filed *should order notice to be given to the owner.

* * * This has been done in this case: the party has appeared and answered, and we see no legal necessity that a summons should have issued also.

We think there was error in so much of the judgment below as allowed the respondent to have execution for any deficiency that might exist after applying the proceeds of sale of the land. The extent of the remedy afforded by the act, is to enforce the lien upon the property covered. There is no provision for judgment for the excess, if any, to be rendered in the statutory proceeding provided. We do not feel authorized to disturb the findings of fact below. They are not without testimony. Exception one alleges no specific error, and is in conflict with rule V. of this court, and therefore cannot be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be modified so as to reverse so much thereof as allows execution to the appellant for any deficiency in his claim after the application of the proceeds of sale of the land. In all other respects the judgment below is affirmed.

Before Fraser, J., Chesterfield, May, 1883.

This was an action by Henrietta Burch against W. P. Brantley, Eliza J. Brantley, John H. Brantley and W. B. Hancock, commenced in May, 1881. Plaintiff claimed as a purchaser at *sheriff's sale on April 5th, 1880, under execution of Carhart & Bro. v. W. P. Brantley. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

The order overruling the demurrer was as follows:

The pleadings in this case having been read, the defendants interposed an oral demurrer, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The fact of a deed for the land in dispute, made by W. P. Brantley to W. B. Hancock, while stated with an "if," is certainly assumed in the complaint, and relief is demanded based on that fact. That deed can be assailed by the creditor for fraud only after a return of nulla bona, which has not been alleged. The purchaser at sheriff's sale, under the judgment and execution, can be in no better position, if, indeed, such a purchaser takes anything at such a sale, when the legal title before judgment has passed out of the debtor.

It is therefore ordered, that the complaint be dismissed with costs, without prejudice to any future proceeding the plaintiff may be advised to take in this matter.

Plaintiff appealed and asked for a reversal of this order, upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in dismissing the complaint.

2. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in holding that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

3. Because his Honor erred in holding that the complaint was in the nature of a creditor's bill, when it was a complaint by one not a creditor of any of the defendants, to recover possession of real estate purchased at sheriff's sale.

4. Because plaintiff had no control of the execution under which she purchased the land at sheriff's sale, as creditor of the defendant Brantley, or otherwise, and could not proceed in that capacity, and his Honor should have so held.

5. His Honor erred in holding that the plaintiff should have alleged a nulla bona return on the execution under which the land was sold, when sheriff had sold the land under said execu*tion as the land of W. P. Brantley, and plaintiff only claims under said deed.

6. Because his Honor erred in holding that plaintiff admitted that the legal title to said land was in W. B. Hancock, trustee, when complaint alleges that plaintiff has legal title to said land, and that the deed which defendants say was made to W. B. Hancock, if ever made, was null and void.

7. Because his Honor erred in holding that a purchaser at sheriff's sale, in an action to recover the real estate so purchased, could not attack a fraudulent deed made by judgment-debtor to third person, when said deed is set up in defendants' answer, without plaintiff alleges in the complaint that there has been a return of nulla bona upon the execution.

8. His Honor erred in holding that the plaintiff, a purchaser at sheriff's sale, could not, in the same complaint, ask for the possession of the land so purchased, and that a fraudulent deed from the judgment-debtor to a third person, in trust for the wife of said debtor, be declared void.

9. His Honor erred in holding that a purchaser at sheriff's sale, for valuable consideration, without notice, is in no better position to attack a fraudulent deed made by judgment-debtor than is the judgment-creditor.

Messrs. Caston & McIver and E. J. Kennedy, for appellant.

1. The paramount question in this case seems to be, Can the plaintiff, a purchaser at sheriff's sale, without notice, in an action to recover the land so purchased, ask that a conveyance made by the judgment-creditor, just before judgment obtained, be set aside and declared to be null and void under the Stat. 13 Eliz. (Gen. Stat. of 1872, 425)? Under the practice prior to the code there seems to be no doubt that this could be done. See 2 Bailey 324; 1 Hill 380; 9 Rich. 106; 14 Rich. 95. This is certainly the present practice as to personal property fraudulently disposed of. 17 S. C. 288, and cases there cited.

2. There seems to be no change made in the practice by the code. See 3 S. C. 577; 13 S. C. 379. The case of Verner v. Downs, 13 S. C. 449, is not in conflict with this position, for *that "action is in the nature of a creditor's bill," in which class of cases evidence of a nulla bona return must be had to entitle the plaintiff to demand the aid of a court of equity. This is not a creditor's bill, but an action by a purchaser at sheriff's sale to recover possession of land. So, also, is distinguished Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91. This has not been changed by the decision in the case of Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 526, which had reference only to the time from which the currency of the statute of limitations would begin.

3. The authorities first above cited, we conclude, sustain the proposition, that it is not necessary, in a case of this kind, to allege a nulla bona return. And we submit, that these cases are founded on sound reason. The sheriff could not make a return of nulla bona on the execution under which this land was sold, for the land was there, in the possession and use of the defendant Brantley, the sheriff had no notice of Hancock's claim, and nothing was in the way except a deed, of which neither sheriff, plaintiff nor execution-creditor had notice, and which the statute says is null and void, which means absolutely of no effect. Webs. Unab. Dict. Besides, the case of Suber v. Chandler, supra, certainly does not require nulla bona to be alleged; if anything, it only requires that it be shown.

4. Henrietta Burch, the plaintiff herein, being an innocent purchaser at sheriff's sale, without notice, is not affected by the equities existing between Carhart & Bro., the execution-creditors, and the defendant Brantley.

5. The plaintiff was certainly entitled to the interest of W. P. Brantley, and, even if there was a trust deed—if Brantley had reduced land to possession—he had a leviable interest in it. 11 S. C. 71.

Mr. C. P. Townsend, contra.

March 10th, 1874. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, appellant, brought the action below to recover a tract of land purchased at sheriff's sale, under execution against the defendant W. P. Brantley. The complaint alleged that defendants were in possession, as she was *informed and believed, under a deed from W. P. Brantley to W. Hancock, as trustee, for the use of Eliza Brantley, which deed she alleges was void, because made by the said W. P. Brantley for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, under the execution of one of whom she purchased, and she prayed that the land be surrendered, that the said deed to W. B. Hancock be declared null and void, and that she recover $1,000 damages for the detention. The answer of defendants admitted that they were in possession under the deed to Hancock, which they claimed to be a good and valid deed, of which plaintiff had notice when she purchased, and it denied the other allegations in the complaint.

Upon the call of the case for trial, the defendants interposed an oral demurrer: "That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action," which his Honor T. B. Fraser, presiding, sustained, on the ground that the deed to Hancock relied on by defendants, could not be assailed by a creditor for fraud until after a return of nulla bona, which was not alleged in the complaint, and that the purchaser at sheriff's sale, under judgment and execution, stood in no better position than the creditor.

The only legal question involved in the appeal is, whether the failure to allege a return of nulla bona in the complaint in this case, before the land in question was levied and sold, was fatal—leaving the facts insufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore obnoxious to the oral demurrer interposed. We know of no case in which it has been held that it is necessary to allege in the complaint a return of nulla bona before a creditor can assail a conveyance of his debtor for fraud. True, to vacate such conveyance, fraud must be alleged and proved, but a return of nulla bona constitutes no part of the fraud. It is only evidence thereof, which, with other facts, may show the fraud. It is one of the probative facts by which the fraud may be developed, but it is no part of the essence of the fraud, and, consequently, not necessary to be alleged. The allegation that the deed was founded in fraud, opens the door to the introduction of all testimony within the possession of the assailing party bearing upon that question, and such testimony may be adduced without any specific allega*tion of such facts. The charge of fraud renders admissible all testimony necessary to sustain it.

There is nothing, either in Verner v. Downs, 13 S. C. 449, or Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 526, in conflict with these views. In Verner v. Downs the court held, "that a judgment-creditor is not entitled to a decree adjudging a deed of conveyance, made by his debtor, to be fraudulent until there has been return of nulla bona to an execution issued upon the judgment," and there being no evidence in the case of such return, and the plaintiff not claiming that such evidence could be supplied, the complaint was dismissed. It does not appear that the allegation of a return of nulla bona was made in the complaint, nor was the complaint dismissed because of such omission; but, on the contrary, it was dismissed because there was no testimony to that fact at the trial; and, further, because there was no offer to supply the deficient testimony. The case evidently turned on deficiency of testimony at the trial, and not deficiency of allegations in the complaint.

Neither did the case of Suber v. Chandler, rule anything as to the necessity of alleging a return of nulla bona in the complaint. The court said in that case: "That if, at the time of the execution of the deed, a wrong was intended, the fraud is positive and active, and attaches to the act at that moment. If, however, no wrong was then intended, and the conveyance becomes injurious to creditors afterwards, because at some future time the grantor's property has failed to meet the just demands of his creditors, whose claims existed at the time of the deed, then a passive and legal fraud is developed, which, attaching to the deed, renders it void, not from the beginning, but at that moment. * * * Hence, it has been often held, that a creditor, before attempting to assail the conveyance of his debtor, must not simply be apparently unable to secure payment otherwise, but must absolutely fail to do so after exhausting all legal effort to that end, by judicially establishing his debt and having a return of nulla bona by the sheriff upon an execution issued thereon."

We think it was error to dismiss the complaint on the ground suggested. We do not understand that the Circuit judge held that a purchaser at sheriff's sale, in an action to recover the possession of a tract of land bought at such sale, could not assail *for fraud a conveyance of the judgment-debtor, executed before the sale by the debtor, and in the same proceeding ask judgment that said deed be set aside and vacated. The practice of contesting deeds of this character in this way is of old standing, and was frequently pursued under the former system. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bailey 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140]; Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter & Abney, 1 Hill 380; Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Rich. 106; Richardson v. Rhodus, 14 Rich. 95. And the door to such end has been opened still wider under the code.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, April, 1883.

Action by J. H. Sullivan & Co. against Hewlet Sullivan, commenced December 18th, 1880. Within the required time after the adjournment of the court at which the cause was tried, the defendant served upon the presiding judge and the plaintiffs' attorneys, the following notice: "Please take notice that the *defendant in the above action appeals from the order of his Honor, the presiding judge, refusing the motion for a new trial herein, and will renew said motion in the Supreme Court, upon the same grounds moved in said Circuit Court, to wit:" [Here follow the grounds of appeal stated in the opinion.] All other matters necessary to a full understanding of the case, appear in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Perry & Perry and J. H. Whitner, for appellant.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, respondents, brought the action below to recover possession of certain notes which they had deposited with defendant, appellant, as collateral security, and also damages for their detention. The complaint alleged that the debt of respondents to appellant, to secure which these notes had been deposited, had been paid, and that a return of said notes, upon demand, had been refused.

On the question of the payment of respondents' debt to appellant, testimony was received (appellant excepting) that appellant had agreed to take in part payment of said indebtedness a store account which respondents held against appellant, which if credited thereon with the other credits would extinguish the same. The judge was requested by defendant's attorney to charge the jury, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover in this action anything but the notes claimed, or, if they cannot be delivered, then the amount of said notes and interest. This he declined.

The jury found for the plaintiffs the notes described in the pleadings and $150 damages. The admission of the alleged incompetent testimony above referred to, with several other grounds, constitute the basis of the appeal. These grounds are as follows: "First. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that damages might be found for the plaintiffs for any inconvenience which they suffered by the detention of the *property (notes) by the defendant, the value of which was appreciable or could be estimated in money. Second. Because it appeared from the evidence of the plaintiffs that the notes sued for were as valuable as at the time of the alleged conversion, and would be returned if the verdict was for the plaintiffs, and, therefore, only nominal damages could be recovered. And, Third. Because the damages were excessive."

The charge of the judge is not set forth either in whole or in part in the brief, and the portion of it referred to in the grounds of appeal, and upon which the appellant bases the greater part of his argument, is not admitted by the respondents; on the contrary, the respondents' argument is addressed to the refusal to charge appellant's request above, which it sustains. Whatever may be the facts of the case, this court is confined to the record. Any other rule would lead to utmost confusion. It does not appear in the record that the judge charged as stated in the first ground of appeal, nor, if he thus charged, does it appear that any exception thereto was served as required by the rules of this court and the act of assembly on the subject of appeals. And, therefore, that ground in full is not fairly before us, except so far as it is involved in the request to charge.

This request denied the right of plaintiffs to recover in this action anything but the notes claimed, or if they could not be delivered, then the amount thereof and interest. The argument of appellant is founded upon section 298 of the code, which provides, "That when damages are recoverable, the plaintiff may recover, if he show himself entitled thereto, any rate of damages which he might have heretofore recovered for the same cause of action," and he contends that before the adoption of the code and under the old forms of action in cases like this, when notes or bills formed the subject of the action, which were solvent and bearing interest, the recovery of the notes with the costs of the action was the extent of plaintiffs' right, except where fraud, malice or special aggravation rendered vindictive or punitive damages proper; that in the absence of such elements last suggested, the plaintiff was confined to the direct pecuniary loss sustained, which, in mere money demands, includes nothing more than the interest and costs, such being the case under the former *practice. It is now urged that section 298 of the code remands such cases to the former practice and limits the recovery of damages, as did the law before the new procedure. This position in the main is no doubt correct. The code has made no material changes in the primary rights of parties, or in the causes of actions, nor has it given any new redress for wrongs perpetrated. It has only changed the mode by which such redress is reached and applied. The rights and remedies (using the term "remedy" in the sense of "redress") are still the same.

But is the other position of appellant correct, to wit: That under the former practice in cases like this, the plaintiff could recover nothing except the notes, or, if they could not be delivered, then their amount and interest; so much so, as to demand that the judge should have charged in this case that proposition as matter of law? The action below was an action for the recovery of personal property and damages for its detention. It was an action in the nature of the old action of trover. It will not be denied that in actions of that kind, under the former practice (as a general rule), damages for detention beyond the property itself could be and were uniformly recovered, such damages being measured by different rules, according to the character of the property and the circumstances of each case. See case of Murdock v. McDowell, 1 Nott & McCord 237 [9 Am. Dec. 684], where the court said: "It has lately been determined by this court in several cases, that a jury cannot give vindictive damages in an action of trover. The value of the property, with such damages as must necessarily be supposed to flow from the conversion, is the true measure. Such, for instance, as the work and labor of negroes; interest on the value of dead property." Buford v. Fannen, 1 Bay (2d edit.) 273 [1 Am. Dec. 615]; Harley v. Platts, 6 Rich. 318; Kid v. Mitchell, 1 Nott & McCord 338 [9 Am. Dec. 702].

It is said, however, that these cases involved property other than a money demand, property the possession and use of which was valuable to the defendant, and to that extent injurious to the plaintiff, and therefore it was proper to apply the value of such possession and use as the measure of damages for the detention, while in the case before the court the property being notes, of which no use could be made, the same measure could not be *applied; but, on the contrary, the same rule was the one required, to wit, a recovery of the notes, or their amount with interest. Admitting the principle as a general proposition, that in actions on money demands for the recovery of bills or notes, the evidence of money demands, the measure of damages for the detention in case the said notes cannot be delivered, is the interest, and that the verdict should be for the notes, or their amount and interest; yet this principle is not universal and inflexible: on the contrary, it is subject to that other general rule which is universal, and which applies to all cases sounding in damages, to wit, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for his direct pecuniary loss flowing from the wrong which he has suffered at the hands of the defendant.

Here there was some evidence that the notes had been diminished in value while in the hands of defendant. Upon one, the Harrison note, the defendant had received $30, and another on the Sullivan Manufacturing Co. was said to be worthless, because not presented and proved before the assignee. Under these circumstances it would have been error for the judge to have charged in the form requested, as one of the alternatives suggested, to wit, the recovery of the notes, would not have been the full measure of plaintiffs' right. He was entitled certainly, in addition to the notes, to the amount collected by the defendant on the Harrison note, and also to damages to the extent of the impaired value, if any, of the Sullivan Manufacturing Co. note, which might have been denied him under the request to charge, if that request had been complied with. We do not know the basis of the verdict. It may be that they found from the evidence that the notes, one or more, had been impaired in value below their face, while in the hands of the defendant and by his negligence. This was a question of fact, with which we have nothing to do. The verdict, while giving to the plaintiff the notes described in the pleadings, may have intended, by the amount of damages given, to put said notes back to the value when the defendant received them. In that view the verdict would be at least substantial justice between the parties, and the judgment should not be therefore hastily disturbed.

*As to the incompetent testimony on the allegation of payment, see Pom. Rem., § 701; Bank v. Sherman, 33 N. Y. 69. The other grounds involve questions of fact and need not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be affirmed.

20 S. C. 514

McCLENDON v. WELLS.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Attachment ⇐351.]

In an action ex contractu on an attachment bond, the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that if defendant was actuated by malice in obtaining the attachment with a view to injuring this plaintiff, they could give punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 1295; Dec. Dig. ⇐351.]

[2. Attachment ⇐349.]

And he further erred in instructing the jury that the plaintiff could in such action recover damages for a trespass in seizing and selling the property under a chattel mortgage, which defendant had purchased and thereunder seized the property attached at the instant of the dissolution of the attachment—no such cause of action being stated in the complaint.

[3. Chattel Mortgages ⟸296, 297, 300.]

Moreover, being mortgagee after condition broken, defendant committed no trespass in seizing the chattels, and the only remedy of the mortgagor was an action before sale to redeem, or after sale for accounting, and in either case the mortgagor would be required to pay the mortgage debt, and also all other indebtedness to the mortgagee. Reese v. Lyon, ante 17, approved.

[4. Chattel Mortgages ⟸162, 239; Tender ⟸[illegible].]

Tender by the mortgagor after condition broken and seizure would not revest title in the mortgagor; besides, a tender of the debt, but not of interest and expenses, was insufficient.

[5. Chattel Mortgages ⟸162.]

The mortgagee had the right, after condition broken, to take peaceable possession of the chattels, wherever found, or, having them then in his possession, to retain them.

For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 286–293; Dec. Dig. ⟸162.]

[6. Pleading ⟸382.]

A general denial in a reply does not permit plaintiff to prove an affirmative defense to the counter-claim. The case being remanded, permission was given to plaintiff by this court to amend his reply.

[8. Chattel Mortgages ⟸176.]

[After a rightful seizure of mortgaged chattels for breach of condition, the mortgagor's tender of the debt and costs will not entitle him to maintain an action for damages.]

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, September, 1883.

The exceptions and the opinion of this court constitute a full statement of the case. The former were as follows:

1. Because his Honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in *charging the jury that the defendant was bound to return the property taken under the attachment when said attachment was released, although the defendant, at the time of said release, was the owner of a chattel mortgage of said property with condition broken.

2. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could recover the value of the property taken under the attachment, when the property was not sold under the attachment but was sold by the defendant after the release of the attachment by virtue of a power vested before the said release, in him as assignee of a chattel mortgage with condition broken.

3. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could recover damages for the loss of the property resulting from a cause other than the attachment, when the allegations of the complaint did not extend to any source of injury outside of the attachment.

4. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could recover in this action the proceeds of the sale of the property sold by the defendant under a chattel mortgage with condition broken, on the ground that the plaintiff did not owe the full amount of the debt secured by said mortgage, when it appears that the plaintiff executed the said bond and mortgage to Moore, Quarles & Co., for a greater amount than was actually due for the purpose of defrauding his creditors.

5. Because his Honor erred in admitting as evidence a paper purporting to be a statement made by Moore, Quarles & Co. on the mortgage, when the statement did not refer to this particular mortgage, and when the defendant, the assignee, did not have the opportunity to cross-examine the maker of the statement, and when Quarles, one of the assignors of said bond and mortgage, was dead.

6. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could recover on the bond, when the execution and delivery of the bond upon which the action was brought was not proved by any evidence whatsoever.

7. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the amount due on the mortgage was already paid.

8. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the tak*ing and disposing of any property over the amount due on the mortgage, to wit, $85.65, was a trespass, and the defendant was liable in this action for said trespass, when the defendant was not sued as trustee for the surplus.

9. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the amount of $85.65 was a good tender when the bond was overdue and the property had been taken under a mortgage to secure the same, when no cost nor interest was tendered.

10. Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested by defendant's counsel, that the plaintiff coming into a court of justice must show that his title to equity is unmixed with any gross misconduct or negligence of himself or his agents.

11. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that they could give punitive damages if there was any malice on the part of the plaintiff in attachment.

12. Because his Honor erred in allowing the plaintiff to show partial want of consideration of the said bond and mortgage, when the reply sets up only a general denial.

Messrs. F. P. McGowan and W. H. Martin, for appellant.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, contra.

March 10th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On December 3d, 1881, Wells, defendant herein, commenced an action against McClendon, the plaintiff herein, to recover the sum of $205.06, the value of certain goods advanced by one Pope to McClendon, at the request and upon the credit of Wells. At the time of commencing said action, Wells sued out a warrant of attachment, under which the sheriff's deputy, on December 6th, 1881, seized certain chattels, as the property of McClendon, viz., one road wagon, one bay mare, one black mule and about 150 bushels of cotton-seed, which were duly appraised at the sum of $273. On December 12th, 1881, the attorneys of McClendon made a motion before the clerk to dissolve the attachment for irregularity, which motion was refused, and no appeal was taken therefrom.

*On December 15th, 1881, Wells took an assignment, in writing, from Moore, Quarles & Co., of a note and mortgage given by McClendon to said Moore, Quarles & Co. on November 19th, 1881. The note was for the sum of $500, and was due on the day of its date, and the mortgage given to secure the payment of said note covered all the property seized under the attachment, except the cotton-seed, as well as other property of McClendon. On December 17th, 1881, Wells had the sheriff to release the attachment and paid the costs on the same, and on the same day Wells appointed, in writing, the same deputy who had levied the attachment, his agent, to take possession of the property embraced in the mortgage and dispose of the same according to law. On the same day the deputy delivered the cotton-seed, which, as has been mentioned, was not embraced in the mortgage to McClendon, but retained the other property seized under the attachment, by virtue of his authority as agent of Wells, the assignee of the original mortgagees, Moore, Quarles & Co., and after duly advertising sold the same at public auction for $231, cash. Out of this sum the deputy paid the expenses of keeping the stock and of the sale, and the balance, to wit, the sum of $200.75, was credited on the mortgage. On March 1st, 1882, the action which had been commenced by Wells against McClendon to recover the amount of the account for $205.06, was discontinued on the payment of costs.

The action herein was commenced on September 11th, 1882, and was brought upon the undertaking, which was in the sum of $250, executed by Wells when he sued out the warrant of attachment hereinabove mentioned. The complaint, after setting out the commencement of the original action, the issuing of the warrant of attachment and the execution of said undertaking, alleged: "That the said writ of attachment was illegally issued and obtained; that the suit instituted was never reduced to judgment, but abandoned; that under said writ of attachment property, consisting of mules, horses and wagons, was seized and illegally disposed of, of the value of $800; the condition of the said bond mentioned in paragraph two of this complaint, has been broken to the damage of this plaintiff $1,000." Then, after setting forth that a copy of said bond or undertaking was filed with the *complaint as a part thereof, demanded judgment for $1,000 damages and for costs. The answer, after denying all the allegations in the complaint as to the illegality of the attachment, and denying that any property was ever sold under the attachment, set up as a counter-claim the note and mortgage hereinbefore mentioned given by McClendon to Moore, Quarles & Co., and by them assigned to Wells, and claimed judgment for the balance due thereon. The reply of the plaintiff was a general denial of all the allegations of the answer in reference to the counter-claim.

Testimony was offered tending to show that though the note, secured by mortgage, of McClendon to Moore, Quarles & Co. was on its face for $500, yet the amount really due was only $85.65, and while it did not distinctly appear what was the object in giving the note for an amount so much larger than was really due, there were circumstances pointing to the conclusion that McClendon's purpose was to shield his property from his creditors, especially from Wells. It also appeared in evidence that Wells only paid Moore, Quarles & Co. $85.65 for the note when it was assigned to him, though it did not distinctly appear that Wells, when he bought the note, had notice that it was given for a much larger amount than was really due, but the reasonable inference would be, that he must have known it, or at least had very good reason to suspect that such was the fact. It also appeared in evidence that McClendon made a tender to Wells of $85.65, as the amount due on the note secured by the mortgage, the date of which tender was fixed by one of the witnesses as January 1st, 1882, but a few days before the sale under the mortgage, and of course, therefore, after the breach of the condition of the mortgage.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that the action was on the attachment bond, and "if Wells was actuated by any malice in obtaining the attachment with a view to injuring McClendon, the jury could give punitive damages; but, if there was no malice, then they could give only the actual damages sustained, not exceeding the penalty of the bond. If Pope sold goods of the value of $205.06 to McClendon in the name of Wells, and solely on his credit, it was Wells' debt to Pope and McClendon's *debt to Wells, and Wells had a good cause of action. The affidavit upon which the attachment was issued was clearly insufficient, and the action having been discontinued, the attachment was illegal. When Wells released the attachment it was his duty to return the property. The defendant does not ask for the $205.06 he paid Pope for McClendon, but he sets up as a defense a bond and mortgage under which he sold the property. The bond and mortgage were transferred to Wells after due, and if only $85.65 were due to Moore, Quarles & Co., Wells can stand upon no better ground than Moore, Quarles & Co., and McClendon cannot suffer. The taking and selling of McClendon's property by Wells, under the mortgage, for more than he paid Moore, Quarles & Co. for the bond and mortgage, viz., $85.65, was a trespass, for which the defendant was liable in this action. If McClendon offered Wells $85.65, this was a good tender, but it does not do away with the debt. All that Wells was entitled to was $85.65, and this he has been paid out of the proceeds of the sale under the mortgage. That the jury could give the plaintiff the value of the property sold under the mortgage, less the $85.65 Wells paid for the mortgage, subject, however, to the limit of the attachment, which was $250."

In response to an inquiry from the jury, whether the defendant was liable for the $200.75 credited on the mortgage, the Circuit judge charged them, "that the defendant was so liable in this action, and they could give the full value of the property sold under the mortgage, less the $85.65, but not to exceed the penalty of the bond, and that this action terminated Wells' liability under the mortgage."

The defendant's request to charge raised an abstract question which we do not think applies to the case, under the view which we take of it, and therefore need not be specially considered. The defendant appeals on numerous grounds, which need not be set out here, as we do not propose to consider them seriatim, but simply to adjudge what we regard the material questions in the case.

It is conceded that the action in this case was based solely on the undertaking or bond executed by the defendant when he sued out the warrant of attachment. The condition of this bond, as *stated in the complaint, was "for the payment to the said W. T. McClendon of all damages, costs and charges which might accrue to the said W. T. McClendon by reason of the issuing and obtaining the writ of attachment aforesaid, and all damages consequent to him from any illegality in obtaining and suing out the same." It was, therefore, not an action of tort to recover damages for trespass, but it was an action ex contractu, based upon the obligation assumed by the defendant in the undertaking, to pay all such damages as the plaintiff might sustain by reason of any illegality in the attachment. The measure of the damages, therefore, which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, was the amount to which he had been injured by the illegal seizure of his property under the attachment. He was entitled to compensation for his losses—not to have the defendant punished for his illegal acts. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in saying to the jury, that if Wells was actuated by malice in obtaining the attachment with a view to injurying McClendon, they could give punitive damages.

So, too, we think it was error to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could, in this action, recover damages for any alleged trespass in seizing and selling the property under the mortgage. No such cause of action is stated in the complaint, and we are unable to see, under an action on the attachment bond, how the conduct of the defendant in enforcing his mortgage could have properly been considered. But, more than this, Wells having acquired the ownership of the mortgage, stands in the same position as the original mortgagees, and the condition of the mortgage having been broken, he had become the legal owner of the property mortgaged, and entitled to take possession of it wherever he could find it, or retain possession of it, for the purpose of enforcing his rights under the mortgage. Flenniken v. Scruggs, 15 S. C. 88; Reese v. Lyon, ante, p. 17, and the authorities there cited. In doing so, he would not become a trespasser, and liable to an action for damages as such, but the remedy of McClendon, if he felt himself aggrieved, would be to bring an action to redeem the mortgaged property before the sale took place, or after the sale to bring his action for an account of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property, in either of *which actions McClendon would be required to pay, not only the amount secured by the mortgage, but also any other debt which might be due by him to Wells. Reese v. Lyon, supra.

The tender of the alleged amount due, even if it had been of the full sum due, could not have the effect of revesting the title to the mortgaged property in the mortgagor, as it was made after condition broken. Reese v. Lyon, supra, and the authorities therein cited. But, besides this, the mortgage debt was an interest-bearing demand, and no interest was tendered, nor were the costs and expenses attending the seizure of the property tendered, which should have been done, as the alleged tender was made after such seizure and after expenses had been incurred in keeping the mortgaged animals.

Wells being, as we have seen, the legal owner of the mortgaged property, as soon as the condition of the mortgage was broken, was under no obligation to return such property when the attachment was released, for, as such owner, he had a right to take it into his possession wherever he could find it, provided he committed no violation of the criminal law in so doing, and, of course, he had the right to retain possession of it.

Next, as to the plaintiff's defense to the defendant's counterclaim. The rule is, that a general denial only puts in issue such facts as it is necessary for the plaintiff (or the defendant, when he puts in a counter-claim,) to prove in order to establish his cause of action; and if the defendant, or the plaintiff, as the case may be, desires to establish and rely upon any affirmative defense, he must plead such defense, and cannot, under a general denial, be permitted to go into evidence to establish such defense. In this case, all that the defendant was required to prove in order to establish his counter-claim, was the execution of the note and mortgage and the assignment by the original mortgagees to him; and the plaintiff by simply putting in a general denial was not at liberty to introduce evidence to establish the affirmative defense upon which he relied. The note being under seal, of itself imported a consideration, and if the plaintiff desired to show that by fraud, misrepresentation, or otherwise, he was induced to sign a note for a much larger amount than was really due, he should have specially pleaded such defense, so as to *advertise the defendant of the issue he would have to meet. Pom. Rem., § 660, p. 692; Lyles v. Bolles, 8 S. C. 258; Pender v. Lancaster, 14 S. C. 25 [37 Am. Rep. 720], MSS. Dec., No. 748, filed June 25th, 1879. But, as the case must go back for a new trial, we think it right, under the liberal provisions of the code, that the plaintiff should have an opportunity, if he so desires of amending his reply so as to set up any affirmative defense he may desire to the counter-claim.

We do not think that the fifth and sixth grounds of appeal can be sustained. The paper objected to was a written admission of the original mortgagees of the amount really due, bearing date prior to the transfer to the defendant, and was, therefore, clearly admissible; and the fact of the death of one of the mortgagees, even if it would have any effect, nowhere appears in the case and cannot be considered.

The sixth ground is based upon a misapprehension evidently. The defendant, by his pleading, admitted the execution of the attachment undertaking, inasmuch as it was alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer, and, therefore, there was no necessity to introduce any evidence upon that point.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his reply as herein indicated.

Mr. Justice McGowan, concurred in the result.

Before Aldrich, J., Georgetown, March, 1883.

This was an action by Roanoke Myers against P. A. Ham, commenced January 20th, 1883. The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

The plaintiff Roanoke, claims that he is the head of a family and entitled to a homestead in a tract of land on Sampit, which was sold by the sheriff, at Georgetown, to satisfy an execution lodged in his office November 7th, 1881, on a judgment in favor of the defendant, Ham, who became the purchaser of the land now claimed as a homestead. The right of action, it is admitted, arose subsequent to the adoption of the constitution of 1868. He prays that the defendant be required to restore the land, to be set off as his homestead, that he pay damages, and that he be restrained from committing waste. The defendant admits that he was the purchaser, but denies that Roanoke was a married man and the head of a family; that the land was levied upon and advertised for sale, that he set up no claim for a homestead, and even if he had been a married man and the head of a family, that he is not now entitled to a homestead.

C. Wilson, J. Davis, S. Smith, and F. Vanderhorst, all negroes, testify that Roanoke and Delia lived together as husband and wife in one house, and were so regarded. Roanoke says he and Delia were man and wife; that they were married according to plantation law, that is, they went to their master, the Rev. Mr. Lance, for a house, and he would not let them have it unless as man and wife. That was the law of the plantation. That he took her for his wife and had four children by her. Cupid is the youngest. He has been living with him "ever since he was big enough to run arter me." He says he had Delia a year before freedom, and that she has not lived with him for ten years.

*J. Z. McConnell, a white man, says he has known Roanoke twelve or fourteen years; that he was always regarded in the neighborhood as a single man. S. Knight, a mulatto, says Roanoke was regarded as a single man, unmarried; that he heard him tell Delia, in his yard, last February, "Delia, I never married you, and you ain't my wife." The defendant says Roanoke was regarded as a single man, and has lately married another woman. He says, after he bought at sheriff's sale, Roanoke was put out of possession by the trial justice; that he then became his tenant. His rent was the forage made. Defendant was working the trees for turpentine and wanted forage for his stock; Roanoke never said anything about a homestead at the sheriff's sale or since he bought the land. Sheriff Doar, and his deputy, Ward, say Roanoke has been here frequently, before and after the sale, and never said anything about a homestead.

Delia says: "My name is Delia Knight; I did not live with Roanoke as his wife—was never married to him;" that she lived with him two weeks before emancipation, when he threw her things out of the house; that after she went back to him, at the persuasion of her mother, and lived with him a week; then went to stay with him at "Harmony, and was back and forwards; staid with him in Georgetown, but he was not my husband, for I could not live with him; he beat me; then he lived with me in Georgetown three years; he beat me so I could not live with him; I paid the house-rent by washing; I had a child by Woodward, a white soldier; Cupid is the child of Roanoke."

This is, I think, a full statement of the facts. The first question is: Were Roanoke and Delia husband and wife? It is very evident they were not married according to the rites of the church. Were they husband and wife under the act of 1872 (Gen. Stat., § 2030)? In other words, did they, in the terms of the statute, occupy the relation of husband and wife, and were they cohabiting as such and recognizing that relation as still existing at the time of the passage of the act? Now this question is not to be determined by what the neighbors and community considered them; but did Roanoke and Delia undertake and agree to occupy the relation to each other of husband and *wife, and were they cohabiting as such? He says she did. She says she did not. I am disposed to think this is not the marriage contemplated by the act of 1872. Certainly Roanoke, by his own act, corroborates, his wife. He did not consider Delia his wife, for he not only said he never married her, but has actually married another woman by the rites of the church. I must, therefore, conclude that these persons are properly described in the words of the act as "persons who have agreed to live in concubinage after their emancipation."

But the learned and ingenious counsel, Mr. Dozier, does not claim that Roanoke is entitled to his homestead because he is the husband of Delia, but that being the father of Cupid, who lives with him, he is the head of a family. And this brings up the question: Can a man claim this beneficent provision of the constitution by virtue of the violation of the moral law and the proprieties of society? If Roanoke and Delia were not husband and wife, Cupid is a bastard—the son of no one. He cannot inherit Roanoke's estate, and it is hard to conceive, in a Christian country, that vice and immorality will be encouraged by a constitutional provision, that a debtor shall escape the payment of an honest debt by interposing his bastard son! It is true I was referred to a case from one of the Western States, where a woman was awarded her homestead, she having a bastard child, and, therefore, the head of a family. I will not set the example of introducing such a school of morals in this old State of South Carolina. Men shall not be rewarded for violating social duty and decency by my consent.

The defense was forcibly and well argued by Mr. Sessions. The plaintiff set up no claim for homestead either before, at the time, or after the sale, until the filing of the complaint in January, 1883, the sale being made in July, 1882, under an execution lodged in November, 1881. He became the tenant of the defendant, and is now on the land as his tenant. He refers to Agnew v. Adams, Oliver v. White, by the present court, and Manning v. Dove, by the old court, 10 Rich. 395, to show that the plaintiff is estopped. From the views above expressed, it is not necessary to lengthen out this judgment. The complaint is dismissed with costs.

*Plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because, it is submitted, his Honor misinterpreted the evidence, the clear weight of which showed that Roanoke and Delia were husband and wife, under the terms of the act of 1872.

2. Because, whether they were husband and wife or not, it is admitted that Cupid was their son, that he was recognized as such by Roanoke, and, in fact, has lived with and been supported by Roanoke since his early infancy, and this being the case, the plaintiff was, at the time of the levy and sale, the head of a family, and, therefore, entitled to a homestead under the constitution and laws of this State.

Mr. R. Dozier, for appellant.
Mr. Joseph Sessions, contra.

March 10th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The action below was an action on the equity side of the court, for the recovery and assignment of a homestead in certain lands located in Georgetown county. The lands in question formerly belonged to the appellant, but were sold in 1882 by the sheriff of Georgetown under an execution against the appellant in favor of respondent, who became the purchaser. No claim was made of the homestead at the sale. It is admitted, however, that the debt of appellant to the respondent under which the sale was made was contracted since the constitution of 1868. Since the sale appellant has been a tenant of respondent. The answer denied, first, that appellant was a married man, or the head of a family; and, second, the fact that appellant suffered the land to be sold to respondent without objection, or claim of homestead, was also interposed as a defense by way of estoppel. The circuit judge dismissed the complaint on these two grounds set out in the answer.

While we must affirm the judgment below, yet we do not concur on the grounds upon which it was based. We think that the act of 1865, 13 Stat. 269, as construed in Davenport v. *Caldwell, 10 S. C. 335, and State v. Whaley, Id. 500, is the act under which the facts here should have been considered, instead of the act of 1872, upon which it seems that the Circuit judge relied. It appears that the appellant and Delia were married before emancipation "according to plantation law." They went to their master and had a house assigned them, and they were thus living together as man and wife a short time as slaves, when the act of 1865 was passed. They had several children. True, they have been living apart for the last ten years, but their condition at the passage of the act of 1865, was as above described, which made their children legitimate, one of whom, the youngest, Cupid, is still living with the appellant, his father. This constitutes him the head of a family. Garaty & Armstrong v. Du Bose, 5 S. C. 499.

Nor do we think that the conduct of the appellant in not forbidding the sale by the sheriff estops him from still claiming his homestead, if he is otherwise entitled thereto. Section 1994, general statutes, while declaring that a homestead shall be exempt, further provides, that it shall be the duty of the sheriff before selling, to have it set off, and if the debtor neglects to nominate an appraiser, the sheriff shall appoint. And in section 1998 is found the following: "No waiver, however solemn, shall defeat the right." Here, the appellant was in possession when the land was sold, he was simply silent, and remained in possession until he was ejected by a trial justice. The purchaser was his creditor, and has not been injured. This is no place for the doctrine of estoppel. Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 370; Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 375.

The judgment, however, must be affirmed on a different ground from those above. The right of homestead is a statutory right, or rather a constitutional right, to be enforced by statutory proceedings. Under the statutes upon the subject of homestead, the Circuit Court is without original jurisdiction therein. Such jurisdiction has not been conferred upon this court either on its law or equity side. The act of force in reference to homesteads prescribes the mode of obtaining it in clear and distinct terms, and provides the necessary machinery to that end, suited to all cases where the right has attached, *whether it be in a debtor himself, with mesne or final process impending or otherwise, or whether it be in his widow and children. Where a right is provided by statute, to be enforced in a prescribed mode, no other can be resorted to. The mode prescribed is exclusive. Ex parte Lewie, 17 S. C. 156; Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 229.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed without prejudice, however, to appellant, in any subsequent proceeding he may institute, if so advised, to obtain a homestead.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred generally, but Mr. Justice McGOWAN only in the result.

JOHNSON v. DAWKINS.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐537.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐1178.]

This court can only affirm, reverse or modify judgments of the courts below; therefore, in reversing a decree which sustained a demurrer to the complaint, it has no power to grant leave to defendant to answer over.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4617; Dec. Dig. ⇐1178.]

Before Kershaw, J., Union, June, 1883.

This was an action commenced in May, 1883, by David Johnson, Jr., as Judge of Probate for Union county, against Mary P. Dawkins, as executrix of Thomas N. Dawkins, deceased, who had signed as surety the administration bond of William J. Keenan, as administrator of Clinton Wilson, deceased, to recover the balance due upon the judgment rendered against Keenan in an accounting had in the Court of Equity. See Koon v. Munro, 18 S. C. 374. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon grounds which substantially raised the point that the plaintiff could not maintain the action.

The order of the Circuit judge, sustaining this demurrer, was as follows:

*By the act of 1789, (5 Stat. 110, § 21,) administration bonds were to be made payable to the justices of the county court, or to the ordinary, and might have been sued by any person injured by the breach thereof. Afterwards they were directed to be made payable to the ordinary, and now are required to be drawn payable to the Probate judge, (Gen. Stat., § 1899,) and may be sued as prescribed in section 1885, to wit, "by any person injured by the breach of the condition." The practice formerly was to enter upon the record the names of the persons for whose benefit the suit was brought in the name of the ordinary (Ordinary v. Johnsey, 6 Rich. 355). Only the persons injured by the breach of the bond could recover money in the suit brought upon the bond.

The prayer of this complaint is that the plaintiff recover the money alleged to be due to the estate of the intestate. There is no law authorizing him to receive the money, and no one else appears in the record as a party to whom it could be paid. The plaintiff is not a trustee entitled to recover the money and to disburse it. His only duty in regard to the bond is to take care of and hold it as a record of his office for the benefit of the parties intended to be protected by it. There is no analogy with the former practice, whereby, when the bond was payable to a person having no interest, the obligee was held a trust for the benefit of the real party in interest, to the extent that suit might be brought in his name for the benefit of the real parties, for "it is no longer, consistently with the provisions of the code, possible for one person to sue to the use of another. The persons beneficially interested must themselves bring the action." Pom., § 138; Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253.

If the condition of the bond had required the payment of the money demanded to the ordinary, for the benefit of the parties entitled thereto, the action would have been properly brought, for the plaintiff would, in that case, have been the trustee of an express trust, or a person in whose name a contract had been made for the benefit of another authorized by the code to sue. But, by the terms of the bond, the obligors are required to pay to the persons entitled by law, and there is no law entitling the ordinary, or the plaintiff as his successor in office, to receive *the money claimed under the bond, and, as has been said, he is only a trustee to hold the bond, and not to recover or receive money under it. If the money should be paid to him, his sureties would not be liable for it (State v. White, 10 Rich. 442), and such payment would not protect the defendant from liability for the same to a party "injured by a breach of the bond." There is no one before the court in this case who could receive the money if its recovery should be adjudged. This is an anomaly, for, should a judgment be rendered against the defendant, who would be entitled to have execution for it?

It is adjudged that the demurrer be sustained and the complaint dismissed, with costs to the defendant.

From this judgment the plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds: "1. For that his Honor held that the Judge of Probate was not the proper person to bring this action. 2. For that his Honor sustained the defendant's demurrer herein. 3. For that his Honor dismissed the complaint herein without granting leave to the plaintiff to amend the same by substituting or adding the names of proper parties."

Messrs. Rion & McKissick, for appellant.
Messrs. Shand & Culp, contra.

March 10th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This appeal involves the question, whether an action on an administration bond given to the Probate judge, his successors, &c., can be brought in the name of the Probate judge in office at the time of the action, or should it be brought in the name of the parties entitled to the money? The Circuit judge held, that the parties interested should bring the action, and sustained a demurrer below on that ground, the action having been instituted in the name of the Probate judge.

In sections 132 and 134 of the code is found the law, under the reformed procedure as to parties plaintiff, and the question here presented must be decided by the requirements of these sections. Section 132 provides, that every action must be *brought in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 134. The exception in section 134 is, that executors or administrators, a trustee of an express trust or a person authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, and it then declares that a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of the section, shall be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another. Now it is apparent that the Probate judge is not the real party in interest in the bond sued on here. True, he is the official to whom the bond is made payable, and he is the legal custodian thereof, but the bond was not executed to secure any interest of his, nor is he entitled to receive any money that may be due thereon, as, by the terms of the bond itself, the funds intended to be secured are to be delivered to such persons respectively as might be entitled to the same by law. And it is equally apparent that the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Clinton Wilson is the real party in interest. Unless, therefore, the plaintiff falls within the exception of section 134, the demurrer was properly sustained.

But does not the plaintiff fall within the exception mentioned? Is he not a trustee of an express trust within the terms and meaning of said section? He is certainly, as successor, the party with whom the contract of defendant's testator was made. It is plain, too, as has been already said, that said contract was not made for his benefit, but was made for the benefit of another. These facts, which are obvious, clearly bring him within the language of the section, and expressly place him within the exception which permits the class mentioned to sue. This conclusion seems inevitable when these sections are construed in themselves, and when interpreted through their own terms.

Let us next examine the authorities and decided cases. We do not think that those cases decided in this State since the abolition of the old Court of Equity, in which it was held that the clerk of the court is the proper person to bring suit on bonds payable to the commissioner in equity, throw any light on the question. The bonds in these cases were money bonds payable to the commissioner, who was authorized and entitled to recover *the amounts due, and the right of the clerk to sue, turned upon the construction of the act of assembly, which, upon the destruction of the office of commissioner, transferred the books, records, &c., of said office to the several clerks of the Circuit Courts, and the question in these cases was, whether the act in question gave the clerks power to sue and collect these bonds. The case before us does not involve that question.

Nor is the former practice in suits on bonds given to the old ordinary of much assistance in reaching a correct conclusion. That practice, which was universal, recognized as the only correct mode of suing such bonds that the name of the ordinary should be used as plaintiff, though it was always well understood that the action was brought for the benefit of the persons interested in the estate, and not for the benefit of the ordinary. This practice, however, grew up when the code was unknown and when it was the law that the legal owner could alone sue or be heard. The code has since made a radical change on this subject, and we must look to it, and be governed by its provisions, if any, regardless of the former practice; therefore such practice is unimportant.

The case in our reports which comes nearest to the question, is the case of Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253. But that case decides nothing more than that distributees, as the real parties in interest, could sue on such bonds. It did not decide that the Probate judge could not. This decision was in full accord with the provisions of the code, supra, for these provisions in no sense inhibit, either directly or indirectly, or by implication, distributees from bringing such actions. It declares that the real party must sue, except where the contract is made with one for the benefit of another, then the party with whom the contract is made may sue. In such last cases the term "must," as applied to the real party in interest, is expunged, and yet there is no imperative necessity for the Probate judge to sue. The action is not objectionable, however, because he does sue. For the effect of the two sections, when construed together, is to allow either the real party in interest or the Probate judge to sue. The term "must" being expunged, the substance of the two sections would be as follows: Either the real party in interest or the party *with whom a contract is made for another may institute an action on such contract. This is the doctrine, as we understand, which Mr. Pomeroy announces in his work on Remedies and Remedial Rights. And no writer has gone further than Mr. Pomeroy in pressing the code to its extreme limit. Such, too, is the doctrine in New York. People v. Norton, 9 N. Y. 176.

The fact that the Probate judge was not authorized to enforce the judgment is not sufficient argument against these positions. The practice which formerly prevailed in suits on the bond of the sheriff, of allowing a judgment for the penalty to be obtained for the security of all parties interested, and then by suggestion for each to have his particular demand assessed, is a safe and convenient practice on such bonds, much better than to require the real parties in interest to sue, who may be widely separated from each other, and many of them under disabilities of infancy or otherwise. State v. Moses, 18 S. C. 371. The argument of convenience is decidedly in favor of this practice.

The respondent asks in the event that the judgment below is overruled, that he may have leave to answer over. If it was within our power to grant such an order, we would have no hesitation in doing so, as it is manifest that the demurrer was interposed in good faith. But this court is confined to the review of the judgment below with power to affirm, modify or reverse. The court below has passed no judgment upon respondent's right to answer over, and, therefore, this question is not before us. When the case goes back, the respondent will have an opportunity to move for leave to answer, which will no doubt be granted him.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

WAGENER & CO. v. MARS.

(November Term, 1883.)

[Payment ⟸63.]

Under a plea of payment, defendant cannot avail himself of a counterclaim: as, e. g., where plaintiff received the proceeds of a draft, half of which belonged to defendant, but which was wholly applied to the individual indebtedness of the other owner of such draft, who indorsed it to plaintiff without instructions to apply any part of it to the defendant's debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 160; Dec. Dig. ⟸63.]

*Before Cothran, J., Abbeville, September, 1882.

This was an action by F. W. Wagener & Co. against T. W. Mars, commenced September 28th, 1881. The opinion sufficiently states the case. The draft referred to was as follows:

No. 27,627. The National Bank of Columbus, Georgia, Oct. 5, 1880. Pay to the order of W. W. and T. W. Mars, Twenty-One Hundred and Eight 17–100 Dollars.

G. W. Dillinghan, Cashier.

$2,108.17. To John J. Cisco & Son, New York.

Indorsed: W. W. and T. W. Mars.

Mr. W. H. Parker, for appellants.

Mr. Ellis G. Graydon and W. C. Benet, contra, and on the same side argument of the late Mr. Armistead Burt was read.

March 11th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On February 9th, 1880, W. W. Mars and the defendant, T. W. Mars, executed their joint and several note, by which they promised to pay to the plaintiffs or bearer, $3,000 on or before December 1st, 1880, with interest from date; and on the same day T. W. Mars executed to the plaintiffs a mortgage on real estate to secure the payment of the said note. The action in this case was brought to foreclose said mortgage, and the defendant pleaded payment, first, by the proceeds of the sales of certain cotton shipped to plaintiffs, and, second, by the proceeds of a draft drawn by a bank in Georgia on John J. Cisco & Son, of New York, payable to the order of W. W. and T. W. Mars, for $2,108.17, to one-half of which it was claimed the defendant was entitled. The question as to the payment from the proceeds of the cotton has been finally disposed of in the court below, and the only question raised by the appeal is as to the payment claimed out of the proceeds of the Cisco draft.

The case was referred to the master, who found, as matter of fact, that the said draft was delivered to the plaintiffs by W. W. Mars, not as a payment on the account of W. W. Mars, but "for the purpose of allowing him to buy a bill of goods, and draw *drafts against it, the balance to go to the general account of W. W. Mars." The result, therefore, was that only such balance was applied to the general account of W. W. Mars which embraced the mortgage debt. To this report the defendant excepted, and the Circuit judge, without controverting the finding of fact by the master, held as follows: "As to the Cisco draft, it has been produced before me, and is made payable to W. W. Mars and T. W. Mars. The defendant did not indorse the draft. The plaintiffs therefore knew that defendant had a half interest in said draft. From that fact I hold that the plaintiffs are bound to apply one-half of the said draft to some debt they then held against the defendant, that is, the mortgage debt—the only one in existence at the time the payment was made—no matter what directions Walter W. Mars may have given them." He therefore sustained the exception to the master's report relative to the Cisco draft, and recommitted the report of the master with instructions to credit the mortgage debt with one-half of the balance of the Cisco draft not already so applied. From this ruling the plaintiffs appeal, alleging error therein.

It will be observed that the only defense set up in the answer of defendant was payment, and that no counter-claim was pleaded. We do not suppose that it can, for a moment, be doubted that under a plea of payment a defendant cannot avail himself of any counter-claim. So that the real question in this case is, as it appears to us, whether, even granting that the defendant did not indorse the draft, either by himself or by any authorized agent, and that the plaintiffs knew that he was entitled to a half interest in the draft, these facts would sustain a plea of payment, or whether they would not rather establish a counter-claim. If the plaintiffs have wrongfully obtained possession of the defendant's money, that may constitute a good cause of action in his favor against them, which may be asserted either in a separate action or by counter-claim in this action if it had been so pleaded; but we are at a loss to conceive how such fact could constitute a payment. If the plaintiffs had been indebted to the defendant on any other account, or if they had in any way wrongfully acquired possession of any property of the defendant, surely it could not be said that such indebtedness, or the value of such *property, would constitute a payment on the debt, the collection of which the plaintiffs are seeking to enforce in this action.

Our province being simply to review the rulings of the Circuit Court, we have not deemed it necessary to consider the other questions so elaborately discussed by the counsel on both sides, because we are satisfied that, even assuming the facts to be as stated by the Circuit judge, his conclusion of law, under the state of the pleadings, was erroneous, and, on the contrary, under the findings of fact by the master, which are not controverted by the Circuit judge, and which can be sustained by the testimony, that the exceptions should have been overruled and the master's report confirmed. Of course, under this view of the case, the question as to the alleged errors of calculation cannot arise, and need not, therefore, be considered. We do not, however, desire to be understood as precluding the defendant from asserting in another action any claims which he may suppose he has against the plaintiffs.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of carrying out the views herein announced.

20 S. C. 536

STATE v. SATTERWHITE.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸911.]

Facts not stated in the brief cannot be assumed in order to show that a Circuit judge exceeded his jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3682–3688; Dec. Dig. ⟸911.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸911.]

The mere signing of an order for bail outside of his circuit, for a prisoner of his circuit, does not show that the judge heard the application beyond the limits of his own circuit. This case distinguished from Ex parte Parker, 6 S. C. 472.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3686; Dec. Dig. ⟸911.]

[3. Bail ⟸44.]

The Court of Sessions and the judges thereof have the power to admit persons to bail in all criminal cases, even after conviction, but it is a power to be exercised with due discretion, and, after conviction, with extreme caution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 145; Dec. Dig. ⟸44.]

[4. Bail ⟸61; Recognizances ⟸2.]

A recognizance entered into and approved by the clerk of court, under the order of the judge, is in effect the taking of such recognizance by the judge himself, and is legal and binding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. ⟸61; Recognizances, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 16; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

[5. Infants ⟸46.]

An infant is not liable on a recognizance he signs as surety for another, unless he ratify and confirm it after attaining his majority, whether a recognizance be regarded as in the nature of a judgment or not.

*Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, July, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Goggans & Herbert, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts out of which the points made by this appeal arise, are as follows: John P. Satterwhite was convicted at the February Term of the Court of Sessions for Newberry county (one of the counties embraced within the limits of the Seventh circuit), A. D. 1881, of the crime of maliciously burning a frame of timber prepared for building a house, and sentenced to imprisonment for five years in the State penitentiary. From this judgment he appealed, and, pending the appeal, he was carried before the judge of the Seventh circuit under a writ of habeas corpus and admitted to bail. Under this order he entered into recognizance before the clerk of Sessions for Newberry county with the appellant, Kittie Satterwhite, and one J. F. Wheeler as his sureties.

His appeal having been dismissed, this proceeding was instituted to estreat his recognizance, and, upon hearing the return to the rule as to Kittie Satterwhite, Judge Kershaw held that no sufficient cause was shown, and ordered the recognizance estreated as to her. From this Kittie Satterwhite appeals, upon the following grounds: "1st. Because the recognizance sought to be estreated is illegal and contrary to public policy and void. 2d. Because the recognizance having been taken by, and acknowledged before the clerk of the court, instead of a judge or trial justice, as required by law, is void. 3d. Because his Honor erred in holding that Kittie Satterwhite was liable on the said recognizance, although she was under twenty-one years of age at the time of its execution."

As we gather from the argument of the counsel for appellant, two points are intended to be made by the first ground of appeal. 1st. That the judge of the Seventh circuit had no jurisdiction to hear an application for bail while in Columbia, outside the *limits of his own circuit, and therefore the recognizance taken under his order was illegal and void. Even granting the legal proposition upon which this point is based, (upon which, however, we do not now propose to express any opinion,) that the judge of the Seventh circuit had no authority to hear an application for bail in a case pending in his own circuit, while outside the limits of his circuit, we do not think that the "Case" furnishes the facts necessary to raise such a question, and we certainly cannot assume the existence of any fact necessary to show that a Circuit judge has exceeded his jurisdiction. On the contrary, we would assume, until the contrary is shown, the existence of the facts necessary to give him jurisdiction. The rule that applies in inferior courts, "that their proceedings must show upon their face that the subject-matter is within their jurisdiction," (Devall v. Taylor, Cheves 6,) does not apply to superior tribunals, for, as is said in that case, "the general rule, as stated by the court in Winford v. Powell, 2 Ld. Raym. 1310, in regard to inferior courts is, that nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction that is not expressly averred so to be; though, in case of a superior jurisdiction, nothing shall be intended out of it."

Now, in this case, there is nothing whatever to show that the judge of the Seventh circuit was outside the limits of his circuit when he heard and granted the order for bail, except the single circumstance that the order is dated "Columbia, S. C., 5 May, 1881," and this is not inconsistent with the supposition that he may have heard and determined the application while in the Seventh circuit, and subsequently signed the order in Columbia. This case differs materially from the case of Ex parte Parker, 6 S. C. 472, for there it was conceded that the judge of the Sixth circuit went into the Fifth circuit for the purpose of issuing a writ of habeas corpus in a case pending in the Fifth circuit, and there heard the application and granted the order of discharge, while here the case was pending in the Seventh circuit, and there was no evidence as to where the writ of habeas corpus was issued, and only a single circumstance indicating that the order was signed beyond the limits of the Seventh circuit. We do not, therefore, think that sufficient appears in this case to warrant us in saying *that Judge Wallace exceeded his jurisdiction in granting the order under which the recognizance in question was taken.

The second point raised by the first ground of appeal is, that there is no authority for granting bail to a prisoner after conviction of an infamous offense, but, on the contrary, it is against public policy, and therefore the recognizance taken in this case was void. In the case of State v. Frink, 1 Bay 168, such an order was granted after a conviction for manslaughter. In the case of State v. Hill, 1 Tr. Con. Rep. 242, the question was whether bail could be granted after bill found by the grand jury, and the power was affirmed. In that case Judge Nott said: "I have no doubt but the judges of the court have the power and right to admit persons to bail after bill found in a capital case. Blackstone and Hawkins both say the judges of the King's Bench may admit to bail in all cases, and although it is not particularly said after bill found, yet, if this power extends to all cases, there are none to which it does not extend."

The reasoning and illustrations employed in this case will apply with equal force to the question of the power to admit to bail even after conviction; and, as Nott, J., says, if the power extends to all cases, then there are none to which it does not extend, and hence it may be exercised even after conviction. In State v. Potter, Dudley 300, Earle, J., said: "Independently, however, of the habeas corpus act, the Court of Sessions, by virtue of its general powers in criminal matters, may, in term time or at chambers, admit a prisoner to bail in all offenses and felonies whatever." The two cases last cited are recognized in State v. Holmes, 3 Strobh. 272. See also Hurd Hab. Corp. 444, 445, and authorities there cited.

It is true there is a case (State v. Connor, 2 Bay 34,) cited by the counsel for appellant which seems to sustain his position. But in that case the question was not properly before the court of last resort, though the judges of that court did take occasion to say that they approved the course of the Circuit judge in refusing to admit the defendant to bail after conviction in a case so highly criminal, but at the same time recognized the power to grant bail even after conviction in cases for lower offenses. That was a case in which the defendant was convicted of forgery at *common law in altering the date of a receipt, and some stress seems to have been laid upon the fact that the offense belonged to the class of crimen falsi and called for infamous punishment. We do not think, therefore, that this case, which, so far as we have been able to discover, has not been followed in any subsequent case, based as it is upon a mere dictum and not upon a point presented for decision, is sufficient to supersede what we understand to be the rule to be deduced from the other cases cited above, to wit, that the Court of Sessions and the judges thereof, like the Court of King's Bench in England, have the power to admit persons to bail in all cases, even after conviction, but that it is a power, as is said in all of the cases, to be exercised with due discretion, and after conviction with extreme caution. The other case cited by appellant's counsel, Ex parte Ezell, 19 Am. Rep. 32, (40 Tex. 451), does not apply. In that case the only question was whether a statute prohibiting the granting of bail after conviction was in conflict with a clause in the constitution of Texas, providing that "all prisoners shall be bailable upon sufficient sureties." The very fact that it was found necessary to pass such a statute, would seem to imply that in that State a prisoner could, prior to the act, be bailed after conviction.

The second ground raises the question as to the power of the clerk to take the recognizance in question. The appellant contends that section 2659 of the general statutes of 1882, which is identical with section 7, chapter CXLII. general statutes of 1872, (the law which was in force at the time the recognizance in this case was taken,) expressly requires that every recognizance "for appearing as a party * * * at any court of criminal jurisdiction within the State," shall be "acknowledged in the presence of a judge or trial justice, who shall certify such acknowledgment, otherwise such recognizance shall be void," and, therefore, that a recognizance taken and acknowledged before the clerk has no legal or binding force. In this case the order for bail expressly required that the recognizance "be entered into and approved by the clerk of said court;" and this was in accordance with what we understand to have been the universal practice in this State. It was, in effect, the taking of the recognizance *by the judge himself, acting through the proper officer of his court, just as many other acts are done by the clerk, through the directions of the judge, as the acts of the court. We do not think, therefore, that the second ground of appeal can be sustained.

The third ground of appeal presents the question, whether the infancy of the appellant, at the time she signed the recognizance, is a good defense to the proceeding to estreat the recognizance. The Circuit judge found, as a matter of fact, that she was an infant under the age of twenty-one years at the time she signed the recognizance, but he found, as matter of law, that she could not, upon this ground, escape liability; "that a recognizance to appear is not simply a bond for the payment of money, and is not a simple contract, such as may be avoided on the usual grounds. It is of the nature of a judgment, and the signers acknowledge the existence of a subsisting obligation which is of record. Kittie Satterwhite can no more avoid this bond, and escape liability as surety, than she could avoid a judgment regularly obtained against her, according to law, d. .ng her infancy, and a part of the records of the court."

We think that the authorities cited by the appellant's counsel show that in this there was error. In State v. Morgan, 2 Bailey 601, it was held that a recognizance was not a judgment. In that case O'Neall, J., said: "A recognizance is defined to be an obligation of record which a man enters into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized with condition to do some particular act. 2 Bl. Com. 34. The present application supposes it to be not only a record but also a judgment, creating a lien on the cognizor's land from its date. But this notion is, I think, erroneous. * * * Such a floating and unascertained liability as exists under a recognizance, is contrary to all my ideas of a judgment, which fixes both the liability of the defendant to pay and the amount which he is to pay." But, even could a recognizance be regarded as a judgment, or in the nature of a judgment, the plea of infancy might still be available. Haigler v. Way, 2 Rich. 324.

Whether an infant could bind himself by a recognizance to appear and answer to a criminal charge, is a question which does *not arise in this case, and has not, therefore, been considered. The question here is, whether an infant can be made liable on a recognizance which she has signed as surety for another; and all that we decide is, that she cannot in such a case unless it were shown, as it has not been in this case, that after she became of age she in some way ratified or confirmed the obligation entered into by her during infancy. On this ground, therefore, the judgment below must be reversed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Messrs. R. E. & R. B. Allison, for appellants.

Mr. Ernest Moore, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. J. Y. Bryce & Co. agreed to advance to the defendant, Massey (respondent), for the year 1870, to the extent of $2,000, and on the second day of May of that year a very considerable portion of this amount having been advanced, to wit, $1,455.40, Massey executed and delivered to the said Bryce & Co. an instrument under seal, in which he promised to pay them or order, on or before November 1st, next, the said sum; and on the same day he executed a mortgage of certain real estate situate in Lancaster county, and also an agricultural lien on the crops of that year, to secure the payment of the said sum of $2,000, agreed to be advanced, in which was included the $1,455.40, already advanced as stated above. It was stipulated in this agricultural lien, that Massey should pay two and one-half per cent. per month on the advances from the date of each. Shortly after the execution of the above-mentioned note for $1,455.40 and the mortgage and agricultural lien, Bryce & Co. assigned and transferred the same to the plaintiffs, Thatcher & Co., but of this transfer the respondent, Massey, had no knowledge until this suit was brought in November, 1873.

During the year 1870, Bryce & Co. advanced to Massey, in money and supplies, including the $1,455.40, to the amount of $2,532.68, besides the interest thereon, which was in excess of the $2,000 agreed to be advanced, by the sum of $532.68. Bryce & Co. continued to advance in the year 1871, and also to a small amount in 1873, and they had also advanced in 1869, at the end of which year Massey had to his credit the sum of $37.92. The cotton crop of 1870, amounting to thirty-four bales, was received by Bryce & Co., to wit, three bales in December, 1870, and thirty-one bales in the Spring of 1871, at different times from January to May, the net proceeds amounting to some $2,005.91; and in 1872 Massey delivered four bales of the crop of 1871, the net proceeds of which amounted to $357.47. In the spring of 1871, Bryce & Co. received from Massey four mules, alleged by Massey as a sale to Bryce & Co. at $200 each. One of these mules was afterwards returned to Massey, leaving the other three in the hands of Bryce & Co. at *$600. There were other credits claimed by Massey, but it is unnecessary to notice them here under these circumstances.

The plaintiffs, Thatcher & Co., to whom, as stated above, the $1,455.40 note with the mortgage and agricultural lien had been assigned, brought this action on said note and for foreclosure of the mortgage. The defendant answered, pleading payment of all advances secured by said mortgage and agricultural lien, by credits of his cotton crop of 1870, by the balance to his credit at the end of the year 1869, to wit, $37.90, and by $600, the price of three mules sold to Bryce & Co., and he denied that a valid assignment had been made to the plaintiffs of the note and mortgage, &c. In 1875 the case was referred to a referee, whose report was heard by Judge Pressley in 1881, upon exceptions from both sides. In this report the referee took into the account the entire transactions between J. Y. Bryce & Co. and the defendant, Massey, from 1869 to 1873, and after crediting upon the indebtedness of Massey the proceeds of the cotton received by J. Y. Bryce & Co. during that time, the mules at $600, the balance due Massey from the transaction of 1869, $37.90, overcharge on bacon, damaged bacon, and amount paid by B. R. Smith & Co., $207.25, &c., found as matter of fact that the sum of $561.35 was due by the said Massey on September 16th, 1881, which, by virtue of the assignment to the plaintiffs of the note and mortgage, belonged to the plaintiffs.

To this report the plaintiffs excepted, alleging error: First. Because the referee had charged two and one-half per cent. per month interest on the cash advances only, whereas the terms of the agricultural lien stipulated for that per cent. upon all advances, whether of cash or supplies. Second. Because the referee gave Massey credit for $600, the price of the mules, when said mules were only placed in the hands of Bryce & Co. for sale, who sold them for $390 only. Third. Because the referee charged interest on the $1,455.40 at two and one-half per cent. per month only to January 1st, 1871, when this per cent. should have been charged until the note was paid, and also, the same error as to the items of advance, other than the note—with some other exceptions not material. The defendant also excepted upon various grounds, not necessary to be mentioned *now, and gave notice that he would move the court for a recommittal of the report.

On hearing the report and exceptions, Judge Pressley adjudged that the interest on the sealed note should be computed after maturity at seven per cent. per annum; that the interest on all the other advances made under the lien should be computed from the date of each at two and one-half per cent. a month up to January 1st, 1871; that the proceeds of the crop of 1870 should be applied first to the indebtedness of Massey for advances made by Bryce & Co. to him in that year, represented by the note and account which was secured by the mortgage, and that the same should be applied as of the date or dates when said cotton was sold. That all other payments should be applied in accordance with the directions of the defendant, Massey, at the time the same were made, and that if no direction was given the same should be applied to any indebtedness then due, if so directed or done by J. Y. Bryce & Co. before suit brought, and that in the absence of any such application by either party, the same should be applied to any indebtedness then due not secured by mortgage. And after overruling all other exceptions not embraced in this ruling, he ordered the report to be recommitted to the master to state the accounts on the indebtedness of the year 1870 by note and account, according to the principles stated, and that either party have leave to introduce further evidence as to the particular matters above mentioned.

Under this order the referee made a second report, estimating the entire advances of the year 1870, as follows, to wit: Total advances outside of the note, with interest at two and one-half per cent. per month to January 1st, 1871, $1,538.78; amount of advances included in the note, interest at seven per cent. to January 1st, 1871, $1,472.36; total amount of advances to January 1st, 1871, $3,011.14. This amount he credited with the balance due from the transactions of 1869, $37.92, with damaged bacon, overcharge on bacon, the cotton crop of 1870, and $600 for the three mules, making the aggregate $2,649.21, which being deducted left a balance on the entire advances of 1870, of $361.93, to which interest being added, he found due *on June 12th, 1882, the sum of $651.87 to the plaintiffs, Thatcher & Co., assignees of Bryce & Co. On this reference, testimony was offered by the plaintiffs as to the mules, but this was ruled out, the referee holding that the decree of Judge Pressley had concluded that question, and that under said decree he had no other alternative but to credit the mules on the advances of 1870, and at the price of $600.

To this report both plaintiffs and defendant again excepted. The plaintiffs, because the referee excluded the testimony offered by them as to the value of the mules, on the ground that Judge Pressley had adjudged this matter, fixing the amount to be credited at $600. 2. Because there was no testimony that the value of these mules should be credited on the accounts of 1870, or that their value was $600. And, 3. Because the cotton crop should not have been credited at date of January 1st, 1871, as much of it was received after that date. The defendant, because, first, that the referee did not apply the proceeds of the cotton of 1870, and also all the other credits allowed by him, to the note and account secured by mortgage and agricultural lien, instead of the whole advance of that year; and, second, that he charged interest on the items of the account, outside of the note and account secured by lien and mortgage.

Upon the hearing of this report and exceptions Judge Hudson dismissed the complaint with costs, holding that the value of the mules was properly fixed at $600, and that this sum, with the cotton crop, should be applied to the advances of $2,000, under the agreement, secured by mortgage and agricultural lien, which being done would extinguish the mortgage, leaving the plaintiffs without cause of action.

From this decree the plaintiffs have appealed, and now seek a review not only of this decree, but of the decree of Judge Pressley also, having excepted to both within ten days after the final decree of Judge Hudson. The exceptions to decree of Judge Pressley assign error: first, in that he restricted the referee to the indebtedness of Massey for the year 1870, represented by note and account, aggregating $2,000; second, in that he directed the proceeds of the cotton crop and other payments by Massey to be credited on this sum, when Massey was indebted *to Bryce & Co. upon other large amounts growing out of the transactions of 1870, 1871, 1872 and 1873, besides other large claims; and, third, because interest on the note of $1,455 should have been allowed at thirty per cent. per annum.

The decree of Judge Hudson is objected to on the grounds: first, because the estimate of Massey's indebtedness was restricted to the $2,000, advanced in 1870 and secured by mortgage and lien, when during that year Bryce & Co. advanced some $606.77 over and above the $2,000, besides other advances in 1871 and 1872, which should have been embraced, and upon which the price of the mules and other payments should have been applied, there being no evidence to show that the mules were received in part payment of the advances of 1870, or that Massey so directed such application, and further, that the mules were not worth more than $300; and, second, because the decree of Judge Hudson does not conform to the principles laid down by Judge Pressley.

The respondent denies the right of appellant to have the decree of Judge Pressley reviewed as an intermediate decree, no notice of appeal or exceptions having been filed or given thereto until after the final decree of Judge Hudson. While it would be better practice, for obvious reasons, that exceptions should be filed to the intermediate decree, in view of a possible appeal from the final decree, when, in such event, it would be proper to have the intermediate decree reviewed; yet under the cases of Hyatt v. McBurney, 17 S. C. 143, and Lee v. Fowler, 19 S. C. 607, the omission to file such exceptions is not legal error. The objection, therefore, of respondent cannot avail. Both decrees are before us, and must be considered.

We see no error in the decree of Judge Pressley as to the following matters excepted to. His ruling that the note should be computed at seven per cent. interest after maturity is sustained by Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341, and there is no exception as to interest on the accounts. There can be no question as to the correctness of his direction, that the proceeds of the cotton crop of 1870 should be applied to the note and account secured by the mortgage and agricultural lien, in exclusion of all other indebtedness. This debt of $2,000, by express contract between the parties, had a *positive lien on this cotton, as evidenced by the agricultural lien agreement, which could have been enforced by warrant from the clerk, if any effort had been made of a different application. But the rules laid down by him, by which to determine the application of the other payments—to wit: That they should be credited as directed by the debtor, if any; if not, then at the discretion of the creditor before suit brought; if not, then to such of the debts as were not secured by mortgage—are not in accordance with Heilbron v. Bissell, Bailey Eq. 430, and Brice v. Hamilton, 12 S. C. 32. These cases decide that the creditor has until verdict or judgment to apply the payments, instead of before "suit brought" as stated by the Circuit judge. The case of Jones v. Kilgore, 2 Rich. Eq. 64, is not in conflict with Heilbron v. Bissell, and Brice v. Hamilton, as that case does not determine when the creditor shall make the application. Nor is there any case which confines it to "suit brought." Judge Pressley, as we understand his decree, did not undertake to decide what application should be made of any of the payments, except the proceeds of the cotton crop. These he did adjudge should be applied to the $2,000 secured by mortgage and agricultural lien, and in this we concur. As to the other payments, he determined the principle, but, as we think, incorrectly, by which they should be applied, recommitting the report to be reformed in accordance therewith, directing the referee to confine his investigations as to Massey's indebtedness for the year 1870. The fact that he confined the referee to a computation of Massey's indebtedness for the year 1870 did not determine that all the payments, including the cotton crop, should be applied to that indebtedness alone; on the contrary, the application of the payments other than the cotton crop was to be governed by the rules which he laid down.

This brings us to the decree of Judge Hudson. There is no error in this decree so far as the credits other than the value of the mules are concerned. There can be no doubt that the proceeds of the cotton should be credited on the note and account secured by the mortgage and agricultural lien, for the reason already given, and we concur with Judge Hudson, that the value of the mules was properly fixed at $600. Judge Pressley left *the application of this sum open, to be determined by the rules which he laid down. But the referee, supposing that he was concluded by the decree of Judge Pressley, declined to hear testimony on the subject, and applied his credits to the entire advances of 1870. Judge Hudson does not appear to have made any ruling on the question whether the referee should have allowed further testimony as to the value of the mules and the application thereof, but he overruled the referee's application, and directed it to the note and account secured by mortgage, to wit, the $2,000 portion of the advances of 1870. There is no exception to this decree in that it made no ruling as to the power of the referee on the second reference on the question of the value of the mules and the application thereof; but the exception as to this point is, that Judge Hudson erred in directing the application to the $2,000 debt alone, to the exclusion of the excess of the advances for the year 1870, and other indebtedness of Massey.

Inasmuch as according to the cases cited supra, Bryce & Co., the creditors, had until judgment to make the application, in the absence of an application by Massey, the debtor, at the time of payment, and as the decree of Judge Pressley limited this privilege as to the creditor to "suit brought," which Judge Hudson sustained, under this ruling Bryce & Co. have been deprived of the opportunity of directing such application, which is their right; under these circumstances it was error to apply the value of the mules as directed in the decree. In our opinion, the payments, other than the value of the mules, should first be applied to the $2,000 debt—the proceeds of the cotton at the date of the sales. This will leave a small balance due on this debt, and whether any portion of the value of the mules shall be made to this balance, or whether the whole of that credit shall go to excess of the advances of 1870, over the secured $2,000 debt, or to other indebtedness due at the time the mules were received, must be left to the discretion of Bryce & Co. to exercise before judgment, in the absence of any application by Massey at the time he sold said mules, which facts can only be determined perhaps by another reference.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Cir*cuit Court be modified so as to leave the question as to the application of the value of the mules open, to be determined according to the principles hereinabove, and that in all other respects it be affirmed. Let the case be remanded to the Circuit Court.

BOWMAN v. BAILEY.

[Dower ⊂⊃44.]

Real estate was purchased by A. and B., partners in a mercantile business, for partnership purposes; A. sold his interest to B., but made no deed, and subsequently they both signed a deed conveying the land to a stranger. Afterwards B. died. Held, that his widow was entitled to dower in the one-half interest held by B. under the deed to A. and B., but not in the other half, to which B. never had a legal title.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, April, 1882.

The case is thus stated in the decree of Mr. Douthit, Probate judge, filed January 21st, 1881:

This is a case in which the petitioner claims dower as the widow of William Bowman, deceased, in lands which were conveyed to Simeon Hughes and William Bowman, and which were purchased by them for the purpose of erecting a storehouse to carry on the mercantile business, and was paid for out of the partnership funds. They did erect a building thereon for said purpose, and it was used by them for the purpose of carrying on said business for several months. Hughes then sold his half interest in said property to Bowman with the understanding between them that Bowman was to sell it to Wm. C. Bailey, the defendant herein. Bowman settled with Hughes for his interest in said property, but he did not take a deed for the same, but he and Hughes, as the firm of Hughes & Bowman, conveyed said property to the said Bailey. This was done a few days before they made their final settlement with each other, at which time the said firm was insolvent.

These being the facts, the court is of opinion and so decides:

*I. That as the property was paid for, held and used by the said Hughes and Bowman as partners in trade, that it was partnership property.

II. That though said Hughes did sell his interest in the same to Bowman, and was paid for the same by him, that this could not affect Bailey, as there is no evidence going to show that he (Bailey) had any knowledge of such sale.

III. That the petitioner is not entitled to dower in the whole of said property, as her husband, the said Bowman, was never seized of one-half the same, but simply had an equitable title thereto, of which the defendant herein had no knowledge.

IV. That the petitioner is entitled to dower in one-half of said property, as it passed out of the partnership to a stranger, who was not privy to the trust, but holds the property discharged thereof.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that a writ for the admeasurement of dower do issue from this court, &c.

This decree was confirmed by the Circuit Court, and both parties appealed.

Mr. L. K. Clyde, for demandant.

The deed to Hughes & Bowman made no reference to a partnership, but was to them as joint tenants—dower then attached, and no act or declaration of the husband could defeat it. 11 Rich. 423; 6 Ibid. 269; 12 S. C. 465. Evidence that it was partnership property was therefore improperly received. 1 Bay 451. The widow then unquestionably had dower in half the land. 2 Strobh. 70. She is also entitled to dower in the whole land. His equitable title to the half purchased from Hughes became merged in the legal title he already held. Ibid. See, too, 2 Bl. Com. 131; 2 Story Eq. Jur., § 1212; 1 Wms. Ex. 581. Bailey's ignorance is no defense. 5 S. C. 275; 17 Id. 563. If partnership property, it ceased to be so when Hughes sold to Bowman. Before that, creditors of the firm might have subjected it as personalty to the payment of their claims, but not afterwards. The widow therefore is dowable of this land. Pars. Partn. 386.

The evidence said to be incompetent was received without objection, but it was competent. Pars. Partn. 364; 2 Kent Com. 39; Lind. Part. 193. As to Hughes' half, Bowman had neither title nor possession, and in that half there could be no dower even if they were joint tenants. Washb. Real Prop. 216. But she is not entitled to dower even in one-half. This was partnership property. Pars. Partn. 364; 3 Kent Com. 39; Story Part. 135; Washb. Real Prop. 200; Harp. Eq. 25. A widow has no dower in partnership property; 2 Desaus. 472. There is a vast difference between a partnership and a joint tenancy. Story Part., § 90; Lind. Part. 207; Pars. Partn. 2; Freem. March 13th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. In this case, the petitioner, by proceedings originally instituted in the Court of Probate, and carried thence, by appeal, to the Court of Common Pleas, demanded dower in a certain tract of land of which, as she alleged, her husband had been seized during coverture, and had in his life-time conveyed to the defendant. It seems that the land in question was conveyed by one Shumate to Simeon Hughes and William Bowman (the husband of petitioner); that Hughes and Bowman were partners in a mercantile business; that the land was bought as a site for a store which was erected thereon, and was paid for with partnership money. *Some time afterwards Bowman bought out Hughes' interest in the land and settled with him for it, but took no deed, with the understanding that Bowman was to sell the property to the defendant, Bailey. Something was said by Hughes to Bowman about making him a deed for his interest, but Bowman said it was not necessary as they could unite in the deed to Bailey, which was done.

The Probate Judge held that the petitioner was entitled to dower in one-half, but not in the other half of the land, and from his decree both parties appealed to the Circuit Court, which affirmed the decree of the Court of Probate. This appeal now comes up from the Circuit Court, in which both parties allege error; the petitioner, because she was not allowed dower in the whole of the land; and the defendant, because there was no right of dower in any portion of the land.

The conclusion reached by the Circuit judge is so fully sustained by the case of Reed v. Kennedy, 2 Strobh. 67, which is so much like this case as to be almost identical with it, that it is scarcely necessary for us to do more than refer to that case. In that case, as in this, the land was conveyed to two persons who were copartners in a mercantile business, and paid for with the partnership funds. After the dissolution of the partnership the husband of demandant conveyed his interest to his copartner, under whom the defendant claimed, and it was held that the widow was entitled to dower in the one-half of which her deceased husband had been seized. As is said in 1 Washb. Real Prop., Book I., Chap. VII., § 2, ¶ 12: "Whether the widow of a deceased partner shall be entitled to dower in lands purchased and held by the partners, has been frequently discussed, and it is not easy to reconcile all the cases, especially the early ones, with the law as now understood, nor will it be attempted here. Though it may sometimes depend upon the character which the parties intended to give to lands held by them for their joint and mutual benefit, yet it may be laid down as a general proposition, that, if real estate is purchased by two or more parties, and paid for out of partnership funds, and held for partnership purposes, it will be regarded in law as held by the several partners as tenants in common, yet, in equity, it *is so far regarded in the light of personalty as to be subject, under an implied trust, to be sold and applied, if necessary, for the payment of the partnership debts. Nor can the widow of one of such partners claim dower out of any part of such estate, except such as may not be required for the payment of the partnership debts. Of that she may claim her dower both at law and in equity." In this case the partnership creditors are not before the court making any claim, and, therefore, it is not necessary to consider or determine the question whether partnership creditors may not, in equity, subject real estate bought with the partnership funds to the payment of their debts, in derogation of the widow's right of dower. Here the controversy is between the widow and a purchaser from her deceased husband, and we think that she is entitled to dower in one-half, the interest of her deceased husband, in the land in question.

The remaining inquiry is, whether the fact that the husband had bought and paid for the interest of the other joint owner, but had taken no deed therefor, entitles her to claim dower in the other half also. We do not think so. Seizin of the husband during coverture is essential, and here the husband was never seized. He at most only had a right, in equity, to compel a conveyance from his joint owner for his interest, and this he never did, and never even took any steps towards doing. On the contrary, he declined to take a conveyance when offered, for the reason, doubtless, that he was about to sell to defendant, and it would be more convenient and less expensive to make one, rather than two deeds. Under these circumstances, we do not see that the husband ever had any such seizin, even in equity, as would entitle his widow to claim dower in the half which was never conveyed to him, but which, at his instance, was conveyed directly to the defendant. See the cases cited in 1 Washb. Real Prop., Book I., Chap. VII., § 3, ¶ 13 and 14.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*DEVEREUX v. TAFT.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Mortgages ⇐295.]

A mechanics' lien was entered against property upon which rested the lien of an older mortgage. Subsequently the mortgage was assigned to a stranger, who thereafter became the purchaser of the property at a tax sale and took tax titles. Held, that the purchase at a tax sale by the assignee of the mortgage extinguished the mortgage debt, and the mechanics' lien remained as the only lien upon this property in the hands of its purchaser.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 823; Dec. Dig. ⇐295.]

[2. Mortgages ⇐151.]

Amounts paid by the mortgagee for taxes and insurance on the property have not a priority over the mechanics' lien; for, even if the mortgage debt had not been extinguished by the purchase, there was no provision in the mortgage securing such payments by its lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 368; Mortgages, Dec. Dig. ⇐151.]

[3. Interest ⇐18.]

Accounts secured by mechanics' lien are like other open accounts, unliquidated, and do not bear interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. ⇐18.]

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, June, 1883.

This was an action by John H. Devereux against C. C. Bowen, executor of Susan P. Bowen, to enforce a mechanics' lien. After the death of C. C. Bowen it was revived and continued against W. N. Taft, in his own right and as administrator with the will annexed of Susan P. Bowen, G. W. Dingle, administrator of C. C. Bowen, and Mrs. Mary Taft. The case was referred to the master, W. D. Clancy, Esq., to inquire and report upon the issues of law and fact involved, with leave to report any special matter. He made reports, as stated in the opinion of this court, in April and June, 1883, to which, inter alia, the following exceptions were taken by the plaintiff:

3. Because the master erred, in that he should have found that W. N. Taft, the assignee of the said mortgage, having purchased the mortgaged premises at a tax sale, thereby merged the mortgage in the fee and extinguished the lien thereof.

6. Because the master erred in recommending that the said W. N. Taft be refunded all amounts expended by him for taxes and insurance on the premises before the debt he reports due to J. H. Devereux be paid.

7. Because the master erred in ruling that the plaintiff was *not entitled to recover interest on the balance due him, the subject of mechanics' lien.

The master's report was confirmed by the Circuit judge, and from his decree plaintiff appealed to this court "upon the exceptions heretofore filed to the report of Master Clancy." Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. DeB. McCrady, for appellant.

By his purchase at tax sale, Taft has extinguished his lien. 1 Jones Mort., §§ 680, 711, 715; Tax Act of 1874, § 9; 1 McCord 400; Bailey Eq. 338; 6 Rich. Eq. 343; 9 Id. 53; 6 S. C. 316. Passages may be cited from Jones on Mortgages to show that there is no merger in such a case, but the authorities upon which he bases his text are from States which adhere to the old common law mortgage. See 1 Jones Mort., § 873. In this State a mortgage is a lien and not an estate. His purchase, however, did not discharge the mechanics' lien. Tax Act of 1874, § 99. Taft cannot be re-imbursed for taxes and insurance; the mortgage did not provide for such payments, and he paid either as volunteer or owner. Plaintiff having been kept out of money, for which he holds a lien, he is entitled to interest. 2 Spears 536.

Mr. E. McCrady, Jr., same side.

Mr. B. J. Whaley, contra.

There can be no merger when there is an intervening lien or estate which would be paid to the detriment of him whose rights are merged. 16 S. C. 330; 1 Jones Mort., §§ 848, 857, 870–873. The taxes and insurance were necessary to save the security. There can be no interest on plaintiff's demand. It is not an account stated; it has always been disputed, and the amount in doubt. The lien, having been filed after Mrs. Susan Bowen's death, conferred no specific lien. Chic. L. N., June 30th, 1883. The mechanics' lien was waived as to this mortgage, for the mortgage was given to secure money advanced to pay plaintiff. Crooks v. Finney, S. C. Ohio, 1883.

Mr. Justice McIVER. Between September 4th, 1873, and December 11th, 1875, the plaintiff entered into a verbal contract with C. C. Bowen (now deceased), as the agent of his wife, Susan P. Bowen (now also deceased), to furnish the materials and erect a dwelling-house for her on a lot situate on Sullivan's Island. On December 11th, 1875, Susan P. Bowen died testate and C. C. Bowen duly qualified as executor of her will. On February 21st, 1876, the plaintiff, within ninety days after the completion of the work contracted to be done, filed in the clerk's office of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county a statement of the balance claimed to be due, with a notice of claim of lien on said building, under the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided.

On June 20th, 1874, Susan P. Bowen executed her promissory note to the plaintiff, payable six months after date, for the sum of $3,000, and to secure the payment thereof executed to the plaintiff, on the same day, a mortgage on the premises upon which the mechanics' lien was claimed. On the same day the plaintiff duly indorsed said note and had the same discounted by one Andrew Simonds, and at the same time assigned the mortgage to said Simonds. At the maturity of this note, to wit, on December 23d, 1874, it was retired by the execution of a renewal of the same, for the same amount, no payments having at that time been made. On June 3d, 1881, Simonds, for valuable consideration, sold the note to the defendant, W. N. Taft, and duly assigned to him the said mortgage; W. N. Taft became the purchaser at tax sale of the premises in question, and holds two tax titles therefor, one dated November 9th, 1881, and the other October 20th, 1882.

In the meantime, C. C. Bowen died intestate, to wit, on June 23d, 1880, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his widow, Mary Bowen, and one child, who has subsequently died; and letters of administration upon his estate have been duly granted to the defendant, G. W. Dingle. Subsequently, the widow of C. C. Bowen intermarried with the defendant, W. N. Taft, and on the ——— day of ———, 1882, letters of administration de bonis non with the will *annexed upon the estate of Susan P. Bowen, were duly granted to said Taft.

The main question presented by this appeal is, Which is entitled to the prior lien upon the premises in question, the mortgage now held by the defendant, Taft, as assignee, or the mechanics' lien in favor of the plaintiff? The Circuit judge held that the mortgage was entitled to priority, and ordered the premises sold and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of the costs of this suit and the sale, next to the mortgage debt held by Taft, and to certain amounts paid by him for taxes and insurance on the property, and then to the debt of the plaintiff secured by the mechanics' lien; and if any balance should remain, that it be paid to the administrator of Susan P. Bowen, to be administered according to law. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, upon several grounds set out in the "Case," but, from the view which we take, it will only be necessary to consider the third, sixth, and what may be called the seventh ground, though it is not so numbered, for, under our view, the other questions will not arise.

The point made by the third ground is, that the purchase of the mortgaged premises at a tax sale, by W. N. Taft, who was at that time the assignee and holder of the mortgage, and therefore, in reality, the mortgagee, extinguished the mortgage debt. The position is, we think, fully sustained by the authorities in this State. Schnell v. Schroder, Bailey Eq. 334; McLure, Brawley & Co. v. Wheeler, 6 Rich. Eq. 343; Allen v. Richardson, 9 Rich. Eq. 53. In Schnell v. Schroder, Bailey Eq., Boyer held a bond of Schroder, secured by a mortgage on a lot of land, which was sold under a judgment junior to the mortgage and bought by Boyer. Held, that his mortgage debt was thereby extinguished. Johnson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Boyer had, unquestionably, the right to buy and Schroder to sell and release his equity of redemption; and whether he sells, or it is sold under legal authority, the legal consequences are precisely the same."

In McLure, Brawley & Co. v. Wheeler, the mortgagee purchased the mortgaged property under a judgment recovered on one of the notes which his mortgage was given to secure, and it *was held that the mortgage debt was thereby extinguished, and that he was liable to account for certain notes placed in his hands as collateral security for the mortgage debt. In Allen v. Richardson, the same doctrine was applied in the case of one who held a statutory lien under proceedings for partition. Wardlaw, Ch., in that case said: "I conclude that a statutory mortgagee who buys the estate under mortgage, not under process of foreclosure of his lien, extinguishes the debt or claim, with lien on the land." The authority of these cases is recognized in Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C. 334, and again in Trimmier v. Vise, 17 S. C. 503 [43 Am. Rep. 624].

The reason upon which this doctrine is founded, applies with equal force to a purchase at a tax sale, as well as to a purchase directly from the mortgagor, or under an execution. In fact, to use the language of Wardlaw, Ch., supra, a mortgagee who purchases the mortgaged property at any sale, "not under process of foreclosure of his lien," extinguishes his debt and, of course, the lien of his mortgage also. Applying this doctrine to the case in hand, it seems to us that when Taft, the mortgagee, purchased the mortgaged property at the tax sale, as it is admitted that he did do, he thereby extinguished not only the lien of his mortgage, but also the debt which it was given to secure, and that the only remaining lien on the premises was the mechanics' lien in favor of the plaintiff; and that his purchase at the tax sale was subject to such lien. Act of March 19th, 1874, § 99, 15 Stat. 767.

The sixth ground alleges error on the part of the Circuit judge, in ordering the payment of the taxes and insurance paid by Taft in preference to the debt of the plaintiff secured by the mechanics' lien. This point, we think, is well taken; for even if the mortgage debt had not been extinguished by the purchase at the tax sale, we do not see upon what ground these payments could be given a priority over the mechanics' lien. There was no provision in the mortgage providing for the payment of taxes and insurance, and extending the lien of the mortgage over such payments, as is often the case in mortgages; and, therefore, we do not see how they could acquire any lien in the absence of such provision.

The last ground complains of error in not allowing the plaintiff interest on the balance due on his account. We do not see how this account stands upon any better or higher ground, so far *as the interest is concerned, than any other open account. It was an unliquidated demand, and, therefore, not an interest-bearing demand.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

20 S. C. 560

SHELTON v. SHELTON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Dower ⇐40.]

The acceptance by a wife of property conveyed to her present use, under articles of separation in the life-time of the husband, cannot be considered as a jointure operating by force of law as a substitute for, and in satisfaction of, her dower, under section 1800 of the general statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. ⇐40.]

[2. Dower ⇐42.]

While property may be given by a husband to his wife in lieu of dower, thus compelling an election by her, no such intention is indicated by a gift made by the husband to his wife during his life-time for her support while living apart from him, as to lands not embraced in the gift.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 125; Dec. Dig. ⇐42.]

[3. Dower ⇐49.]

It may be that since the constitution of 1868, and the laws passed thereunder, a married woman may, by covenant, bind herself not to claim dower out of her husband's lands; but to have such effect, the covenant must be entirely free from doubt—clear, positive and express in its terms.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 158; Dec. Dig. ⇐49.]

[4. Dower ⇐42.]

No such clear intent appears from the use by a married woman, in articles of separation, of the words "in lieu and in consideration of all claims and demands upon the said M. S. [the husband], or his estate, and I hereby relinquish all further claims upon him for support or otherwise."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. ⇐42.]

[5. Dower ⇐76.]

When a tract of land is subdivided by a will, and devised separately by metes and bounds to three devisees, the widow of testator may demand her dower in one of these subdivided tracts, from the devisee of that tract, without making the other devisees parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 272; Dec. Dig. ⇐76.]

action for dower jointly against all persons in possession of any of the lands.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 267–276; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃76.]

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, April, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case. The Circuit decree (omitting its statement of facts, which is repeated in the opinion,) was as follows:

Isabella Shelton now files her complaint in the Probate Court, demanding dower in the lands of which her husband had died seized, and had devised by his last will. Her claim is resisted *by Dyer Shelton, administrator with the will annexed of Marshall Shelton, and by Sacharissa Shelton (Griffith), to whom the lands in which dower is claimed, were devised by metes and bounds. They resist the demand upon the grounds: first, that the agreement and deed of 1874 was a provision for the demandant in the nature of a jointure, and that she is, by that, barred; second, that if the agreement and deed were not in the nature of a jointure, it was an agreement to relinquish her right of dower, and she is barred by it.

Under the statute found in section 1800 of the general statutes, "every married woman having a jointure, shall not claim, or have title to have any dower," &c. Sir Edward Coke defines jointure to be "a competent livelihood of freehold, for the wife, of lands and tenements to take effect in profit or possession presently after the death of the husband for the life of the wife at least." Such a jointure will bar the right of dower, if four requisites are observed in its creation: first, the jointure must take effect immediately on the death of the husband; second, it must be for her life at least, and not per autre vie, or for any term of years or other smaller estate; third, it must be made to herself and no other in trust for her; fourth, it must be made, and so in the deed particularly expressed, to be in satisfaction of her whole dower, and not of any particular part of it. 4 Bl. Com. *138. It is obvious that the writing in this case does not meet these requirements, and the widow is not barred at law.

It is argued, however, that it is not necessary in equity that the provision for the wife should be stated in express words to be in lieu of dower, if it can be clearly collected from the contents of the instrument that such was the intention, and that in such case the provision would be sustained as an equitable jointure, and held sufficient to bar her dower. It is further insisted that if the papers in this case do not make out a case of equitable jointure, that they make out an agreement upon sufficient consideration upon the part of the wife to relinquish dower.

Both of these latter grounds involve and depend upon the *intention of the parties. If it can be clearly collected from the instrument of writing that it was the intention of parties that dower should be barred or relinquished, and the wife was competent to contract, then she could not recover in this action. The alleged agreement having been made after marriage, would not, before the constitution of 1868, have bound the wife, and she would have had the right, after the death of her husband, to have renounced the provision, and demanded dower as she might elect, but by the constitution of 1868, having been made competent to contract as if she were sole, her post-nuptial contract in relation to dower would bind her as effectually as if made before marriage. Was it the intention of the parties then, to this deed and agreement, that the wife should be barred of or relinquish her dower? For if that was the contract, she is bound by it according to its terms, and cannot now renounce it.

It must be borne in mind that the agreement was made with reference to separation between the parties, and was to, and did, take effect immediately. Marshall Shelton, in his part of the agreement, declares the object and purpose of the gift from him to his wife to be "for her support and use." These words certainly do not signify or indicate a purpose on his part to bar her dower, but to provide for her separate maintenance during her life. Isabella Shelton, in her part of the agreement, binds herself to receive the property to be conveyed "in lieu and in consideration of all claims or demands upon the said Marshall Shelton, or his estate, and hereby relinquish all further claims upon him for support or otherwise." Now, if she had meant to relinquish her right of dower, would she not have said so when she distinctly "relinquished all claims upon him for support or otherwise?" She, as his wife, could claim the comforts of his society and his protection, as well as her rights to be supported. These she renounces as against him, but not one word of that implies a renunciation of her inchoate right of dower. If Marshall Shelton had meant to bar her dower why didn't he say so when he describes in the agreement the objects of the gift. Therefore, I conclude that it cannot be clearly collected from the agreement and deed that it was the intention of the parties to bar or relinquish the right of dower, and unless that intention is distinctly *manifested, the provisions cannot be held to operate as a bar to dower. Vizard v. Longdale, 3 Atk. 8; Walker v. Walker, 1 Ves. Sr. 55; Lord Dorchester v. Effingham, Taml. 279. Neither can the demandant be estopped by the agreement; for it does not appear that she ever agreed to relinquish dower.

As the demandant does not claim out of the lands in which she has a life-estate, but only out of such as have been specifically devised by metes and bounds to the defendant herein, other heirs of Marshall Shelton are not necessary parties, as they have no interest in the action.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that exceptions of demandant to the decree of the Probate Court be sustained, and that the case be remanded for such further steps as may be necessary.

Mr. J. T. Nix, for appellant.
Messrs. Perry & Perry, contra.

March 18th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On June 26th, 1874, Marshall Shelton and his wife, with a view to living separate and apart, entered into an agreement under seal, as follows: "I, Marshall Shelton, of the first part, hereby covenant and agree to give and convey to the said Isabella Shelton for her support and use, the following described property, being her equitable portion of my estate, to wit: One parcel of land, about seventy acres, described in deed of conveyance of this date, for her sole use and benefit during her natural life, with the dwelling thereon. Also, I further agree to give her one cow and calf, one shoat, one bed and bedding, one ewe and lamb, one chest, one spinning-wheel, and whatever of household articles are her individual property. Also the growing crop upon the land conveyed to her by deed and this agreement. I, Isabella Shelton, of the second part, hereby agree and bind myself to receive the above-mentioned property in lieu and in consideration of all claims and demands upon the said Marshall Shelton, or his estate, and hereby relin*quish all further claims upon him for support or otherwise," &c. The deed referred to was executed the same day, giving the said Isabella a life-estate in the said parcel of land with limitation over to their three youngest daughters, Mary Elizabeth, Mahala, and Emily Maria. The said Isabella, leaving her husband, took possession of the property.

In May, 1882, the husband, Marshall, died leaving a will, by which he divided the lands of which he died seized, into three parcels, one of which he gave to his daughter Sacharissa Griffith, one to his daughter Frances Hawkins, and the other he directed to be sold for the payment of debts, &c. Isabella, now a widow, and still retaining possession of the property conveyed to her by the articles of separation and the deed made in conformity thereto (being in amount about one-third of the property of her husband), instituted these proceedings in the Probate Court against Sacharissa Griffith for dower in the lands given to her by her father's will, but she brought no action against the other devisees. Dyer Shelton, administrator with the will annexed of Marshall Shelton, and the said Sacharissa resisted the claim. The Probate judge held that the demandant, Isabella, had not received technical "jointure," so as to be barred of her right of dower, which she had never formally relinquished; but that her covenant in the articles of separation "was intended to relinquish and bar her right of dower," and that, having accepted the property given to her by the articles of separation, she could not retain that, and at the same time make a claim for dower in the remainder of her husband's land given to others, and dismissed the petition.

The demandant, Isabella, appealed to the Circuit Court, and Judge Wallace, sustaining the exceptions, reversed the decree of the Probate judge, and remanded the case for further proceedings in the Probate Court in setting off dower to the demandant. From this judgment the defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because it is respectfully submitted, that his Honor erred in holding that the petitioner was not barred or estopped from claiming dower in the lands of which her husband died seized, by the deed of separation executed by her and her husband and the provisions therein contained. 2. Because his Honor, at least, erred in not holding that the said *deed of separation and the said provisions taken in connection with the husband's will, created a case for election between her claim and dower and the life-estate in the lands conveyed to her. 3. Because his Honor, having held that the petitioner was entitled to dower in the lands of which her husband died seized, and the lands at his death being one tract only, erred in holding that the petitioner could maintain her separate action against the respective devisees, notwithstanding the fact that none of them had gone into possession of their portions, but the entire tract was in the possession and under the control of the administrator with will annexed," &c.

In this case the Circuit decree is so full and clear that very little need be added. The widow's right of dower is one generally regarded by the courts with favor. Chancellor David Johnson, in Gordon v. Stevens, 2 Hill Eq. 47 [27 Am. Dec. 445], said: "It is one over which the husband has no control. He can neither dispose of it by contract in his life-time, nor direct the disposition of it after his death by will or otherwise. She can only dispose of it by her own act or voluntary contract." We agree with both the Probate and the Circuit judge, that the acceptance of the property conveyed to the wife, Isabella, under the articles of separation, in the life-time of the husband, cannot be considered as "jointure," operating by force of law as a substitute for and in satisfaction of her dower, under section 1800 of general statutes. See the case of Gelzer v. Gelzer, Bailey Eq. 388 [23 Am. Dec. 180].

While the husband has no right to control the dower of his wife, he has the right to annex to the disposition of his property any conditions he may think proper, which are not illegal. He may, therefore, make a gift to his wife, with the express declaration that it is in lieu and bar of dower in his estate. This raises a case of election. The wife may decline the gift and insist on dower; but if she accepts it, she takes it with the condition of renouncing dower, and it must necessarily so operate. So far as we are informed, there is nothing in the will of the testator which can, as to the widow, raise a case of election. No gift is made to her in the will, with or without conditions. It does not appear that her name is mentioned in it.

It is, however, insisted that the previous conveyance to the *wife was necessarily in lieu and bar of dower, and raised a case of election. The articles of separation do not state that Marshall Shelton made the conveyance in lieu and bar of dower, but "for her support and use." Suppose that the identical words of the covenant of separation had been a part of Shelton's will, even in that case they would not have excluded dower, for the rule is "that the intent to exclude the right to dower by a voluntary gift must be demonstrated by express words, or by clear and manifest implication, and this implication must arise from some provision in the will, inconsistent with the operation of the claim." Gordon v. Stevens, supra. In the case supposed it would be inconsistent for Mrs. Shelton to make the claim as to the land given her for life, but not as to the other lands of the testator. Cuningham v. Shannon, 4 Rich. Eq. 135; Wilson v. Hayne, Chev. Eq. 40; Shaffer v. Shaffer, 16 S. C. 625.

But it is further said that, in the articles of separation, the demandant voluntarily covenanted that she would not assert her right of dower to any portion of her husband's estate outside of that conveyed to her. The law has prescribed a particular form by which a married woman must relinquish her right of dower. See Townsend v. Brown, 16 S. C. 92. But since the constitution of 1868, and the laws passed thereunder, giving a married woman the right to contract as if she were a feme sole, we suppose that a married woman may so covenant not to claim dower, as to make it binding upon her by way of estoppel. But we would say that the covenant of a married woman, to have that effect in relation to an inchoate right of dower, future and contingent in character, should be entirely free from doubt, clear, positive and express in its terms. The words of Mrs. Shelton's covenant are "in lieu and in consideration of all claims and demands upon the said Marshall Shelton, or his estate, and hereby relinquish all further claims upon him for support or otherwise." It is true these are broad and sweeping terms, but the very peculiar right of dower in the future was not expressly mentioned, and in giving construction to the obligation, it should not be overlooked that the parties were making provision for the wife about to separate from her husband, and the subject naturally uppermost *in their minds was the responsibility of the husband during his life to furnish suitable support and maintenance for his wife.

We do not see why the demandant may not maintain a separate action against one of the devisees without making the others parties. As we understand it, the testator himself made the division of the lands in his will, and gave a particular parcel described by metes and bounds to each one. The will is the title whether the party is in actual possession or not. The demandant has the right not to enforce part of her claim, if she chooses to do so. She may not intend to claim dower in the other parcels. We suppose, however, that she is not asking the dower of the whole lands out of one particular subdivision, but only the dower in that particular parcel belonging to the defendant in the proceeding.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The interest affected which disqualifies witnesses as to transactions with persons deceased, (Code, § 400,) means the interest promoted; parties are not disqualified from giving testimony against their interest. Therefore, in action by the administrator for settlement of an ancestor's estate, two of the distributees, parties to the action, may prove the execution by their ancestor, as principal debtor of a note which they signed as sureties.

Before Wallace, J., Anderson, March, 1883.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. C. C. Featherston, for appellants.

Mr. J. L. Tribble, contra.

March 18th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by Jesse Robinson, as administrator of his mother, Sarah Robinson, to sell the real estate of intestate in aid of personal property to pay debts and for partition. The heirs were all parties, viz.: Richard Robinson, James Robinson, Anna Robinson, Mary McDonald, Elizabeth Hinton, Isaac Robinson, Sallie H. Rickets, Nancy M. Smith and R. A. J. Robinson. The administrator, Jesse Robinson, was also one of the heirs, but his interest in the lands of the intestate had been levied on and sold under execution and purchased by J. C. C. Featherston, and, in respect of his interest, he also became a party.

Under a call for the creditors of the intestate, Sarah, to present and prove their demands, Richard Robinson, one of the heirs, presented a note, of which the following is a copy:

"On or before the 25th day of December, 1869, we, or either of us, promise to pay Richard Robinson, Adm., of the estate of John Robinson, deceased, or bearer, the sum of one hundred and sixty dollars, for value received. Nov. 28th, 1868. Witness my hand and seal.

"James Robinson, [L. S.]
"Jesse Robinson. [L. S.]

"To be stamped when had."

*569

*Mr. Featherston, representing one of the distributees (Jesse), objected that the note was not proved, because it did not have a revenue stamp upon it, and that it had been paid; or, if not, that it was barred by the statute of limitations. Jesse and James Robinson proved (subject to objection) that the note was given for rent of land; that they knew their mother rented lands in 1868 from Richard, as administrator of John Robinson, for $160; that they saw her sign the note for that amount; that at the same time they signed as her sureties, and that they never paid the note. Richard Robinson testified (subject to objection) that the note is his own property and nothing was ever paid on it; that he was administrator of his father, John; that in 1868 he rented the lands of the estate to Sarah Robinson, and for the same she gave him her note for $160; that in the settlement of the personal estate of his intestate, John, in 1870, he accounted for the note and continued to hold it as a debt against his mother. Jesse, the administrator of Sarah, also testified that the note had been regularly presented to him, as administrator, and he believed it was still due and unpaid.

The master, W. W. Humphreys, Esq., reported that the note was not proved; that the witnesses offered to prove its execution, viz., Jesse and James Robinson were not competent under section 400 of the code; and further, that in a suit against one on a joint obligation, a co-obligor, not sued, is not a competent witness for the plaintiff to prove the execution of the instrument. Richard Robinson, the creditor, excepted to the report, and Judge Wallace reversed it, holding that the note was proved and should be paid. All the parties acquiesced in this order except J. C. C. Featherston, Mrs. Hinton and Mrs. McDonald, who appeal to this court on the following exceptions:

1. "Because the presiding judge erred in sustaining the exceptions of Richard Robinson, in so far as holding that Jesse Robinson and James Robinson were competent witnesses under the code to prove the execution of the note alleged to have been made by Sarah Robinson.

2. "Because he erred in holding that the note in question was admissible in evidence, when he should have held that the same was invalid and of no effect for want of a revenue stamp.

*3. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the exceptions of J. C. C. Featherston, when he should have sustained the same, and held that Richard Robinson was estopped by his return in the estate of John Robinson from setting up said note.

4. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that if the execution of the note was proved, the same having been accounted for in the estate of John Robinson, Richard Robinson could not recover upon the said note, but his remedy was assumpsit for so much money paid to the use of Sarah Robinson, and such claim was barred by the statute of limitations."

Before the appeal was heard in this court, a preliminary motion was made to strike the name of Mary McDonald from the record as an appellant. In support of the motion, she offered an affidavit that she never authorized the appeal; but Mr. Featherston, the attorney, swears that after the trial below she instructed him "to fight it to the last," and, in confirmation of this, the master, Mr. Humphreys, certifies that when he paid Mrs. McDonald money going to her from the estate of Sarah Robinson in his hands, there was reserved for the purpose of appeal in this case to the Supreme Court the sum of $14.53—her share of the necessary expenses of the appeal. The preponderance of the testimony is that Mrs. McDonald did authorize the appeal, and the motion is refused.

In reference to the note presented by Richard Robinson, the allegation is made that it was not proved; that the alleged signature of the intestate, Mrs. Robinson, by a mark, could not be proved except by an eyewitness, and that Jesse and James, her sons, the only persons who were present, were incompetent witnesses: first, because they were sureties on the note; and, second, because she being dead, and they interested as her heirs and parties to the proceeding, were excluded from proving that they saw her sign it, under section 400 of the code. The first objection cannot be sustained. A note executed by a mark may be proved by one who witnessed it whether he was named as a subscribing witness or not. Gervais v. Baird, 2 Brev. 37; Lyons v. Holmes, 11 S. C. 429 [32 Am. Rep. 483]. The fact that Jesse and James were sureties on the note, did not exclude them from proving that they saw their mother sign it. Leech v. Kennedy, 3

Strobh. *488; Strickland v. Stevens, 12 Rich. 78. In the case of Leech v. Kennedy, Judge Richardson said: "Such cases expound the legal maxim, nemo in sua lite testificare potest, in its proper sense, reason and object, and make the witness offered competent or incompetent, according to his interest or indifference in the question to be solved by his evidence, and holds it immaterial whether he was a party to the original obligation or not."

Jesse and James Robinson were competent witnesses unless excluded by the code. The section (400) invoked, has certainly given rise to much difference of opinion. Its object is plain, to limit the general rule admitting all persons as witnesses, in regard to transactions and communications between a witness and a person dead or insane; but there is sometimes difficulty in applying it. The provision attempts to express so much and to provide for so many cases, in such short compass, that the intention is not always obvious or free from obscurity. The excluding proviso embraces three classes of persons: 1. Parties. 2. Those having an interest to be affected by the event of the action. And, 3. Assignors. Of course the testimony must relate to a transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased. Then they must be offered as witnesses against the party prosecuting or defending as administrator, &c., of such deceased person. And then only where such examination or judgment "can in any manner affect the interest of such witness." "But where such administrator, &c., shall be examined on his own behalf in regard to such transaction or communication, &c., then all other persons, not otherwise rendered incompetent, shall be made competent in relation to such transaction or communication."

Now apply these provisions to this case. In the first place, we have very grave doubt whether the act applies at all; whether the signing of the note by Mrs. Robinson to the creditor, Richard, in the presence of her sons, Jesse and James, who signed as sureties, was a transaction between Jesse and James and their mother in the sense contemplated by the provision. As a transaction, it was entirely with Richard. There was no transaction between Mrs. Robinson and Jesse and James, who signed themselves and were mere spectators of her act in *signing. Lobdell v. Lodbell, 33 How. Pr. 347; Wait Anno. Code 746 and note. But as some of the cases go very far as to what is a transaction with the deceased, we make no ruling on the point.

If this were a simple action at law by the creditor, Richard, against Jesse, as the representative of the estate, there would be no difficulty; for in that state of the pleadings, the administrator, as the representative of the estate, would have had the right to testify as to the execution of the note, and his examination would have opened the door for all others. Brice v. Hamilton, 12 S. C. 36. But the matter is somewhat complicated by the fact that the proceeding is in equity concerning the lands of the estate, as to which the administrator does not represent the estate, and all the distributees who are the legal owners are parties. But without regard to the nature of the action, parties can only be excluded from testifying "where such examination or any judgment in the action can, in any manner, affect the interest of such witness." What is the proper construction of this declaration? Does it mean any interest, whether for himself or against himself; that a witness is excluded from giving testimony, which testimony is directly against his interest? The words "in any manner affect his interest" are very broad, but it seems to us that such was not the intention, but, on the contrary, that the word "interest" indicates nothing more than the mere liability to loss or gain indifferently, and involves the idea of personal advantage, and thus understood the word "affect" is used in the sense of "promote." As it was expressed by Chief Justice Moses, in Boykin v. Watts, 6 S. C. 82: "The obvious purpose and intent of the proviso is to exclude the evidence by a party interested in the event of the suit, of any transaction or communication with a deceased, by which such event may be determined in favor of such witness."

Even by the rule of the common law an adverse interest in the event of the suit would not exclude the witness, or rather in such case it would be considered that he had no disqualifying interest. "A bankrupt is not competent, in an action by his assignees, to prove any fact tending to increase the fund, although both he and his creditors may be witnesses to dimin*ish it. The same is true of a legatee, without a release, and also of an heir or distributee, in any action affecting the estate." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 392; Slead v. Brannon, Rice 298. It was not the intention of this provision of the code to exclude those as witnesses who were competent before. "Where the statute is a mere proviso or saving clause in the act abolishing the common law disqualification of interest, it does not make incompetent such testimony as would be competent at common law." Abb. Tr. Ev. 61. One claiming to be a creditor of Sarah Robinson, deceased, called James Robinson, an heir of the estate, as a witness to prove that the intestate, Sarah, in her life-time, had executed the note. This evidence tended to establish the note, and thereby to diminish the estate, and of course was against the interest of the witness. We think that, although a party to the proceeding, he was not incompetent, under the code, to give such testimony.

We do not think the note was void for want of a revenue stamp. There is no evidence that, by omitting to put a stamp upon the note, the parties intended to evade the law requiring a stamp. The memorandum on the note itself shows that they had no stamp, and when procured one was to be attached. But the law of the United States which required it is now repealed. See Pugh v. McCormick, 14 Wall. 374 [20 L. Ed. 789]; United States v. Buzzo, 18 Wall. 128 [21 L. Ed. 812]; Chit. Cont. 604 and note.

The exception that the note presented by Richard Robinson was paid, for the reason that his return as administrator of John Robinson shows that he had charged himself with the rent, $160, for which the note was given, cannot be sustained. We can see no reason why an administrator may not account for the estate in his hands, advance the shares found due to the distributees and retain the notes given to him as his own property. The authorities cited by the appellant (Cunningham v. Smith, Harp. Eq. 90, and Ex parte Ware, 5 Rich. Eq. 474,) were both cases in which the surety had paid the debt, and the question was, whether he could be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, as to the character of the instrument securing the debt. Such cases have no analogy to this, where neither the principal nor sureties paid the debt, but the money was advanced and the note pur*chased. It was not the duty of the payee, Richard, but of the obligors, to pay the note, which, according to the testimony, they have never done.

There is no presumption of payment, for the time is not sufficient to presume payment of a note under seal, and the proof is positive that it has never been paid.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, March, 1883.

The opinion states the cases.

Mr. L. K. Clyde, for appellants.

Written instruments must be perfect and complete when delivered. A sealed note must be in writing. Bouv. Dict. 186; Story Prom. N., § 9. There must be an obligor and an obligee. Id. A note must have a maker and a payee. Dan. Neg. Inst. 87, 89, 111, 116, 128; Story Prom. N. 40, 42; Byles Bills 63, 147; 4 McCord 239. To arrive at intention, construction is admissible, but that intention must appear upon the face of the instrument itself. Pars., Cont. 550; 1 McCord 41; Rob. Fr. 9; 1 Johns. Ch. 425. There is no material difference of principle *in rules of construction between wills and contracts. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 287. Patent ambiguities in a will cannot be explained by parol; the name of a legatee or devisee, left blank by testator, cannot be supplied by parol. 2 Hill Ch. 15; 3 Bro. Ch. Mr. John R. Bellinger and Stokes & Irvine, same side.

Messrs. Wait & Westmoreland, contra.

The instrument here sued on is not a promissory note, but a single bill. In a sense, all written instruments are simply evidence of contracts. This paper shows that the obligors were indebted to somebody for money received from him, and that this "him" was the person to whom it was delivered. Add. Cont., § 230. The omission of the payee's name was clearly a casus omissus, and who the original payee was may be proved by parol. 1 Greenl. Evid., §§ 275, 277; Spenc. Eq. Jur. 553–557; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. (H. & W.) 410. Proving the payee's name does not alter or vary a word. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 282; 3 Man. & G. 452; 5 Fost. 128; 2 R. I. 319; 5 Hurlst. & N. 117. Parol evidence is admissible to show a consideration different from that stated. 5 Rich. 305. It may surely then be shown to whom the consideration is to go. It may be otherwise as to negotiable instruments, but see 3 McCord 482. There was clearly a payee in this case, only his name was not expressed. 3 Rich. 133.

March 18th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The two cases stated first in the title were proceedings in equity, and heard together on Circuit. In them an order was made calling in the creditors of B. F. Tarrant, deceased; and under this order Rhoda H. Waddell, claiming to be a creditor of the estate, presented for proof an instrument of which the following is a copy.

"$698.89. One day after date we, or either of us, promise to pay six hundred ninety-eight dollars and eighty-nine cents, with *interest annually, for value received of him, as witness we set our hands seals, Sept. 7, 1864.

"B. F. Tarrant, [L. S.]
"P. H. Tarrant. [L. S.]"

This paper was accompanied by an affidavit of Rhoda H. Waddell, that "she is the owner and holder of the note, and that no part thereof has been paid, and that said note was given in renewal of an old note prior to 1861." The master reported the note as a valid claim against the estate, and the administrator, C. B. Tarrant, excepted to the report on the ground, principally, that "said instrument is fatally defective as a sealed note, single bill or bond, in that it is payable to no one, and is a nullity." Judge Wallace, in recommitting the report as to other claims, also recommitted it as to this claim, holding, however, that the omission of the name of the payee might be supplied by parol evidence. From this order C. B. Tarrant, the administrator of B. F. Tarrant, appeals to this court.

The case stated third in the title, R. H. Waddell v. P. H. Tarrant, was an action at law by Mrs. Waddell against P. H. Tarrant, one of the sureties on the sealed note copied above. The complaint stated substantially the same matter as was contained in her affidavit made before the master in the other case, viz.: That she is the owner and holder of the note; that it was given in renewal of an old one, and is still due and unpaid. The defendant demurred that the plaintiff had not capacity to sue, and that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Judge Wallace sustained the demurrer, but gave the plaintiff leave to amend her complaint. The defendant appealed to this court upon grounds substantially the same as those in the case first stated. They are set out in full in the brief and need not be restated here.

These cases, arising out of the same instrument and involving substantially the same question, were argued together, and we will consider them in the same manner. The exceptions in various forms state the objection to the orders below; but they may be condensed into the single proposition,

"that said instrument is *fatally defective as a sealed note, single bill or bond, in that it is made payable to no one; and parol evidence is not admissible to supply the name of the payee."

The paper in contention here is certainly neither a bill nor promissory note, negotiable by delivery, as to which class of instruments it seems to be necessary that the parties shall appear and be disclosed by the bare inspection of the paper. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 111. But it is an instrument under seal promising to pay, but not to order or bearer. Still, if there never was a payee, and the paper expressed the whole truth of the transaction, we suppose that there could be no recovery, for the simple reason that it takes two to make a binding contract, and in that case there would be no contract or person to receive the money. But, as a matter of fact, can there be a doubt that there was a payee? All the circumstances and the paper itself prove it. Three persons signed an obligation in all other respects perfect, promising circumstantially to pay so much money "one day after date, with interest payable annually, for value received of him." And this obligation must have been delivered to some one, as it is now presented and payment demanded. All this is utterly inconsistent with the idea that there was no other party but the obligors, and points unmistakably to an obligee from whom the value was "received," and to whom the promise to pay was made. We are not allowed fairly to conjecture that the parties were dealing with no one, but were consciously making false statements, and performing a solemn mockery in doing an act utterly nugatory.

Assuming then, as beyond all doubt, that the parties dealt with a payee in the flesh, it appears that by some oversight or accident the name of that payee was omitted in the obligation executed, and the question is whether parol proof is admissible to show who was the person that advanced his money, and to whom the promise was made. In dealing with the contract of parties it is, of course, desirable so to interpret and enforce them as to carry out the intention of the parties, if that can be done without doing violence to some settled principle or rule of law. But there are rules of evidence so important that they must be adhered to, even at the sacrifice of the intention in particular *cases. Is there any rule which absolutely requires us to close our ears to parol evidence tending to show who the payee was in this transaction? There is no doubt of the general rule that "parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written agreement."

This is a most salutary rule, necessary to prevent frauds and perjuries, and to protect the real intention of parties; but, if applied without discrimination, it may be found to promote the very things it was intended to prevent. The rule has special reference to the words used in the instrument, and the intention of the parties; as, for example, in the familiar case of a latent ambiguity. Mr. Greenleaf says: "It is thus apparent that the rule excludes only parol evidence of the language of the parties contradicting, varying or adding to that which is contained in the written instrument: and this because they have themselves committed to writing all which they deemed necessary to give full expression to their meaning, and because of the mischiefs which would result if verbal testimony were in such cases received. But where the agreement in writing is expressed in short and incomplete terms, parol evidence is admissible to explain that which is per se unintelligible, such explanation not being inconsistent with the written terms." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 282.

In the case before us the instrument is manifestly imperfect, in omitting the name of the payee, and the evidence offered is not inconsistent with the written terms; but, on the contrary, is in direct accord with these terms. It does not vary or contradict a single line or word of them, but accepting the whole instrument as it stands, simply applies it to the right person, according to the contract and intention of the parties. It was properly admitted in the argument, that if a blank space had been left in the note for the name of the payee that would have shown the intention of the parties, and thereby made the parol testimony competent. We have no doubt whatever of the intention, and that being assumed, a blank for the name, larger or smaller, can make no difference.

It seems to us that the very terms of the note itself make a case, authorizing the introduction of parol testimony. The *unknown person, to whom the promise was made, was the same from whom the consideration came, "for value received of him." The reference here is manifestly to the payee, and suppose the promise had been in terms directly to "him," without inserting any name, could there be any doubt of the right to explain by parol testimony what was the meaning of the parties in making the word "him." The word "him" is a pronoun used for a noun before stated, indicating a person. If the note, instead of using the word "him," had used its equivalent, "the said Waddell," the matter would not have needed explanation.

In Bradley v. The W. A. & G. Steam Packet Company, 13 Pet. 99 [10 L. Ed. 72]; Mr. Justice Barbour summarizes the rule as follows: "Sometimes it has been applied to deeds, sometimes to wills and sometimes to mercantile and other contracts. In some cases it has been resorted to in order to ascertain which of several persons was intended; in others, which of several estates. In some to ascertain the identity of the subject; in others, its extent. In some to ascertain the meaning of a term, where it had acquired by use a particular meaning; in others, to ascertain in what sense it was used, where it admitted of several meanings. But in all the purpose was the same—to ascertain by this medium of proof the intention of the parties, where, without the aid of such evidence, that could not be done, so as to give a just interpretation to the contract," &c.

In the United States v. Hardyman, 13 Pet. 178 [10 L. Ed. 113], it was held, that these words in a note "with interest at the rate of one M. per centum" could be explained by parol testimony, showing that the letter "M." meant "mill."

In Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 1 Wall. 234 [17 L. Ed. 524], a note was made payable to O. C. Cole, "cashier," without indicating the bank of which he was "cashier," held that parol testimony was allowable to show that he was "cashier" of plaintiffs' bank, and that in taking the paper he was acting as "cashier" and agent of that corporation.

In Kinney v. Flynn, 2 R. I. 319, there was an acknowledgment of indebtedness in these letters and words, "I. O. U. the sum of $160, which I shall pay on demand to you." It was held that parol evidence was admissible to show the person to *whom it was addressed. In our case of Davega v. Moore, 3 McCord 482, the instrument was a promissory note payable "to order" without mentioning the name of any payee, and it was held that, like a note payable to a fictitious person, it might be recovered by any bona fide bearer thereof.

Leave was given in both cases to offer other evidence, and the defendants, respectively, may, if so advised, make the questions of presumed payment from lapse of time and as to the note being a confederate transaction, without prejudice.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases stated in the title, be affirmed.

*No. 1493. STATE v. ANDERSON. November Term, 1883. The defendant was indicted for murder and convicted. The "agreed statement," as presented to this court, gave a very brief and insufficient history of the case, no exceptions were taken, and no arguments here submitted; but, as it involved an issue of the gravest character, the court looked into the brief for errors and supposed objections. The case seemed to be one of circumstantial evidence. Held—

[1. Criminal Law ⊂⊃829.]

That there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge (Wallace) in failing to charge "that the testimony must not only show the guilt of the prisoner, but must not be capable of explanation by any other reasonable hypothesis," especially when no request so to charge was presented, and this proposition was made in argument by defendant's counsel, and conceded by the State's attorney, and when the judge did explain "to the jury the difference between circumstantial and positive evidence, and fully instructed them that the prisoner's guilt must be demonstrated to them, beyond a reasonable doubt, before they could convict on either kind of testimony."

[2. Criminal Law ⊂⊃419, 420.]

That statements made by the deceased as to quarrels, &c., with another person, were hearsay evidence, and, therefore, properly excluded.

Nos. 1494, 1495, 1496. Ex parte EDWARD F. STOKES. November Term, 1883. Petition for rehearing in three cases in which the appeals had been dismissed under rule XI. of this court. Motions refused per curiam, January 16th, 1884.

No. 1497. RENNEKER v. WARREN. November Term, 1883.

[Appeal and Error ⊂⊃807.]

This was an application to re-instate on the docket an appeal *which had been dismissed by this court. But as no notice of intention to appeal had been given to respondent or his attorney, within ten days after the rising of the court, as imperatively required by statute, (Code, §§ 348, 349,) the court has no power to remedy this omission.

Motion refused per curiam, January 16th, 1884.

No. 1499. WARDLAW v. ERSKINE. November Term, 1883.

[Appeal and Error ⊂⊃807.]

This was a motion to re-instate on the docket an appeal which had been dismissed by the clerk under rules I. and II. Notice of intention to appeal having been duly given, the court held that they had the power to relieve the appellants from the consequences of other omissions in the perfecting of their appeal. Code, § 349. And being satisfied that there had been no culpable negligence or intent to delay on the part of the appellants, and, especially, as no delay would be caused by granting the relief asked, the court granted the motion.

No. 1503. PRATT v. McGHEE. November Term, 1883.

[Appeal and Error ⊂⊃1097.]

This case brought up the question, whether this court, at a former hearing (Pratt v. McGhee, 17 S. C. 428), decided the rights of the parties in regard to the personalty. Judge Witherspoon held that it did, and, on appeal, his decree was affirmed, this court holding that their former judgment not only decided that the devise lapsed, but considered and determined the question of the lapse of the personal bequest to John Robert Ellis adversely to his children; that the question so determined was properly before the court, and the defendants are concluded by that decision. No. 1518. CURETON v. STOKES. November Term, 1883.

[Appeal and Error ⊂⊃248.]

P. D. Cureton brought this action against E. F. Stokes, on two sealed notes, one promissory note, and for money paid by plaintiff as surety for defendant on a note to one Sullivan, the four causes of action being separately stated in the complaint. The summons was issued in November, 1882, and was for relief. *Defendant demurred: 1. That several causes of action were improperly united. 2. That there was a defect of parties plaintiff. 3 That plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue. 4. That the court had no jurisdiction—the summons being for relief and the complaint for a money demand. 5. That complaint does not correspond with summons. 6. That complaint is not verified. 7. That the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action or of the person of defendant. On March 31st, 1883, Judge Wallace overruled the demurrer and ordered defendant to answer by April 3d next, and that the cause be transferred to calendar No. 1, for trial at the present term. "Defendant excepted to the order, in every particular, and submits that the demurrer should have been sustained, the summons and complaint dismissed, and in no event should an answer have been required to be served within the time limited." Held, that the appeal might be dismissed for the want of proper exceptions; however, considering the questions involved, it is obvious that the grounds specified in the demurrer are patently untenable, and have no foundation whatever; and the order of the judge was not beyond the power conferred upon him by section 193 of the code.

No. 1530. SCARBOROUGH v. SPENCER. November Term, 1883.

This was a controversy submitted without action, raising the question whether defendant was bound to perform his written agreement with plaintiff, as trustee, to purchase a certain tract of land. The land had been conveyed to the plaintiff and his heirs in trust to pay from the rents, &c., a debt to J. and certain mortgages, and then from the income, &c., to pay for the support and maintenance of the family of C. S. and the education of his children—"it being understood that, with the consent of the said C. S., in writing, the said trustee shall have power to sell all or any portion of those several premises to carry out the trusts above created; and, also, that the said trustee shall have the authority to sell any portion of said lands, to change the investment, or reinvest the proceeds of sale in other property, and to do any act in regard to the said property now conveyed, with the consent of the said C. S., that the said C. S., could do were the fee-*simple vested in him; and further in trust, after the death of the said C. S., all legal incumbrances on said lands being first satisfied, to divide said lands, or the proceeds of the sale of said lands, among the wife and children of the said C. S., or among the children in case the said C. S. should leave no wife, according to the statute of distributions of the State of South Carolina."

The trustee paid the debts, and, by written consent of C. S., contracted in writing to sell the land to defendant. In the written consent of C. S., given to the trustee to make the sale, the proceeds were ordered to be applied to certain debts and liabilities contracted by the said C. S., or for the support and maintenance of his family, and of expenses of management of the trust property, the balance to be divided between his wife and children. Defendant refused to comply, alleging that the purpose of the sale was to work a revocation of the trust deed, which the trustee could not do. The Circuit judge (Cothran) decreed specific performance of the contract, and on appeal this decree was affirmed.

No. 1531. TOMPKINS v. TOMPKINS. November Term, 1883.

[Mortgages ⊂⊃479.]

Plaintiff brought action for foreclosure of mortgage, making a junior judgment creditor a party defendant. This defendant answered, admitting the mortgage, but alleging that certain rents received from the mortgaged property, and from a policy of fire insurance, should be credited on the mortgage. On this defendant's motion, Judge Hudson referred the cause to a master to "take testimony and state the amounts due upon the mortgage debt and upon the judgment, and report the same to this court, all equities reserved." Plaintiff appealed from this order, upon the ground that the issues of law should have been decided by the court before a reference was ordered, and that it was error to refer the cause to a master to decide issues of law and fact. Held, that the order authorized a report on the facts of the case, including the facts connected with the alleged credits but not a decision of the legal questions involved, and that the order of reference was proper.

*No. 1537. McFADDEN v. TANT. November Term, 1883.

[Justices of the Peace ⇐171.]

This was an action for claim and delivery of a horse, judgment being rendered for defendant by the trial justice, on January 9th, 1882. Plaintiff appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, where it was heard in November, 1882, plaintiff claiming a trial de novo. The presiding judge (Aldrich) ruled that, under the provisions of section 358 of the code of procedure, which went into effect on May 1st, 1882, the appeal must be heard on the original papers sent up by the trial justice, without a jury, and without the examination of witnesses. To this ruling plaintiff excepted, and his appeal being dismissed, he further appealed to this court, upon the ground, inter alia, that "his Honor erred in ruling that an appeal taken from a trial justice's court prior to May 1st, 1882, must be tried on the papers sent up from the inferior court." Upon this ground the judgment of the Circuit Court was reversed, this court holding that the change in the law of appeals from trial justices' courts, as enacted in section 358 of the code, did not apply to trials had before a trial justice prior to May 1st, 1882. Citing Lynch's Code, § 369; Ex parte Graham, 13 Rich. 283; Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C. 481, and that plaintiff was entitled to a trial de novo in the Circuit Court.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, March 13th, 1884. L. T. Izlar, for appellant. No counsel contra.

No. 1538. DONALDSON v. WARD. November Term, 1883. This was an action to recover the amount of an account for rice sold by plaintiff to defendant. A counterclaim was pleaded. Judgment was for defendant (Kershaw, J.), and a motion on a "case containing exceptions" was heard at the next term by Fraser, J., and refused. Plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds, only the first two of which were pressed in argument:

"1. Because the verdict rendered in said cause is against both the law and the weight of evidence. 2. That the damages given by the jury in said cause are excessive, unreasonable and unjust. 3. That the verdict rendered by the jury is illogical. 4. That the defendant, while said trial was in progress, talked to one or more of the jurors, while the said trial was pending before said jury. 5. That one or more of the jurors who sat upon the jury had, before the trial, formed and expressed decided opinions *adverse to the interest of the plaintiff; this was unknown to plaintiff until after the trial. 6. That his Honor erred in charging the jury, 'That if they believed that the plaintiff had failed to perform her part of the contract in every particular, then the defendant was entitled to recover damages.' 7. Because his Honor should have granted the motion of plaintiff to strike out the first and second paragraphs of defendant's answer."

The judgment below was affirmed by this court, the exceptions being severally ruled upon as follows:

[1 and 2. Appeal and Error ⇐999.]

It is settled law that these matters are exclusively within the cognizance of the Circuit Court, and this court has no jurisdiction to hear or determine such questions.

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐731.]

No question of law is here presented, and therefore it need not be considered.

[4 and 5. Appeal and Error ⇐688.]

There is nothing stated in the "Case," by affidavit or otherwise, to establish the facts upon which these grounds are based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2894–2896; Dec. Dig. ⇐688.]

[6. Appeal and Error ⇐699.]

The charge as set out in the "Case" contains no such proposition, and therefore this ground needs no further notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2928–2930; Dec. Dig. ⇐699.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⇐682.]

It does not appear that any such motion was made, or, if made, upon what grounds based. The answer is not given, and, therefore, it is not known what were the first and second paragraphs. It is stated that defendant pleaded a general denial and a counter-claim, and no reason can be conceived why either of these defenses should have been stricken out.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, March 13th, 1884. C. R. Anderson, for appellant. No counsel contra.

No. 1543. OTIS v. BROWN. November Term, 1883. This was an action by the executrixes of James Welsman, deceased, who died in 1870, for a construction of the will of their testator. This will gave to his daughters, Harriet and Emma, each one-fifth part of the residuum for life, with remainder "to such children as she should leave surviving her;" and if "she should die leaving no child or children surviving her, the said one-fifth part or share shall return to my estate, and be divided among the surviving devisees under my will, to be held by them, respectively, in the same manner as the shares devised to them are held." One-fifth was to be divided into two parts, one part whereof was to go to *his granddaughter, Amelia C. Brown, for life, with remainder, &c., in precisely the same words as were employed in the gifts to Harriet and Emma; and the other part to his grandsons, R. E. Brown and J. W. Brown, to be divided equally between them, share and share alike, absolutely. One-fifth part to his daughter Maria for life, with remainder to all her children, surviving, if she married again; and, if not, then at Maria's death, one-half to his granddaughter, Amelia Otis, for life, with remainder, &c., in precisely the same words as were employed in the gifts to Harriet and Emma, and the other half to his grandson, Arthur, absolutely. The remaining one-fifth the testator gave, absolutely, to his son James T. By a codicil testator revoked the bequest to James T., "and in lieu and instead thereof" gave, devised and bequeathed the said one-fifth to his executors in trust to invest, and the income thereof to pay over to said James T., for and during the term of his natural life, and after his death to hold the same in trust for the use, &c., of his daughter Caroline for life, with remainder, &c., in precisely the same words as were employed in the gifts to Harriet and Emma.

Testator died in 1870, Harriet in 1872, unmarried; Amelia Otis in 1873, childless; James T. in 1877, who left his daughter Caroline surviving, who afterwards died, leaving her surviving, her husband, Dr. Jenkins, and two infant children—E. E. and A. N. Jenkins—one of whom, E. E., has since died, his father and brother being his heirs-at-law. Held—

[1. Wills ⊂⊃476.]

That the will and codicil were parts of the same thing—the last will and testament—and must be construed together; therefore, that James T. is one of the "surviving devisees under the will."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 997; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃476.]

[2. Wills ⊂⊃529.]

That on the death of Harriet, without children, her share was divisible as follows: One-fourth to the trustees of James T., under the terms and limitations of the codicil; one-fourth to Emma and Maria, each, and one-eighth to Amelia C. Brown, all subject to the precise conditions attached to the original shares given them under the will; and one-eighth to be divided equally between J. W. Brown and R. E. Brown, and to be theirs absolutely.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1142; Dec. Dig. § 529.]

[3. Wills ⊂⊃634.]

That Amelia Otis having died before Maria, the contingent *remainder to said Amelia never vested, and there was, therefore, no reverter of such interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1488–1510; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃634.]

[4. Wills ⊂⊃547.]

That the share of James T. passed, at his death, to Caroline, and then, at her death, to her two children, E. E. and A. N., and upon the death, afterwards, of said E. E., this share became distributable between Dr. Jenkins, his father, and his brother, A. N.

[5. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃226.]

That the right of an allowance of counsel fees not having been presented to the court below, nor there determined, the question is not properly before this court. Circuit decree of Cothran, J., in its results, affirmed.

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, March 18th, 1884. A. G. Magrath, A. G. Magrath, Jr., B. J. Whaley, for appellants. Hayne & Ficken, contra.

No. 1548. MILLER v. SCHMIDT. November Term, 1883. This was an action in a trial justice's court for the recovery of the balance due on a note. Defendant appeared by her husband and agent, who made no objection to the trial proceeding. Judgment was given for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. On the call of the case in the Circuit Court, defendant, without previous notice, presented a petition for a new trial, upon the fact, stated in her own affidavit, that she was too sick to attend the trial below; that she could have proved payment, and that manifest injustice had been done her. The Circuit judge (Fraser) refused the petition (1) because he had no right to grant it; (2) that it came too late and did not make out a proper case. After argument on the merits, judgment was rendered that the appeal be dismissed and the judgment below affirmed. On appeal to this court, held—

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐987.]

That this court was confined to a consideration of alleged errors of law only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3893–3896; Dec. Dig. ⇐987.]

[2. Justices of the Peace ⇐116.]

That defendant's petition was manifestly under section 368 of the code, which applies only to cases of default, and this was not a case of default. The Circuit judge had no right to grant the petition.

No. 1562. DUMAS v. ABLES. November Term, 1883. This was an action by plaintiff to have a parol agreement by defendant Ables, to execute a mortgage, set up as an equitable mortgage and superior to the lien of a judgment subsequently obtained by defendant Nevill against his co-defendant. In behalf of defendant Nevill, the Circuit judge (Wallace) dismissed the complaint. On appeal to this court, held—

That plaintiff, not having made the point on Circuit that the allegations of his complaint were admitted by the answers, but, having introduced evidence to sustain such allegations, he cannot raise the point in this court. *REEVES v. TAPPAN.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸128.]

Until the act of 1880, the executor of an executor in this State represented the first testator, and was invested with all the powers conferred by the will upon the first executor as executor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 531, 532; Dec. Dig. ⟸128.]

[2. Powers ⟸30.]

A mere naked power conferred upon the executor as an individual cannot be exercised by his executor, but where the power is conferred upon the executor in trust and virtute officii, it survives and passes to his executor. Powers considered and classified.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bredenburg v. Bardin, 36 S. C. 203, 15 S. E. 372; Dick v. Harby, 48 S. C. 528, 530, 26 S. E. 900; Rice v. Coleman, 87 S. C. 349, 69 S. E. 516, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1016.

For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸128.]

Testator by his will directed his executor to pay his debts and a specific legacy in money, and then devised and bequeathed all the residue of his estate to his brother L. in trust for the use of L.'s children, to be divided among them share and share alike. L. was appointed executor of the will with full power to execute the same and to sell any of the real or personal estate and to invest proceeds as trustee for his children. L. qualified and afterwards died, leaving S. his sole executrix. Held, that the powers conferred upon L. passed at *his death to his executrix, and that a sale and conveyance by S. of a lot of land of the first testator was a valid sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 531, 532; Dec. Dig. ⟸128.]

[4. Powers ⟸30.]

L., by his will, authorized his executrix to sell for certain purposes any of the lands of the first testator outside of the city of C. Held, that this did not prevent S. from selling lands of the first testator in C., under the power conferred in the first will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

[This case is also cited and explained in Reeves v. Brayton, 36 S. C. 385, 397, 399, 400, 402, 15 S. E. 658.]

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

This was an action commenced in August, 1881, by Sarah N. Reeves, Eliza A. Lewis, substituted trustee under the will of Robert N. Lewis, and others, against Henry L. Tappan, Edwin F. Gary, and Geo. L. Dial, administrator, for the recovery of a lot of land in the city of Columbia. The plaintiffs are the children of D. B. Lewis, and claimed the land under the will of their uncle, Robert N. Lewis. The defendants claimed under deed from Sarah B. Lewis, sole executrix of D. B. Lewis, who was sole executor of R. N. Lewis. This deed conveyed the land in question to Tappan and Gary in 1872, for the alleged consideration of $10,000. The whole case turns upon the legal construction of so much of the wills as is stated in the opinion.

The presiding judge charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiffs sue, as devisees under the will of R. N. Lewis, to recover the land devised to them; they have joined a trustee. The land is in the possession of Tappan and Gary. The plaintiffs must recover on the strength of their title. It is a pure question of title, and has nothing to do with feelings or mercy.

The question here is a nice one. The parties must prove a right to the immediate possession. Ordinarily a grant is shown; if not, then to a point where title is presumed, or, then, to a common source. These children have a conveyance from their uncle. Tappan and Gary have a deed from the executrix of the executor of R. N. Lewis. Both claim to hold from R. N. Lewis. When this state of things exists we need not travel in the past. Can the deed of the executrix prevail against the children? If the deed prevails, then Gary and Tappan take the property. If that deed fails, then the children take.

The will of R. N. Lewis makes D. B. Lewis a trustee in trust for the children, and then appoints Daniel B. Lewis executor, *with power to sell and reinvest, &c. It has been asserted here, by one of the counsel for the defence, that some of the best lawyers in the State have given the opinion that the title of Mrs. Lewis was good. It may be so, but it seems to me that a prudent man would hesitate before he would take the title of an executor of an executor under circumstances similar to those in this case, and I ask you, as men of common sense, if you saw that the trustee was dead, would you not hesitate to take the deed of the representative of the trustee?

The executor is empowered to sell and to reinvest. The idea of the testator was that he might want to sell to pay debts "and change investments, or to invest and reinvest for the benefit of the devisees, at his discretion." That was a special trust and confidence in his brother "which he could not devolve on another." When he died that trust ended. I charge you that, under the wills, Mrs. Lewis, the executrix, whilst she could discharge ordinary duties, yet had no power by the will or by law to give a title.

Another title is introduced here—a tax title. Before it could avail the defendants, it became necessary for them to show that all the steps had been taken to make it a good title. Nothing of this kind has been attempted. Without this, this title avails nothing. As far as I know, this is the law of the case.

I am requested to charge you, "That the defendants, Gary and Tappan, having purchased the premises set forth in the complaint from Sarah B. Lewis, mother of plaintiffs, as executrix of D. B. Lewis, executor of R. N. Lewis, from whom the plaintiffs derive title, and the plaintiffs having acknowledged the receipt of the purchase money by the executrix by incorporating the deed of Gary and Tappan in their complaint, such an equitable defence is made as precludes these plaintiffs from recovering these premises in this action."

This proposition is erroneous, and hence refused. By incorporating the said deed in their complaint, the plaintiffs do no more than allege that the defendants, Gary and Tappan, purchased said land of Sarah B. Lewis, as executrix, at and for the sum of ten thousand dollars; but this is not an acknowledgment that the plaintiffs received the money or any part thereof, but is *a declaration that the land was sold and the money received by one who had no authority so to do.

As matter of law, I instruct you that Mrs. Lewis had no power to execute a title to defendants.

As to the question of damages, the counsel for Gary and Tappan having agreed that $200 would be a reasonable sum, that should be the amount, if you conclude that the plaintiffs are entitled to any.

The verdict was for plaintiffs without damages.

The defendants appealed upon several grounds, variously stated in twenty-three exceptions, to the judge's charge and his refusals to charge.

Messrs. R. A. Lynch and L. F. Youmans, for appellant.

Messrs. F. W. McMaster and James M. McMaster, contra.

The statute of uses executed the use in the children of D. B. Lewis, and the executor had only a naked power or common law authority to limit new uses at his discretion. 1 Spears, 356; 2 McCord, 252; 17 S. C., 545. This power is discretionary, and necessarily confined to the individual to whom it is given. Lewin Trusts, 538; Perry Trusts, §§ 248, 308, 473; 1 Sug. Pow., 126; 7 Cow., 187; 2 Wend., 1; 3 Brev., 242; 4 Bibb, 307; 5 Met., 462. The discretionary power given to D. B. Lewis is not coupled with a trust. There is no trust until after the trustee has exercised his discretion, which he never did. And the power of sale here can be executed without the legal estate being in the trustee. 4 Strob. Eq., 74. The fee is in the cestuis que use, subject to be divested by the exercise of the power. The language of the will shows that the trustee was not to take the fee. Otherwise, why give the executor power to sell the "real or personal estate." 5 East., 162. But if not executed while D. B. Lewis lived, it certainly was at his death. For the discretion was purely personal, and was therefore extinguished at his death and was incapable of delegation or transmission. The power was given to D. B. Lewis and to him alone. The statute makes transmissible only the ordinary duties of an executor. At

Lewis' death *the trust became passive and was therefore executed. Co. Lit., 112b; 1 Sug. Pow., 214, 319; 2 Wms. Ex'rs, 810n; 16 Ves., 27; 5 Paige, 387; 10 Cush., 571; 2 Atk., 88; 4 Kent, 330; 6 Rich. Eq., 23; Perry Trusts, 292, 294, 320; Lewin Trusts, 253–4; 17 S. C., 550; 11 Id., 71; 11 East., 377; 2 Salk., 679; 2 McCord, 252.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case involves the title to valuable real estate in the city of Columbia, now in the possession of the defendants, Tappan and Gary, and the main question before the court is as to the power of an executor of an executor to sell under the will of the first testator. It it admitted that had the executor of the first testator sold and conveyed the property in dispute in his life-time, as did his executrix after his death, that the title of defendants, as purchasers, would have been perfect and complete, at least so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. But it is denied that his executrix could sell; and inasmuch as the defendants, in one of their defences, claim through the sale made by the executrix, the main question, as we have said, when the case is stript of all of its unnecessary surroundings, is as to the power of the executrix of the executor under the will of the first testator.

To determine this question, the two wills must be examined, to wit, the will of Robert N. Lewis, in which his brother, D. B. Lewis, was the appointed and qualified executor, and the will of the said D. B. Lewis, in which his wife, Sarah B. Lewis, was the appointed and qualified executrix. The portions of these two wills necessary to be examined and considered are as follows: In the fourth clause of the will of Robert N. he devised and bequeathed "All the rest, remainder, and residue of my estate, both real and personal, to my dear brother, Daniel B. Lewis, of the State of Texas, in trust, nevertheless, upon the following uses and trusts, that is to say, for the use, benefit, and behoof of the children of my said brother, to be divided amongst them share and share alike, and not to be subject or liable to any of the individual debts, liabilities, or contracts of my said brother." He then nominated and appointed his "said brother, Daniel B. Lewis," his ex*ecutor, "with full power to execute the will," and "with full power to sell any of my real or personal estate," except the lot specially devised to Emily Bateman and Nicholas Eugene Lewis, and also with full power to compound debts due him without application to any courts of law or equity, and also to invest or reinvest the proceeds and residue as trustee for his children, at his discretion.

Daniel B. Lewis, after qualifying and partially administering the estate, died testate, appointing his wife Sarah his executrix. In the second clause of his will he said: "I desire that the will of my deceased brother be carried out as he has directed; that is, after all outstanding debts have been paid, the residue, both personal and real, to be equally divided among my legitimate children, that may be living at the time of distribution," &c., &c.; and directing in the third clause that the annual income derived from the rest of said property be used in the education and raising of his children; and if this should be insufficient, then all the lands of the estate of R. N. Lewis outside of the city of Columbia be sold to answer that purpose.

As has already been stated, Sarah B. Lewis qualified as executrix of this last will, and becoming thereby executrix also of the first, sold and conveyed the real estate in question to the defendants, Tappan and Gary, for $10,000, which sum was afterwards paid to her by the said purchasers. These purchasers afterwards mortgaged the premises to one Asa Burke, now deceased, of whose estate the defendant Dial is the administrator with the will annexed.

Was the sale of Sarah B. Lewis, executrix, to Tappan and Gary a valid sale? There is no doubt Sarah B. Lewis made the sale as executrix of Robert N., and it is also certain that she received the full amount of the purchase money as said executrix, and there is some evidence that she used it for the purposes of the estate; but the question recurs, Did she have the power to sell? It will not be questioned that up to the recent act of 1880, the executor of an executor represented the first testator, in this state, as in the other states. This has been familiar law, announced in many decided cases and found in all the text books upon the subject, and it prevailed in our state, as elsewhere, until the act above referred to, which was passed in 1880, since the occurrences here*in, and therefore having no application here. Under this principle Sarah B. Lewis, when she qualified as executrix of her husband, became eo instanti, it will be conceded, executrix of Robert N., and was thereby invested with all the powers, under the will of the said Robert, with which her husband as executor thereof had been clothed. I mean all such powers as belonged to him as executor, and with which he had been intrusted by his testator, to the proper discharge of his duty as said executor. "The executor of an executor is to all intents and purposes the executor and representative of the first testator." 2 Black. Com., 506. If so, he can certainly do all that the first executor, as executor, could do.

This then brings us to the question, whether Daniel B. could have made this sale as executor of his brother Robert, in the discharge of his executorial duties and functions, or was the power of sale, which it is admitted the will of Robert conferred upon him, a mere naked power, independent of and unconnected with his office as executor? Was it a mere personal trust in Daniel as an individual, and to be exercised by him, and by him alone, as an individual and not as executor? If the power conferred was of this latter kind, then it died with him, and the sale made by his executrix was without authority, and therefore illegal and void. But if it was of the former character, then it was transmissible, and the will of Daniel continued it, and kept it alive, and his executrix having exercised it, her conveyance is legal, and therefore binding upon all the parties in interest.

The turning point then is, using the ordinary terms in such cases, was the power conferred a naked power, or was it coupled with a trust? This is always a question of intention, which can be determined only by reference to the terms of the will; for, as was said in Franklin v. Osgood, 14 Johns., 527, "A reference to the terms of the will is the only course by which to determine whether a naked power only is intended to be given, for even if the terms made use of in creating the power, detached from other portions of the will, confer merely a naked power to sell, yet if the other provisions of the will evince a design that, at all events, the lands are to be sold in order to satisfy the whole intent of the will, it is not a naked power, but is coupled with a trust and in*terest." "A power to sell for the payment of debts would be such a power." 1 Sug. Pow., 111, note.

In De Saussure v. Lyons, 9 S. C., 499, this court drew the distinction between a naked power and a power coupled with an interest in trust, holding the former to be an individual power, and to be exercised only in the manner authorized by the creator, and the latter to be attached to the interest or trust reposed, and consequently to be moulded by the character of that interest or trust—concluding that when a power of sale, for instance, is found conferred in the will upon the executor, as a material part of the means placed in his hands by the testator for carrying out the provisions of the will, it attached to the office of executor and not to the individual named. So that in such case, any one holding the office became at once, by virtue of that fact, invested with the power. This principle is sustained in that case by the citation of numerous cases where it was enforced.

Now looking at the will of Robert N. Lewis as a whole, and especially to the terms of the fourth clause, it seems clear that the power of sale was attached to the office of his executor, and was conferred solely as a means of carrying out the provisions of the will. The will is simple in terms and easily understood. It directs the debts to be paid, then a certain lot is devised to Emily Bateman and her son Nicholas, and $5,000 in cash is bequeathed to her for herself and child; then the rest, remainder, and residue to Daniel B. Lewis, his brother, in trust, to be divided equally among the children of his said brother. Then the appointment of Daniel B. as executor, with full power to execute the will, and in express terms, with full power to sell any of his real estate or personal except the lot devised to Emily Bateman.

Now what other purpose could the testator have had in view in conferring the power to sell any portion of his estate upon the executor, except as a means of discharging his duties as such executor? It was incumbent on the executor to pay the debts and to pay to Emily Bateman the sum of $5,000. It was also his duty to turn over the remainder, rest, and residue to the trustee for the use, benefit, and behoof of his children, so as to be divided amongst them, share and share alike, and so that the proceeds might be invested at the discretion of the trustee; or, at least, we *are at a loss to see what other object the testator had in giving this full power, so explicitly expressed, to the executor but to enable him to put the estate in a shape to meet the requirements in the will, to wit, the payment of debts and of the legacy to Emily Bateman, and an equal division of the remainder among the children, their shares to be held by a trustee, and subject to investment at his discretion. It certainly could not have been intended as a mere naked power conferred upon Daniel B. Lewis as an individual, and with no object in view.

Powers like this may be divided into three classes: 1. A naked common law power, like a power given to an attorney or agent, to do any act; 2. A power coupled with an interest in the donee; and 3. A power which, when detached from the other parts of the will in which it is found conferred, would seem to be a mere naked power, but yet, when the whole will is considered, it appears that it was conferred to satisfy the whole intent thereof, and was intended to enable the executor to exercise fully his executorial duties. In the first class no one but the party named can execute the power, and upon his death it expires. Co. Litt., 112, 113, 181; Shep. Touch., 429; Powell Dev., 292, 310. In the other two the power survives and is transmissible, and when vested in an executor may be exercised by his executor. Bergen v. Bennett, 1 Cai. Cas., 15; 3 Salk., 277; 3 Atk., 714; 2 P. Wms., 102; Brent's Case, W. Jones, 252; Cro. Car., 282; Powell Dev., 297, 307; Sug. Pow., 141; Cro. Car., 382; Cro. Eliz., 26; 3 Binn., 49.

We regard the power in the case before the court as belonging to the last class. It was certainly more than a mere power of attorney to sell, which could be exercised only by the party named for his principal, and it does not therefore belong to the first class. But there was no legal interest in the property given to the executor; on the contrary, the legal title was given to D. B. Lewis as trustee, to be held by him as such trustee for the use and benefit of his children; and therefore it was not a power coupled with an interest in the sense that the executor was entitled to any portion thereof. This excludes it from the second class. It was a power, however, coupled with a trust, the trust being the executorship, and it was conferred upon the office of *executor so as to enable the party filling that office, whoever he might be, to properly discharge its functions and duties, and therefore it is of the third class.

The weight of authorities hold that such a power survives, and is transmissible. Our conclusion therefore is, that this power having been exercised by the executrix of D. B. Lewis as executor of Robert N. Lewis, her sale to Tappan and Gary is unimpeachable, at least for the want of authority. Franklin v. Osgood, 14 Johns., 553, and the cases there cited; Uldrick v. Simpson, 1 S. C., 283; Co. Litt., 113, note a; Taylor v. Benham, 5 How., 233 [12 L. Ed. 130]; Drayton v. Grimke, Bail. Eq., 392.

Did the will of D. B. Lewis limit the power of his executrix in the execution of the will of Robert N.? Waiving the question whether the executor of an executor can only exercise such duties and powers with reference to the first estate, as the second testator may authorize him to exercise, yet we do not find any limitation placed by D. B. Lewis on the powers of his executrix as to the will of Robert N. D. B. Lewis recognized the fact that his executrix would become the executrix of his testator, Robert N., and seeing possibly that it might become necessary to sell some of the real estate for the education and raising of his children, he decided that if such became necessary, that the lands outside of the city of Columbia should be sold; but there is no inhibition interposed as to the general power of sale found in the will of Robert. That was left intact. And if, as we have concluded, it was a power virtute officii, when the office was created by Robert N. in his will, it remained a part of that office as long as the same existed, or at least so long as the duties of said office required it to exist, for their proper discharge.

We think the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that the power of sale conferred in the will of Robert N. was a special trust and confidence in his brother, which he could not devolve, and that when he died the trust ended. On the contrary, we think this power was attached to the office of executor, and Mrs. D. B. Lewis having become by operation of law in possession of said office, she was legally authorized to execute this power; and having done so by the sale to the defendants, Tappan and Gary, said sale is valid.

*After reaching this conclusion, the other questions raised in the case disappear, and therefore need not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

A petition was filed for a rehearing of this case, but it was refused by an order passed April 26, 1884.

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered the petition for rehearing filed in this cause, and do not see that any errors or omissions in the former judgment are made to appear prima facie. Nor do we see that any new views are suggested which require the further consideration of the court. The judgment of this court is, that the petition for rehearing be dismissed.

CHAFEE & CO. v. RAINEY.

[1. Judgment ⇐306.]

The concluding order of a Circuit decree was directly contrary to the whole tenor of the decree. Upon the matter being brought to the judge's attention by a letter from the attorney of the losing party, the judge wrote to the clerk of court, directing a change in the order, stating that the concluding sentence as written was an error. Held, that it was a mere clerical error, which the Circuit judge could correct on an ex parte application, and that the act of the clerk under the order of the court was the act of the court itself.

[2. Judges ⇐29.]

A judge may render a decree in a cause heard before him in one Circuit, after he has entered upon the duties of another term in another Circuit; and so, too, he may then direct the correction of mere clerical errors in a judgment rendered by him on a previous Circuit.

[3. Homestead ⇐2.]

If, at the time of levy, a condition of things exist entitling defendant to homestead, he may properly claim it. Thus, where judgment was obtained against the head of a family, and he afterwards ceased to be such, but again, and before levy made, married a wife, he is entitled to his homestead exemption as against such judgment.

Before Aldrich, J., Georgetown, March, 1883.

*The opinion fully states the case. The original decree of the Circuit judge was as follows, omitting its statement of facts:

Mr. Dozier, with great force and ingenuity, contended that the defendant Rainey is not entitled to the exemption, because his second wife having died in June, 1880, and his children not living with him, he was not the head of a family; that the lien of the judgment attached, and his subsequent marriage in June, 1881, did not divest that lien, and, therefore, the lot No. 55, in which he had lived with his previous wives and children, was subject to levy and sale.

After the adoption of the constitution of 1868, our Supreme Court, as it was then constituted, seemed inclined to give the most liberal construction to the article providing for the homestead exemption. They treated it as a favored tenure for the support of the family of the insolvent debtor, whose reverses had reduced them from affluence to poverty, and doubtless this was the benevolent intention of the framers of the constitution. Evidently it was intended to meet any final process, issued from any court, for any debt contracted before or after the adoption of the constitution. But the decision in Gunn v. Barry [15 Wall. 610, 21 L. Ed. 212], of the United States Supreme Court, suddenly arrested this inclination, and this beneficent purpose of the constitution was treated as against public policy and the binding obligation of contracts. This was so obvious that the legislature found it necessary to pass several acts giving construction to the constitutional provision and enlarging the restrictions placed thereon by the court.

I am convinced, from a careful consideration of the debate on the adoption of this section, reported in the journal of the convention, that the benevolent idea of Mr. Jefferson was the controlling thought of those who had the framing of that instrument. That distinguished statesman and philosopher, whose political sagacity was as far-reaching as his benevolence was wide, in the dawn of our independence thus eloquently writes: "When the war is over and our freedom won, the people must make a new declaration; they must declare the rights of man, the individual, sacred above all craft of priesthood or government—they must, at one blow, put an end to all the trickeries of English law, which, garnered up in the charnels of ages, bind the heart and soul with *lies. They must perpetuate republican truth by making the homestead of every man a holy thing, which no law can touch, no juggle wrest from his wife and children. Until this is done, the revolution will have been fought in vain."

This idea of the sacredness and inviolability of the homestead was more readily adopted by the new states than by the old. Experience had taught them that the debtor class was more frequently the victim than the creditor class, the latter too often seducing the former into expenditures that ruined his fortunes and deprived his wife and children of the shelter of the family roof-tree; that capital is ever waging perpetual war against labor. Hence the constitution of 1868 introduced this protection for the helpless and innocent family, and the legislature has since approved the benevolent purpose, so that I hold it to be the duty of the courts to perpetuate this truth: "That the homestead of every man is a holy thing, which no law can touch, no juggle wrest from his wife and children."

Now, Rainey was entitled to his homestead in February, 1874, when Chafee & Co. obtained their judgment. It was not assigned to him until January 19th, 1883, and it is contended that the lien of the judgment attached after the death of the second wife, in June, 1880, because, his children having married and moved away from the homestead, he was not the head of a family. Is not this the very "juggle" and "trickery" that Mr. Jefferson speaks of? How can it be maintained that the man is not the head of a family because his children have married and gone off? Filial relations cannot be thus dissolved. The children of the daughter and the son are taught to regard the grandparents with as much affection, respect, and reverence as their own parents, and to look to the old homestead as the place where they have the right to go and be welcomed and protected. Suppose the husband of Rainey's daughter dies, leaving her a desolate widow, with destitute children. Is it the spirit and intention of the law that she, with her orphans, shall be turned from her father's house because a ruthless creditor has levied an execution after the death of her mother, and while she was absent from the home of her nativity? I cannot think so.

Statutes, provides for *the filing, approval, and recording of the return. "And upon such return being recorded in forty days after the proceedings have become final, the title to the homestead so set off and assigned shall be forever discharged from all debts of said debtor then existing or thereafter contracted." In this case the levy was made on December 6th, 1882; the homestead assigned to him January 19th, 1883. Why? Because, from February, 1874, the date of the Chafee judgment, he had a wife and children living with him, and the plaintiff in the execution making no levy, there was no necessity for him to claim his exemption. But after the death of the wife, and the marriage and removal of the children, although he had taken another wife, who was then living with him, the plaintiff claims that, in the interval between the death of his second wife and his marriage to his last wife, the lien of the execution vested, and the subsequent marriage cannot divest it.

Pender v. Lancaster, 14 S. C. 25 [37 Am. Rep. 720], is relied on to support this position. But that is a very different case. The property levied on there was a horse, and was advertised for sale by the sheriff. The defendant married the day before the sale. The court very properly say: You cannot defeat a vested lien by marrying a wife twenty-four hours before the sale. This would be using the law to practise a fraud. The credit extended to you was on the faith of that horse, and the law can afford you no aid. Here the credit was not extended to Rainey on the faith of his homestead, in lot No. 55, or on the probability of his wife dying and his children marrying and moving off, for the creditors were fully apprised that he was the head of a family. By section 1,998, page 580, "no waiver of the right of homestead, however solemn, made by the head of a family at any time prior to the assignment of the homestead, shall defeat the homestead provided for in this chapter." If the defendant, in execution, cannot defeat the homestead by the most solemn act, how can it be defeated by operation of law?

I think this disposes of the question, and the application for homestead is dismissed with costs.

Mr. R. Dozier, for appellant.
Mr. LeGrand G. Walker, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving the same question, were heard and will be considered together. The questions are: 1. Whether the respondent is entitled to claim a homestead as against the judgments of the appellants; 2. Whether the circuit judge had the power to correct a mistake in his decree after it was filed.

The facts out of which these questions arise are as follows: The judgment in favor of Chafee & Co. was recovered on February 11th, 1874, and that in favor of Johnson on June 24th, 1875. There is also "a judgment in favor of Lavinia Burridge for $97.24, dated June 24th, 1875, on record, but unrenewed." In all these judgments the causes of action arose since the adoption of the present constitution. The respondent Rainey has been married three times, and resided, with his several wives, on the lot in which the homestead has been assigned to him, viz., with the first wife from April, 1862, to November, 1876, when she died; with his second wife from May, 1878, to June, 1880, when she died; and with his third wife, who is still living, from June, 1881, to the present time. The respondent during all this time had children living, but not residing with him, being only temporary visitors to the homestead at various times. He also had servants at the homestead continuously from the date of his first marriage.

Under executions issued in the above stated cases, the sheriff on December 6th, 1882, levied on two lots, Nos. 55 and 56, in the town of Georgetown, and on December 20th, 1882, the respondent required the sheriff to have his homestead set off to him. Appraisers were accordingly appointed, who on February 16th, 1883, made their return, assigning as a homestead to respondent lot No. 55, which they valued at $1,300, and certified that the same was not susceptible of a division. In accordance with the statute, the surplus, $300, was paid to the sheriff, and the other lot, No. 56, was sold by the sheriff for $600, and this sum, together with the surplus above mentioned, was applied by the sheriff to the executions in the order of priority. The judgment in favor of Chafee & Co. was satisfied, leaving a balance in the sheriff's hands, insufficient, however, to satisfy the other judgments.

*The appellants duly filed exceptions to the claim of homestead: 1. Upon the ground that the judgments were a vested lien upon both of the said lots "while the respondent was a single man without a family, and before he became the head of a family, and his subsequent marriage cannot divest the already vested right of the creditor." 2. Because the property assigned as a homestead exceeded in value the amount exempt, as such, under the constitution and laws. The exceptions were argued before Judge Aldrich at March term, 1883, of the court for Georgetown, and on May 1st, 1883, he filed his decree, in which, after elaborately discussing the question raised by the first exception, and showing most unmistakably that, in his opinion, the exception was not well founded, but that respondent was entitled to his homestead exemption, he concluded his decree in these words: "I think this disposes of the question, and the application for homestead is dismissed with costs."

On May 12th, 1883, Judge Aldrich, on the application of defendant's attorney, and without notice to the adverse party, filed the following order, which, after stating the cases as above, and the venue, is in these words: "I have received a letter from Mr. Walker, attorney for Rainey, in which he informs me that, in my decree in this case, I close the same by saying: 'The application for homestead is dismissed with costs.' This is an error. I should have said: The exceptions to the return are overruled with costs. The clerk is directed to amend the original decree, and file this supplemental order with it as his authority for so doing."

The plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds: 1. "That the judgments in the above cases became a vested lien on the realty in which a homestead is set up while the defendant was a single man without a family, and before he became the head of a family, and his subsequent marriage cannot divest the already vested right of the creditor. 2. Because his honor having filed his decree dismissing the application for homestead, had no right, on ex parte application, to reverse his own decree without notice to the opposite party, and certainly had no right to instruct the clerk of the court to do so."

We will consider the second ground of appeal first. It is perfectly clear that the concluding words of the decree of Judge

*Aldrich, as originally written, not only did not express the judgment which he intended to announce, but expressed precisely the opposite of such intention. Indeed, strictly speaking, there was no "application for homestead" before him for consideration. The homestead had already been assigned in the mode prescribed by law, and the only question before him was whether the exceptions to such assignment, filed by the creditors, should be sustained or overruled. That was the question which he considered, and after arguing to show that such exceptions were not well founded, he concludes by saying, "I think this disposes of the question," and then adds the words which have given rise to the difficulty, and which were not responsive to the question he had been considering, viz., "And the application for homestead is dismissed with costs." It is quite manifest, therefore, that the addition of these words was a mere clerical error, which, in our opinion, he had full authority to correct. As is said in 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 1233, in speaking of rectifying decrees: "In cases, however, in which a clerical error has crept into the decree, or in which some ordinary direction has been omitted, the court will entertain applications to rectify it, even though it has been passed and entered. * * * It is, nevertheless, to be observed, that it is a principle of the court, that no alteration can be made in a decree on motion without a rehearing, except in a matter of clerical error or of form, or where the matter to be inserted is clearly consequential on the directions already given."

It is said, however, that even granting the power to make the correction, it could not be exercised upon a mere ex parte motion without notice to the adverse party. Where the error corrected is purely clerical, as in this case, we can conceive of no reason why notice should be given to the adverse party. It is a matter solely for the consideration of the judge who committed the error. And what light the adverse party, if notified, could throw upon the question, whether the error complained of is a clerical error, we do not readily perceive. Besides, the authorities are clear that no notice of a motion to correct a clerical error, or an error of form in a judgment, is necessary. Giles v. Pratt, 1 Hill, 239 [26 Am. Dec. 170]; Ashmore v. Charles, 14 Rich., 63. Nor do we think that there is anything in the objection that the correction was made by the *clerk under the order of the judge, instead of being made by the judge with his own hand. The clerk is the officer of the court, and any mere ministerial act which he does by the order of the court is the act of the court itself.

Again, it is urged that Judge Aldrich, as judge of the second Circuit, after the adjournment of the court in Georgetown, the last court in the third Circuit, no longer had any jurisdiction in cases arising in that Circuit. The brief does not show the facts necessary to base this position upon, but assuming that we are bound to take judicial notice of such facts, we do not think that the position can be sustained. Surely it cannot be said that the judge of the second Circuit, when assigned under the statute to hold the courts of the third Circuit, loses jurisdiction of all causes within that Circuit so soon as the last court of such Circuit has been adjourned. If so, then it would be necessary for him to file all his judgments before adjourning the last court of such Circuit, which in many cases, would be a practical impossibility, and hence cannot be a correct construction of the statute. Having, as he must have, jurisdiction to prepare and file his judgments after the adjournment of the last court, when necessary, he must also have the power to put such judgments in proper form by correcting any mere clerical errors that may have crept into them.

This brings us to the consideration of the first ground of appeal. There can be no doubt that when these judgments were recovered, and when the causes of action upon which they are based arose, Rainey, as the head of a family, was entitled to claim the homestead exemption. The question therefore is, Does the fact that, after these judgments were recovered, he became a widower and not the head of a family during the comparatively short periods between the death of his first wife and his marriage with his second, and between the death of his second wife and his marriage with his present wife, deprive him of the right of now claiming such exemptions when he is the head of a family? It will be observed that no attempt was made to enforce the executions issued on the judgments in these cases, during either of the periods when Rainey, by reason of the death of his first two wives, was not the head of a family, but that the levy was made on December 6th, 1882, sometime after he had again become the head of a *family; and the only question for us to decide is, whether he is now, under the present condition of things, entitled to the exemption of his homestead.

As we have held in Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C., 238, and Ex parte Ray, 20 S. C., 246, the right of homestead guaranteed by the constitution is not an estate, but a mere right of exemption. It is nothing more than a prohibition against the use of the process of the courts for the collection of debts in certain cases, and when a certain condition of things is found to exist. Whether the homestead provision in the constitution divests the lien of a judgment, is not, in our judgment, a question pertinent to the present inquiry. It unquestionably forbids the enforcement of a judgment, except in the excepted cases provided for in the constitution, by levy and sale of the homestead of one who is the head of a family. When he became the head of a family, is not the question. The real question is, Does the condition of things exist under which the constitution forbids the use of the process of the courts in enforcing the collection of debts? If they do exist, then we are at a loss to perceive by what authority any officer or any court can refuse obedience to this plain mandate of the constitution.

These creditors knew when their debts were contracted and when their judgments were recovered that they could not enforce them against the homestead of their debtor while he was the head of a family, and they must be presumed to have extended credit to him with that understanding. And if they did not choose to enforce them while Rainey was not the head of a family, and while they had free use of the process of the court, they cannot now enforce their claims against the homestead of their debtor while he is the head of a family, and while the condition of things exist under which the constitution absolutely forbids the use of the process of the courts. We do not see how this view in any way interferes with any vested right of these creditors, and we are entirely satisfied that the respondent is entitled to claim his homestead exemption.

The case of Pender v. Lancaster, 14 S. C., 25 [37 Am. Rep. 720], is much relied on by the appellant, and while some of the remarks made by the former chief justice in that case do seem to support the view con*tended for by the appellant, we do not think that the point decided in that case, which alone is authority, will sustain his position. That was an action to recover damages from the sheriff, for the sale of a horse, which was levied on before the plaintiff became the head of a family, though he married before the sale took place, and claimed that the horse was a work animal, and exempt from levy and sale. It did not appear that the debtor, in that case, had even taken any steps to have any property set apart to him as exempt under the homestead laws, in the mode prescribed by statute, but simply brought the action for damages in making the sale. It is quite clear that the action could not be maintained. The sheriff having made the levy before the debtor had become the head of a family, as he had a perfect right to do, acquired a title to the property levied on, and the debtor no longer had the possession or the right to the possession thereof. The sheriff's title was absolute and perfect, and continued so until the property was sold under the execution, or the execution was otherwise satisfied.

So that, even if the debtor, in that case, after he became the head of a family, had demanded that his property exempt from levy and sale should be set off and assigned to him, the property levied upon could not have been so assigned to him, as it was then not only out of his possession, but he then had no right or title to it; and in the event which occurred he never afterwards acquired any such right. As is said by Nott, J., in McClintock v. Graham, 3 McCord, 244, "when a sheriff levies on personal property, it becomes his own for all legal purposes. He can maintain an action for it, even against the debtor himself, at any time before the sale or satisfaction of the debt. When the execution is satisfied, if otherwise than by the sale of the property, the right of the debtor recurs, and the right of the sheriff ceases to exist against him. It still, however, remains against every other person." While, therefore, we assent to the decision in the case of Pender v. Lancaster, we do not indorse all of the reasoning employed by the former chief justice in delivering the opinion.

So, too, we do not think that the analogy sought to be drawn from the decision in Jones v. Miller, 17 S. C., 380, in reference to a claim of dower, holds good. Dower is an estate, while home*stead is not. If the wife, by her marriage, acquires an inchoate estate of dower in lands, upon which an incumbrance or lien has been previously created, she, of course, must take such estate subject to such lien or incumbrance, as any purchaser would do. But homestead not being an estate, but simply the right of exemption, which the constitution declares shall exist whenever a certain condition of things is found, stands upon a very different footing. The debtor, when he becomes the head of a family, does not thereby acquire any new estate, which would be subject to any prior incumbrance, but he simply places himself in a condition in which the constitution forbids the use of the process of the courts in selling for debt a certain portion of his property.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as corrected by the order filed May 12th, 1883, be affirmed.

Mr. Knox Livingston, contra.

March 22, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The action in this case was commenced April 12th, 1883. And the plaintiff in her complaint alleges: 1. That Wm. Beverly departed this life intestate on December 5th, 1857, leaving a personal estate, and that his only heirs at law and distributees were his two aunts, Elizabeth Wise and Dorcas Odom. 2. That administration of his personal estate was duly committed to Wm. D. Bridges and Eliz. Wise. 3. That Wm. D. Bridges died in February, 1864, leaving a will, and that the persons named as executors therein having duly renounced, administration cum test. an. of his estate was duly granted to the defendant, Eliza D. Bridges. 4. That Elizabeth Wise died intestate on June 14th, 1878, and letters of administration upon her estate were duly granted to the defendant, John Wise; and that Dorcas Odom died intestate in May, 1868, "leaving as her *only heir at law the plaintiff, Mary Ann Strickland, and that she owed no debts at the time of her death, and left no property except her interest in the estate of the intestate, William Beverly." 5. That Wm. D. Bridges and Eliz. Wise, upon their appointment as administrators as aforesaid, executed the usual administration bond, with the defendant, John Covington, and one Charles Cottingham as sureties, and that the said Cottingham departed this life intestate July 21st, 1875, and the defendant, C. M. Weatherly, as clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, is now his administrator. 6. That the said Wm. D. Bridges and Eliz. Wise have never accounted as administrators of the estate of Wm. Beverly, nor have their personal representatives so accounted since their death. 7. "That the plaintiff and the children and grandchildren of Elizabeth Wise are the only heirs at law of the said Wm. Beverly, deceased, and are entitled to whatever may be found in the hands of the personal representatives of his administrators on an accounting, or may be recovered on the administration bond." 8. That the estate of Eliz. Wise is insolvent, she having left no property except her interest in the estate of Wm. Beverly. Wherefore the plaintiff demanded judgment that Eliza D. Bridges and John Wise should account for the actings and doings of their respective intestates as administrator and administratrix of the estate of said Wm. Beverly, and that judgment be rendered against them, as well as against said John Covington and said Weatherly, as sureties on the administration bond, for whatever balance may be found due upon such accounting, and that such balance may be distributed amongst the several parties entitled thereto, according to their respective legal rights.

The exhibits filed with the complaint show that the inventory and appraisement of the estate of Wm. Beverly was made on December 31st, 1857, and that sales were made from time to time between January 3d, 1859, and January 6th, 1860, and that the last return made by Wm. D. Bridges, as administrator, showed a balance in his hands on January 1st, 1863, of $660.25.

The defendants interposed a demurrer upon the following grounds: "I. That the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue. II. That there is a defect of parties in the omission of the administrator de bonis non of the estate of William Beverly, deceased, *and the administrator of Dorcas Odom, deceased." At the trial they also put in an oral demurrer, "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The case was heard on the demurrer by Judge Aldrich, who subsequently filed his decree, in which he held that "an administration on the estate of Dorcas Odom is necessary to enable her heirs at law to receive her interest in the estate of William Beverly, deceased," and also that "an administrator de bonis non of the estate of William Beverly, deceased, is a necessary party, who alone can demand an accounting from the personal representatives of the former administrator," and he therefore sustained the demurrer. He goes on, however, to say that he would give the plaintiff leave to amend by making the necessary parties, if he could see that it would be of any service to her. But the action having been commenced twenty-five years after the execution of the administration bond, and more than twenty years after the last return was filed, he thought that such a lapse of time would raise such a presumption of payment as that it could not be rebutted; and that as a plea of payment would be a perfect defence to the plaintiff's claim, it would be useless to protract the litigation by granting leave to amend, and therefore he declined to do so.

The plaintiff appeals, substantially, upon the following grounds: 1. Because of error in holding that the plaintiff did not have legal capacity to bring the action, and that the administrator of Dorcas Odom is a necessary party. 2. Because of error in holding that an administrator de bonis non of Wm. Beverly is a necessary party. 3. Because of error in holding that a plea of payment arising from presumption of lapse of time could be sustained before any plea or answer was put in. 4. Because of error in refusing leave to amend, upon the ground that the action would be defeated by a plea of payment.

There can be no doubt that when a plaintiff brings his action he must state in his complaint the facts necessary to show that some legal or equitable right to which he is entitled has been invaded or violated by the defendant, or that such right is so threatened, as to cause him irreparable damage, if not restrained or prevented by the order of the court. In other words, he must state facts showing that he has a cause of action against some one *or all of the defendants against whom he complains. Now, in this case it seems to us quite clear that the plaintiff has not stated facts which, being admitted, show that she has any cause of action whatever against all, or one, or more of the defendants. The object of the action, as stated in the complaint, is to require an accounting from the administrators of the administrators of Wm. Beverly, deceased. Now, unless the plaintiff is a creditor or distributee of the estate of Wm. Beverly, she has no right to demand any such accounting, and therefore has no cause of action. But it appears from the statements made in her complaint that she is not either a creditor or distributee of that estate.

Her mother, Dorcas Odom, and Elizabeth Wise are stated to be the sole distributees of the estate of Wm. Beverly, and the fact that her mother subsequently died, leaving her as her sole heir at law and distributee, cannot make her a distributee of Wm. Beverly's estate. The heirs and distributees of a deceased person are fixed and ascertained by the condition of things as they existed at the time of the death of such person, and at that time the only heirs of Wm. Beverly were Elizabeth Wise and Dorcas Odom. It is quite clear, therefore, that the only person who is entitled to demand and receive the interest of Dorcas Odom in the personal estate of Wm. Beverly is her administrator, and until one is appointed, no one has a right to demand or receive such interest, and, of course, no one has any cause of action to enforce such demand.

So, too, we agree with the Circuit judge that an administrator de bonis non of Wm. Beverly is a necessary party. These views are so fully supported by the authorities that we do not deem it necessary to go into any discussion of them. Bradford v. Felder, 2 McC. Eq., 168; Petigru v. Ferguson, 6 Rich. Eq., 378; Read v. Read, 8 Rich. Eq., 145; Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C., 253; Stevenson v. Wilcox, 16 S. C., 432; Villard v. Robert, 1 Strob. Eq., 393, besides other cases cited in respondent's argument.

We are therefore entirely satisfied that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The only remaining inquiry is whether there was any error of law in refusing the plaintiff leave to amend. Motions to amend are addressed to the discretion of the court, and therefore are not, *ordinarily, appealable. It is argued, however, in this case that the Circuit judge based his reason for refusing leave to amend upon an erroneous proposition of law, and therefore a proper case is presented for our review. It is true that Judge Aldrich, in discussing the question of amendment, does state, as a reason for refusing the leave, that, in his opinion, "after twenty years the legal presumption of payment cannot be rebutted"—a proposition which we cannot fully indorse. Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., at page 489 [43 Am. Rep. 618]. Yet we are not called upon to review the reasons given for a Circuit judgment, but simply to determine whether the judgment itself is right.

Upon this we can have no hesitation. As we have seen, the plaintiff has no cause of action whatever, and therefore there was nothing to amend by. The only amendment, if it may be so called, which would have answered any practical purpose, would have been to substitute an entirely new plaintiff in the form of an administrator of Dorcas Odom, and that, too, when it did not appear that there was any such person in existence. As was held in Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C., 305, even under the liberal principles of the code, a plaintiff cannot be permitted to amend by substituting a wholly different and new cause of action; and upon the same principle, where, as in this case, a plaintiff shows that she has no cause of action, it would seem that an amendment substituting another person as plaintiff, who may have a cause of action, would not be allowable, especially where it does not appear that there is any such other person in existence.

It is true that there is a case (Jennings v. Springs, Bail. Eq., *181), in which it was held that it was within the discretion of a chancellor to permit the plaintiff "to amend his bill, upon the payment of the costs of such amendment, by substituting the names of the executors of William Pressley for his own; the bill having been filed by him, as their agent, and his own name erroneously inserted as complainant." But it will be observed that the court express no opinion as to the propriety of allowing such an amendment, and simply confine themselves to the remark that it was within the discretion of the chancellor. We have not been able to find any case in which Jennings v. Springs, has been *recognized and followed,[1] though there is a case (Lancaster v. Seay, 6 Rich. Eq., 111) in which, while it is mentioned by Dunkin, Ch., in his Circuit decree, there is nothing to show whether it was approved or disapproved, except that the learned chancellor declined to exercise the discretion which Jennings v. Springs held he could exercise, doubtless on account of the staleness of the claim, and dismissed the bill.

So that, even if Jennings v. Springs still be authority (about which there may be some doubt in view of the provisions of section 194 of the code of 1882, as construed in Trumbo v. Finley, supra), it at most only decides that such an amendment is within the discretion of the chancellor, and if so exercised it will not be disturbed; but whether such discretion, by which a new action is, practically, authorized under the guise of an amendment, should be exercised, is a totally different question. In this case the staleness of the claim, especially as no reason was suggested to account for the long delay, was an amply sufficient reason for refusing the leave to amend, as in Lancaster v. Seay, supra; and the further fact, that the amendment would practically amount to the bringing of a new suit, was another sufficient reason, as was held in Porter v. Cain, McM. Eq., 84.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1] The learned justice has evidently overlooked the citation and statement of this case in Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C., 496. In that case the Circuit judge substituted a new plaintiff at the trial, and gave defendants no time to answer. This court held that it was error not to give defendants time to answer, but, as to the substitution, say (p. 495): "It was in the discretion of the Circuit judge at the trial, in furtherance of justice, to grant an order striking out the name of one person and inserting that of another as plaintiff."—REPORTER.

3. Commercial Insurance and Banking Co. v. Turner, 8 S. C., 110, recognized and followed; and this case distinguished from Chicora Company v. Crews, 6 S. C., 243.

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, February, 1883.

The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge refusing a motion to set aside the order of nonsuit was as follows:

There is no doubt that at common law, in a suit brought by a corporation, it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove themselves duly incorporated by competent authority, on the plea of the general issue. Ang. & Ames Corp., § 634. In some of the states, and notably in New York, to relieve corporations from the expense and inconvenience of preparing in every case of an action by a corporation, where the general issue was pleaded, to prove its charter, the common law rule was modified and the defendant was required, if he really desired to litigate that question, to plead in abatement or bar that the plaintiffs were not a corporation. No such legislation has been adopted in this state, and the common law rule was accordingly recognized and applied in Chicora Co. v. Crews, 6 S. C., 243, where the defendant was permitted to attack the corporate existence of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of property which came into his possession as the plaintiff's agent. There is nothing in the cases cited by the movants (S. & A. R. R. Co. v. Ezell, 14 S. C., 285; Chubb v. Upton, 95 U. S., 665 [24 L. Ed. 523]; Eaton v. Aspinwall, 19 N. Y., 119) in conflict with the rule laid down in Chicora Co. v. Crews. In all those cases the defendants sought to take advantage collaterally of mere irregularity in the organization of the suing corporation, and it was held that they could not do so.

But if my construction of the act of 1874 be correct, then this is not a case of defective organization under the charter or act of incorporation, nor of erroneous proceedings after the neces*sary steps were taken to the assumption of corporate powers; but there is an absolute want of proof that any corporation was ever called into being which had the right to sue or be sued in its corporate name. To cases of this sort, the rule contended for is wholly inapplicable.

For the same reason, I am of opinion that the movants cannot succeed upon the second ground upon which their motion is based; that is, that the existence of the corporation cannot now be assailed collaterally, but must be attacked in the manner prescribed by section 426 of the code, in a proceeding instituted by the attorney general. That section and the other sections immediately preceding and succeeding it, referring to the same subject, assume the existence of a corporation. The ground taken here by the defendant, and to which I agree, is that the plaintiff is not a corporation. This case falls under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Chicora Co. v. Crews, supra, and as a decision of that court, unreversed and unreviewable by me, I am constrained to follow it, and to refuse the motion to set aside the nonsuit; and it is so ordered and adjudged.

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, and S. Hyde, contra.

March 22, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to recover $7,325 on the following contract:

"Charleston, December 1st, 1879.

"I will sell and convey all my right, title, and interest in the Azor, unto the Liberian Exodus Joint Stock Steamship Co., for the sum of twenty-six hundred and seventy-five dollars. This offer to be accepted and the above amount of twenty-six hundred and seventy-five dollars paid into my hands on or before November 11th, 1880, otherwise this offer to be null and void.

(Signed,) "F. S. Rodgers."

Paragraph I. of the complaint alleged: "That the plaintiff is and was, at the date of the agreement hereinafter mentioned, a *body corporate under the laws of the state of South Carolina;" to which the defendant answered as follows: "That he has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegation contained in the first paragraph of the complaint."

The plaintiff proved that on November 8th, 1879, the bark Azor was bought by the defendant from the U. S. marshal for $2,950, $450 of which being furnished by the plaintiff, and the bill of sale was taken in the name of the defendant. On June 7, 1880, the defendant sold the Azor for $4,500. The plaintiff also offered in evidence a charter of incorporation from the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Charleston county under the act of 1874 (reënacted as chapter XXXIX. of Gen. Stat.), upon the subject of "corporations organized under general statutes," granting to certain persons, under the name and style of "The Liberian Exodus Joint Stock Steamship Company of Charleston, S. C.," the right to carry on and conduct the business of "transporting passengers and freight along the Atlantic sea-coast and high seas in general;" that the company in 1877 organized under this alleged charter of incorporation, and carried on business as such in Charleston up to the commencement of this suit. The plaintiff then rested.

When the plaintiff closed their testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the grounds: 1. That the act of 1874 was unconstitutional. 2. That there was no proof that the plaintiff had complied with the conditions prescribed in the said act precedent to their right to obtain a charter. And 3. That there was no authority in the act for the incorporation of a navigation company. The Circuit judge held that at common law it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove themselves duly incorporated by competent authority; that "in some of the states, notably in New York, to relieve corporations from the expense and inconvenience of preparing in every case of an action by a corporation, when the general issue was pleaded, to prove its charter, the common law rule was modified, and the defendant was required, if he really desired to litigate that question, to plead in abatement or bar that the plaintiffs were not a corporation. No such legislation has been adopted in this state, and the common *law rule was accordingly recognized and applied in the case of The Chicora Company v. Crews, 6 S. C., 243." And, thus taking the view that the general denial in the answer put in issue the existence of the corporation of the plaintiffs, he held that there was no corporation, and granted the nonsuit on the third ground taken, that the clerk of the court, in granting the charter "to carry on the business of transporting passengers and freight along the Atlantic sea-coast and high seas," had acted beyond the scope of his authority under the act aforesaid, and the charter was void.

From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court, upon the following grounds: 1. Because his honor erred in granting a nonsuit, there being evidence to sustain every material allegation in the plaintiff's complaint, and the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict of a jury on the evidence. 2. Because the defendant having contracted with the plaintiff as a corporation, or as doing business under a corporate name, cannot in this action question its corporate existence and his honor erred in not so deciding. 3. Because one who contracts with a corporation, or acting corporation, or copartnership, doing business under a corporate name, cannot defend himself against a claim on such contract, in a suit by the corporation, by denying its corporate existence; and it was error not to so rule. 4. Because a corporation, either de jure or de facto, can only be attacked and its charter taken away in a suit by the attorney general of the state, and his honor erred in not so ruling.

From the view which the court takes of this case, it will not be necessary or even proper to consider now the questions, whether the charter granted by the clerk to the plaintiffs is utterly without authority and void; or whether the defendant, having contracted with the plaintiffs assuming to act as a corporation and in their corporate name, is estopped from now denying that they are in fact such a corporation. It seems to us that the pleadings as disclosed in the "case" did not put in issue the existence or legality of the plaintiffs' corporation; that the defendant, having put in only a general denial, thereby waived the right to assail the charter of incorporation, and it was unneces*sary for the plaintiffs to have put it in evidence, and it may be regarded as not in the case.

We think legislation has been adopted in this state, as in New York, requiring a defendant, when sued by a corporation, and desiring to question its right so to sue, to give the plaintiff notice of such intention in advance, either by demurrer, plea in abatement, or special answer. Where the objection is that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, our code, as well as that of New York, requires such objection to be made in a particular manner. If the alleged want of legal capacity to sue appears upon the face of the complaint, the proper course is for the defendant to demur under subdivision 2 of section 165 of the code. If it does not appear upon the face of the complaint, then it is incumbent on him to take the objection by answer; and if such special objection is not taken, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant shall be deemed to have waived the same. Code, §§ 168, 169.

In this case the objection to the plaintiff's capacity to sue was not made by demurrer, for the very good reason that it did not appear upon the face of the complaint, as that only stated that "the plaintiff is and was, at the date of the agreement hereinafter mentioned, a body corporate under the laws of the state of South Carolina." Then did the defendant, as required, make the objection by answer?

The only answer made to this part of the complaint was "that he has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegation contained in the first paragraph of the complaint." This was only one of the modes of making a general denial under section 170 of the code, which declares that "the answer of the defendant must contain a general or special denial of each material allegation of the complaint contested by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief," &c. Did this general denial put in issue, in the manner required, not only the general merits of the case, but also the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue as a body corporate? As we understand it, the authorities both of New York and of this state hold that it did not.

It may be true that a general denial under the code, like the *general issue under the old practice, as a rule throws upon the plaintiff the onus of proving all the material allegations of his complaint; but it seems that for special reasons the code makes an exception as to those matters which are set down in section 165 as causes of demurrer, and of them the second is "that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue." As to the matters so set down in the section indicated, the objection must be specially taken either by demurrer or answer; and if not so taken, "the defendant shall be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Under a general denial, the defendant cannot insist that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, when that fact does not appear upon the face of the complaint. Wait Anno. Code, 248, note, citing Dillaye v. Parks, 31 Barb., 132; California Steam Navigation Co. v. Wright, 8 Cal., 585. Or that there is a defect of parties plaintiff. Abbe v. Clark, 31 Barb., 238; Commercial Insurance and Banking Co. v. Turner, 8 S. C., 110.

The case of Turner, last cited, is one of our own, and is binding authority. There the plaintiff alleged that it was a corporation, and the answer was a general denial. It was held that when the plaintiff alleges in its complaint that it is a banking corporation of another state, and the answer merely denies each and every allegation, setting forth no objection to the action on the general ground "that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, or that there is a defect of parties plaintiff" as required by section 167 [now 165], the plaintiff will not be required at the trial to prove its capacity to sue. The fact that the plaintiff in that case was a foreign corporation did not touch the point. In the judgment of the court, Judge Willard stated our view of the law as follows: "Sections 170 and 171 of the code [now 168 and 169] require that certain matters of defence shall be set forth by demurrer or by answer, in order to be available to the defendant by way of defence. The matters thus referred to are embraced in section 167 [165], and are as follows: 'That the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue; or that there is a defect of parties plaintiff or defendant; or that several causes of action *have been improperly united.' If no such objection be taken, section 171 [169] declares that the defendant shall be deemed to have waived the same. * * * The clear intention of these sections is that the defendant shall give, by his demurrer or answer, specific notice that he intends to rely on one or more of these specific defences, if he wishes to make them available. A general denial of all the facts alleged in the complaint is not a compliance with these requirements of the code. The object of these provisions is to relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of preparing to meet such objections on the trial, unless notified by the pleadings that the defendant intends to rely on one or more of them," &c.

It has been said that there is no rule of pleading more universal than that, by pleading to the merits, the defendant admits the capacity of the plaintiff to sue; and no reason can be shown why a corporation should be placed on a different footing in this particular from a natural person. Ang. & Ames Corp., § 633; Prince v. Commercial Bank of Columbus, 1 Ala., 241.

We do not regard the case of The Chicora Co. v. Crews, 6 S. C., 243, cited and relied upon in the court below, as in conflict with this view. In that case the main defence was that the company had been chartered by the state legislature during the civil war, then recently ended, for the purpose of running the blockade and importing arms, and was therefore void as against public policy. It does not appear that the defendant was allowed to make the defence under a simple general denial. From reading the report of the case, it would seem that the unconstitutionality of the charter, which was the main defence, was specially made either by demurrer or answer. The referee, M. P. O'Connor, Esq., states that "the gravamen of the defence set up grows out of the alleged fact that plaintiffs, having been organized covertly to run the blockade, they have no status in court. * * I do not deem it necessary for the purposes of the case to consider any but the one issue of law which is raised, and upon the determination of which the case must stand or fall." It no where appears in the report of the case that there was only "a general denial," or that the question was made at all. If such was the fact, the case was decided wrong, and must be regarded on that point as *overruled by the subsequent case of the Banking Company v. Turner, above quoted.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

In action against a railroad company for the value of a trunk lost on a connecting line before it reached the defendant's road, a nonsuit was properly ordered, there being no evidence of a joint contract between the two railroads.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

This was an action by Marion H. Felder against the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Pope & Haskell, contra.

*Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for the loss of her trunk and its contents while travelling over a line of connecting railroads, of which the defendant is one, from Atlanta, Georgia, to Columbia, South Carolina. The material allegations of her complaint are as follows: "That during the month of December, 1881, and on or about the twenty-seventh day thereof she was a passenger on board of a train which left Atlanta that day over the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Railroad, she having purchased a ticket from that point to Columbia, South Carolina, by way of the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Railroad over the Columbia and Greenville Railroad." Next follows an allegation "that while travelling over the lines of road and along the route provided by the terms of her ticket, at the time indicated in the foregoing paragraph, the said railroad officials took charge of this plaintiff's baggage, to wit, a sole-leather trunk, * * which said trunk from that time has never been restored to the owner thereof, although repeated demands have been made for its restoration." And finally it is alleged: "That although this plaintiff and her baggage were carried for hire, yet these defendants, not regarding their duty, did not use proper care therein, but by the negligence and improper conduct of their servants said trunk and contents where wholly lost, to the damage of the plaintiff eight hundred dollars."

For a defence to this action the defendant insists, first, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant; second, upon a general denial of the allegations of the complaint above set forth; third, that defendant never undertook to carry and deliver the trunk alleged to have been lost, and that the same had never been delivered to or received by defendant.

The testimony adduced on the part of the plaintiff is fully set out in the "Case," and was to the effect that the plaintiff, by her agent, bought a through ticket from Atlanta to Columbia; that the baggage master in Atlanta was requested to check the trunk in question, along with other baggage belonging to the party with whom the plaintiff was travelling, to Columbia, who replied that he had no through checks, but that it was all right, and they *would go through to Columbia all right, and wrote something on the trunks; that the trunk in question was first missed at Seneca City, and has not been seen since, the witness saying, "To the best of my knowledge it was not put on the Columbia and Greenville train;" that there was a connection of roads from Atlanta to Columbia by way of the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Road over the Columbia and Greenville Road during the time of the alleged loss of the trunk; that through tickets were sold over this route from Atlanta to Columbia, and vice versa; that the several roads of the line received compensation from the gross amount for which the through ticket sold according to the number of miles travelled on each of the roads; that there was an arrangement existing among these roads composing this line of travel having in view the diverting of travel from other lines which stretched out from Atlanta to the same point; that A. Pope was the general passenger agent of this line of roads, and had very large powers in relation to matters of passenger travel and their baggage; that he had authority to bind the roads in matters relating to his department, but could not override the authority of the presidents of the several roads, under whose authority he made the rates of transportation at important points; that said A. Pope, in replying to a letter of plaintiff's counsel, stated that a search for the missing trunk was being conducted under the direction of the general baggage agent, and that "if a liability is established upon either one of the roads at interest, viz., the A. & C. A. L. or G. & C. R. R., a properly audited claim for the value of the trunk will be promptly paid."

At the conclusion of this testimony on behalf of the plaintiff, a nonsuit was moved for and granted, upon the ground that "there was a total failure to prove any liability of the defendant company, as the loss had been proved to have occurred before defendant's line was reached, and that there was no evidence of any contract by which defendant could be held liable for loss of baggage on other lines."

The plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds: "1. That the railroads constituting the line, viz., the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line and the Columbia and Greenville Railroads were joint contractors for the carriage and delivery of passengers and *their baggage, and as such responsible for the loss of the latter. 2. That it was proper practice to sue the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company for the loss as proved in this action, they being one of the contractors. 3. That there was abundance of testimony in the cause sustaining the foregoing exceptions which should have been submitted to the jury for them to pass upon." The remaining ground of appeal having been abandoned, need not be stated.

It is quite clear that the Circuit judge was entirely right in holding that there was an entire failure to prove any independent liability on the part of the defendant company, for there was not only no testimony tending to show that the missing trunk had ever been delivered to or received by defendant, but the plaintiff's own witness testified that the trunk was missed at Seneca City, before reaching defendant's line, and that to the best of his knowledge it was not put on the Columbia and Greenville train. The correctness of this seems to be recognized by the appellant, for in her exceptions the only point she makes is that the defendant was a joint contractor with the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Railroad, to whom the trunk was delivered, and as such liable for the negligence of that company; or at least that there was sufficient evidence of such joint contract to require that the question should have been submitted to the jury.

The first and fundamental difficulty in the way of the plaintiff seems to us to be this, that there was no allegation in her complaint of any such joint contract, and no allegation that the trunk in question was ever delivered to or received by the defendant company, and hence the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant, and for that reason should have been dismissed. But even assuming that the complaint did contain such allegations, we think that there was an utter lack of evidence to sustain either allegation. As we have already said, there was not only no evidence to sustain the last mentioned allegation, but the testimony distinctly disproved it. So that the only inquiry is whether there was any evidence tending to show a joint contract between these railroad companies whereby the one should become responsible for the *default of the other. We have looked in vain through the testimony for any such evidence.

Surely, the fact that through tickets were sold from Atlanta to Columbia and from Columbia to Atlanta affords no such evidence. Through tickets are oftentimes intended as much, if not more, for the convenience and advantage of the travelling public as for that of the railroads over which they are sold: and if the principle should be established that the sale of through tickets over a line of connecting railroads constituted evidence of a joint contract between such roads whereby one would become responsible for the defaults of another, the effect would doubtless prove very injurious to the interests and convenience of the travelling public. For if such were the rule, railroad companies would not be very likely to make these arrangements so conducive to the comfort and convenience of passengers, as the effect would be to make each of the companies composing the line, no matter how long it might be, guarantors of the conduct of each of the other companies. A passenger buying a through ticket from Columbia or New Orleans to New York, and sustaining some loss or damage somewhere along the route, might bring his action against the richest, best equipped, and most carefully managed railroad constituting a portion of the line, and recover damages from it, when in fact his loss or damage was sustained while travelling over a link in the line owned by a totally insolvent corporation, in bad order and carelessly managed.

But we need not discuss the question, for we think that the point has been distinctly ruled in the very case so much relied on by appellant, Bradford v. South Carolina Railroad Company, 7 Rich., 201 [62 Am. Dec. 411]. Nor do we think that there was anything in the other evidence adduced tending to show any such joint contract between these companies as would make one liable for the defaults of the other. All of the evidence is entirely consistent with the idea that the only arrangement between these companies was the usual one for the sale of through tickets, whereby passengers would be attracted to the line composed of these different railroads, for their own convenience, and none of it points to the assumption of any joint liability.

The case of Bradford v. South Carolina

Railroad Company, *supra, mainly relied upon by appellant, differs materially from this case. In the first place, there was in that case a distinct allegation that the several companies composing the line from Chattanooga to Charleston were joint contractors, and the testimony principally, if not solely, relied upon by the court as sufficient to establish such joint contract was, not the through receipt which the courts said would not be sufficient to establish it, but the fact that the defendant company had published an advertisement, in which they announced to the public that "by a recent arrangement between the South Carolina, the Georgia, and Western and Atlantic Railroads, a through ticket for freight on cotton has been made from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Charleston, S. C., at the rate of sixty-five cents per 100 lbs. It is highly necessary, in order to insure correctness in the transaction of this business, that the agent of the South Carolina Railroad at Hamburg should be aware of the number of bales and marks of each shipment. Shippers are therefore earnestly requested to take duplicate receipts; one of which must, in all cases, be forwarded per mail to the above-named agent, in order to fix responsibility on this company. With these precautions, the business can and will be transacted mutually satisfactory to all concerned. The roads pledge themselves to give all practicable dispatch to cotton entrusted to them for transportation."

The words which we have italicized in the foregoing advertisement showed very clearly that there was a joint contract, and certainly the South Carolina Railroad Company, in the face of these words, could not deny it. The evidence showing that duplicate receipts had been forwarded to the agent at Hamburg, and thus the condition upon which the liability of the defendant company was to attach having been performed, that company could not deny it, even though the testimony seemed to show that the damage to the cotton in question was sustained before it reached the South Carolina Railroad; for that company had, by the terms of its advertisement, in effect, agreed that its responsibility should be fixed so soon as one of the duplicate receipts had been forwarded to its agent at Hamburg, which was done. The court, therefore, properly held that the evidence was quite sufficient to require that the question as to whether there was a joint *contract should be submitted to the jury. But in this case we find no such testimony, and we see no error on the part of the Circuit judge in granting the nonsuit.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred generally, but Mr. Justice McGOWAN only in the result.

LANIER v. BRUNSON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Trusts ⇐316.]

A trustee who was appointed under the authority of a marriage settlement for the purpose, in part, of prosecuting certain claims held under the settlement, upon which claims judgments were afterwards obtained, is entitled to commissions on the amount received in compromise of such judgments, directly by the cestui que trust, but in the presence of the trustee and on their joint receipt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 449; Dec. Dig. ⇐316.]

[2. Trusts ⇐315.]

Where a marriage settlement vested in a trustee the legal title of choses in action, the statute of uses does not apply, and the trust continues until the trustee divests himself of the legal title: and in whatever form he turns over the assets to his cestui que trust, he is entitled to his commissions.

[3. Trusts ⇐316.]

Where, in action by trustee and cestui que trust against others, judgment is rendered, in form, in favor of the latter, it is, in effect, in favor of both plaintiffs, and upon the money realized under such judgment the trustee is entitled to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 445-459; Dec. Dig. ⇐316.]

[4. Set-Off and Counterclaim ⇐46.]

In this action against the defendant individually, she asserted as a counter-claim a note due to her as executrix. Held, that a demurrer to this counter-claim was properly sustained, there being no sufficient allegation of her qualification as executrix, and the claim and counter-claim being in different rights.

Before Kershaw, J., Edgefield, October, 1882.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard upon exceptions taken to the report of the master by both plaintiff and defendant. Several questions were made, which shall be considered in their order.

*1. Was the plaintiff entitled to commissions on money invested by him in the purchase of land, with the approval of the cestui que trust, and in accordance with the powers conferred upon him by the deed? A trustee is allowed commissions on all money received and paid out by him in due course of administration of the trust. If, therefore, the money expended in the purchase of the land in question was rightfully invested, of which there is no question, the trustee is entitled to his commissions upon the amount so paid. It would be a strange anomaly, if a cestui que trust could direct an investment of trust funds in the purchase of land, and by such investment defeat the just claim of the trustee to compensation for his services and responsibilities as trustee, and there is no propriety or equity in such a proceeding which will entitle the cestui que trust to claim the protection of this court against such a demand on the part of the trustee.

2. Money was loaned to one Cheatham, with the approval of the cestui que trust, upon a note and mortgage, which were turned over to defendant as part of the trust property. It turned out that the note was not wholly collected. Defendant excepts to the allowance of commissions on the whole amount of the note and mortgage. This question will be disposed of by overruling the exception upon the authority of the cases of Ball v. Brown, Bail. Eq., 374, and the decisions there referred to, of which Deas v. Spann, Harp. Eq., 176, may be considered the leading case. Where the trust estate consists of bonds, notes, or other choses in action, which the trustee turns over to the cestui que trust, and they are received as money, commissions are due upon such a transaction, as if the trustee had collected the securities and paid over the money.

3. The trustee recovered a judgment, which was agreed by the cestui que trust to be assigned to one Hollingsworth upon his paying her $5,000, and satisfying the costs and fees of the lawyers of the trustee who obtained the judgment—the whole amount to be paid by Hollingsworth not to exceed $7,061. This was regarded as a compromise arrangement, and was assented to by the trustee, who executed the assignment. The money was paid by Hollingsworth, according to the agreement, $5,000 to the defendant, and the balance, $1,861, to the costs and fees of the lawyers. *The master has allowed commissions on the amount paid to defendant only. Defendant excepts to the allowance of any commissions on this trust action, while plaintiff excepts, because commissions were not allowed upon the whole amount which Hollingsworth agreed upon as the utmost extent of his liability.

Both exceptions are overruled. The defendant's, on the authority of the cases cited above, and the plaintiff's, because this was a compromise made by the defendant, to which he assented, and which is the same, in effect, as if he had assigned the judgment to Hollingsworth upon the payment of $5,000, with an indemnity against the claims of his attorneys for their costs and fees. If the attorneys had been content to receive nothing from Hollingsworth and released him, as they might have done, would it be pretended that the plaintiff could have charged commissions on the sum they might have claimed for their services, but which they saw fit to remit? In no sense can the money paid by Hollingsworth to the lawyers under this arrangement be deemed equivalent to the receipt and disbursement of money by the trustee, and therefore the foundation for the claim of commissions does not exist.

4. The eighth exception of the defendant objects to any commissions being allowed the trustee, because she was entitled, after the death of her husband, to have the whole trust estate turned over to her. I am unable to find any question to discuss in this exception. If defendant was entitled to the estate after the death of her husband, and that estate consisted of choses in action, and other securities for money payable to the trustee, how could she receive the same, unless the trustee either collected the securities and paid over the money, or assigned them to her? In either case, as I have shown, he would be entitled to commissions.

5. The plaintiff excepts also to any finding of fact by the master, but I cannot conceive how he could have obeyed the order of the court, which required him to take the testimony and state the accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant, without a finding of facts, and this exception is also overruled.

6. The defendant's sixth and seventh exceptions are well taken. The plaintiff is estopped and cannot claim that the money received by him from the sheriff, and paid over to the defendant, was not *a part of the trust estate; at least, under the circumstances, the defendant cannot here be made liable to refund the amount should the contingency hereafter happen which the master has sought to provide for. We can only, in this action, deal with existing facts properly in evidence. These exceptions are sustained.

7. The last exceptions to be noticed are those of the plaintiff (the first and fourth) which complain that the master allowed the counter-claim set up by the answer. This claim consists of a note which, it was said, was held by defendant's deceased husband, payable to him, and made by the plaintiff, which came to defendant's hands as executrix of her husband. The plaintiff demurred to this counter-claim, and objected to any evidence being received in regard to it. The plaintiff also excepts to a finding of the master, as matter of fact, that the deceased husband, Robert D. Brunson, left a will, or that defendant was executrix, because there was no proof of these facts. He also excepts to the allowance of the counter-claim, because the note, if the facts are conceded, could not be set up as a counter-claim.

These exceptions must be allowed. The answer does not contain a sufficient allegation to support the counter-claim, nor was the title of the defendant, as executrix, sufficiently proven. Nor can the note in question be the proper subject of a counter-claim in this action, not being due to defendant in the same right in which she is sued. The note is claimed to be due to her as executrix, while she is sued in her individual and personal character. She could not maintain an action on it in her own right, and consequently cannot set it up as a counter-claim in an action brought against her personally. Pom. Rem., § 751. It is not impossible that she might have made it the subject of an application to the court in proper form, in behalf of the estate which she claims to represent, so that whatever the plaintiff might recover in this action should be subjected to the payment of the debt, and it may be that after the recovery of judgment herein, some such relief may be had, especially if plaintiff is in insolvent circumstances; but as a counter-claim herein, it cannot be sustained for the reasons given.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, That the report, as modified by this decree, be confirmed and made the judgment of this *court, and that the defendant pay the plaintiff the sum of two hundred and forty-six 37-100 dollars, and also the costs of this action, to be adjudged by the clerk and by him inserted in the judgment, and that plaintiff have execution therefor.

Mr. W. H. Folk, for appellant.

Under our statutes, a trustee is entitled to commissions only on moneys, &c., received and paid away. Bail. Eq., 374. Lanier never received nor paid away this money, and he had no right to receive it, for the judgments were in favor of Mrs. Brunson and in her name. 11 S. C., 566. Besides, the husband being dead, there was no longer any trust. Speer Eq., 587. The cases cited by the Circuit judge—Bail. Eq., 374; Harp. Eq., 176—do not apply; for here the judgments were recovered by Mrs. Brunson. See 2 McCord Ch., 473. Lanier's consent was purely formal, and amounted to nothing. Under the circumstances of this case, the counter-claim was proper. Water. Set-off, §§ 10–17; 12 Am. Dec., 155; 10 Paige, 369; Bail. Eq., 156; 2 McCord, 185.

Messrs. Glover & Abney, contra.

As trustee acting, and for services rendered, Lanier was entitled to the commissions claimed. Statute of uses has no application to personal property. Speer Eq., 579, 593; 6 Rich., 315; 3 S. C., 78; 5 Id., 446. The trust was not executed at Brunson's death, the judgment was never assigned to Mrs. B., and the trustee's control continued. There must be delivery of possession to divest a trustee of the legal title to personalty. Hill Trust., 236, 248, and cases supra. Where otherwise executed, the beneficiary was in possession. At any rate, he is entitled to commissions. Pars. Cont., 793–99; Herm. Est., §§ 322, 417. But he constructively received the money. Bail. Eq., 374. And the trust deed expressly provides for compensation. 13 Rich. Eq., 195. The counter-claim was properly excluded. Code, §§ 170, 171; Pom. Rem., §§ 749, 750. And for want of proof.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts out of which the questions made by this appeal arise are, substantially, as follows: The plaintiff having become trustee of the defendant under a marriage settlement executed by her in contemplation of marriage with her late husband, R. D. Brunson, commenced an action against James B. Griffin, the guardian of the defendant, and his sureties, to recover the amount due by such guardian, which resulted in judgments against the guardian and one of his sureties, as well as against the heirs at law, legatees, and devisees of another surety to whom lands had descended. This was done in accordance with one of the provisions of the marriage settlement, by which the trustee "is required, and shall have power, to make settlements with James B. Griffin, guardian, or with any person for said James B. Griffin, in whose hands the property, estate, and funds of said Margaret C. Hollingsworth (now Brunson) may be. * * * And the said trustee * * * is further empowered to bring suits, and take such steps for the collection and preservation of the property, money, and estate of said Margaret C. Hollingsworth, as he may deem proper and fit, and proceed against any person or persons who may be liable or bound to said Margaret C. Hollingsworth for any property, money, or estate appertaining or belonging to her, and as a compensation for such labor and trouble, the trustee shall be entitled to retain a reasonable sum from the trust funds to pay expenses and charges."

It seems, therefore, that one of the objects contemplated by the parties in executing the marriage settlement was to provide for the collection of the money due to the defendant by suit if necessary. Accordingly, as we have said, suit was brought by Lanier, in which he joined with him as plaintiffs the defendant and her husband. The latter, however, died October 1st, 1870, after the suit was commenced; but it does not appear that any notice was taken of that fact in the future progress of the case. Some time subsequently to the recovery of the judgments above mentioned a compromise was effected with John H. Hollingsworth, one of the parties against whom judgment was recovered, whereby be was to be discharged upon the payment to the defendant of five thousand dollars and her counsel fees and costs, *estimated at the amount of two thousand and sixty-one dollars, and accordingly a paper was drawn up, of which the following is a copy:

"State of South Carolina, County of Edgefield. } In Common Pleas.

"James A. Lanier et al., plaintiffs, against James B. Griffin et al., defendants.—Bill for account, &c.

"A decree having been made by the Supreme Court in this case, and judgment having been entered thereon, and a compromise having been made in the case between John H. Hollingsworth and M. Cornelia Brunson for the sum of seven thousand dollars ($7,000), the said Cornelia Brunson hereby remits to the said John H. Hollingsworth, who is a legatee and takes under the will of D. M. Hollingsworth, all the rights which the law gives to a surety who pays a debt, and further assigns, transfers, and sets over to John H. Hollingsworth all her right, interest, and title in and to said case, and in the judgments in said case, and her right against all the parties thereto against whom she may have claims, but all without recourse in any form against her, and without recourse upon her for costs and fees. The balance of attorney costs, $61, to be paid to General Gary by John H. Hollingsworth.

"M. C. Brunson.
10th January, 1881.
"J. A. Lanier,
"Trustee for M. C. Brunson.
"Witness: Thomas Thomson.
"Witness: W. H. Folk."

In pursuance of this compromise, John H. Hollingsworth paid over to the defendant the said sum of five thousand dollars in the presence of the plaintiff, who then claimed his commissions, but was induced to refrain from pressing his claim at that time, for fear of breaking up the compromise, being told that he could afterwards assert his claim. The testimony of Hollingsworth was that he refused to pay over the money unless Lanier signed the assignment of which the above is a copy. This action was *then brought by the plaintiff to recover commissions on the said sum of seven thousand dollars, and the defendant, amongst other defences, set up a counter-claim as follows: "That the said James A. Lanier is indebted to her as executor of Robert D. Brunson, deceased, by his note dated May 26, 1869, due at one day, in the sum of five hundred dollars, less a credit of $25, August 30, 1870, for cash loaned to him." To this counter-claim the plaintiff filed a demurrer upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a counter-claim; and that it is not a counter-claim to this action, the defendant having no right of action on the same in her individual capacity.

The case came before the Circuit judge upon the master's report and exceptions thereto, who held, so far as the questions involved in this appeal are concerned, that the plaintiff was entitled to commissions on the sum of five thousand dollars paid to the defendant, but not on the additional sum of two thousand and sixty-one dollars to be paid to her attorneys for fees and costs, and that the demurrer to the counter-claim should be sustained, upon two grounds: First, that the answer does not contain a sufficient allegation to support the counter-claim; second, that the note was not a proper subject of counter-claim in this action, not being due to the defendant in the same right in which she is sued; and rendered judgment accordingly.

From this judgment defendant appeals upon two grounds, the third being of too general a nature to require any notice from us, as has been frequently held: "1. Because of error in holding 'that the plaintiff was entitled to commissions as trustee on the five thousand dollars paid to defendant by John H. Hollingsworth,' the said plaintiff never having received nor paid out the same. 2. Because of error in holding 'that the note set up in discount by the defendant against plaintiff's claim for commissions was not a good and valid counter-claim or set-off against any and all demands of the said plaintiff.'"

The reasons given by the Circuit judge and the authorities which he has cited in support of his conclusions are so entirely satisfactory that we scarcely deem it necessary to add anything to what he has said. It is very manifest that one of the objects in having the plaintiff appointed trustee was to have the claim of *the defendant against the guardian properly prosecuted, as the marriage settlement not only authorized but required this to be done by the trustee. Now, when this duty was performed, and nothing remained to be done but receive the money which was the fruit of the litigation commenced and prosecuted by the trustee, it would seem strange indeed if the mere fact that the money was paid into the hands of the cestui que trust instead of the trustee, who was present and ready to receive it, should deprive the latter of his claim to the usual compensation. The testimony shows that Hollingsworth refused to pay the money unless the trustee executed the assignment, which he accordingly did, and the case is, therefore, very much like the case suggested in the argument of respondent's counsel, of money being deposited in bank to the credit of a trustee, which, of course, could only be drawn out upon his check. Certainly, in such a case, if the trustee, accompanied by his cestui que trust or her agent, went to the bank, signed the check, and allowed the money to be paid directly into her hands, instead of his own, this would not deprive him of his right to commissions.

It is argued, however, that upon the death of Robert D. Brunson the trust terminated, and the plaintiff was no longer trustee, and the defendant had a right to receive directly her own money. Even if this were so, it would seem a little strange that no such suggestion appears to have been made until the trustee comes to claim compensation for the performance of the very duty for which he was appointed. But is it so? The marriage settlement contains no such provision; on the contrary, that instrument vested the legal title of the estate of the defendant, consisting solely of choses in action, personal property, in the trustee for the very purpose of enabling him to convert such choses in action into money; and even if there had been nothing further for the trustee to do, the property being personalty, the statute of uses would not apply, and until he had delivered possession, or in some other way divested himself of the legal title, the trust would continue. Harley v. Platts, 6 Rich., 315, and other cases cited by the respondent. When he did turn over the assets to his cestui que trust, whether in the form of money or in the form *of bonds or judgments, he would be entitled to commissions, under the authorities cited by the Circuit judge.

Again, it is argued that when Judge Carpenter rendered judgment in the original case of Lanier and others v. Griffin and others, he rendered judgment in favor of M. C. Brunson by name and not in favor of the plaintiffs in that action, and, therefore, she alone, and not the trustee, had the right to enforce such judgment and receive the money. While it is true that the judgment is, in form, in favor of Mrs. Brunson, who was the real party in interest, yet it must be manifest that this was not done under the view that the trust had terminated, or with the purpose of excluding any of the rights of the trustee. Nothing of the kind appears in the decree. Indeed, it does not even appear in that decree, as reported in 11 S. C., 567, when it was filed, or when Robert D. Brunson died, and it is quite clear that nothing whatever was intended to be adjudged as between the plaintiff, Lanier, and his co-plaintiff in that suit, Mrs. Brunson. The decree in that case was, in effect, though not in form, a decree in favor of the plaintiffs in that case, as it should have been. We do not think, therefore, that appellant's position derives any strength from the fact that the judgment in that case was nominally in favor of M. C. Brunson.

The second ground of appeal cannot be sustained. There was no sufficient allegation that the defendant was the duly qualified executor of Robert D. Brunson, deceased, and therefore the counter-claim was open to the demurrer interposed. But in addition to this, it would seem from the authority cited (Pom. Rem., § 751) that the note set up as a counter-claim, not being due to defendant in her own right, could not be pleaded as a counterclaim. Mrs. Brunson individually and Mrs. Brunson as executrix of the will of her husband are in law two distinct and different persons. Besides, even if the demurrer should have been overruled, the Circuit judge states that there was no evidence that the defendant had ever been appointed or qualified as executrix of her husband's will, and this statement is fully sustained by an examination of the testimony set out in the "Case"; and in the absence of such evidence, it is quite clear that the counter-claim could not be sustained.

*Whether the defendant could not, by proper allegations and proofs, have obtained the benefit of the note set up as a counter-claim, or whether she may not still subject the amount recovered in this action to the payment of that debt, as intimated by the Circuit judge, are questions which are not now before us, and cannot, therefore, be considered or adjudged.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WHALEY v. JACOBSON & SON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Landlord and Tenant ⇐5.]

A contract between a landlord and one M., which, taken as a whole, gave to M. the possession of the land for the year, was substantially a lease, and gave M. such an interest in the crops to be made thereon as enabled him to encumber it with liens for advances, subject to the landlord's lien for rent to the extent of one-third of the crop.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 4; Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. ⇐5.]

[2. Agriculture ⟸12.]

Where a landlord leased land to a tenant for a stipulated rent, and also agreed to make advances, which were to be repaid out of the crop, but the contract was not recorded nor filed, the landlord cannot, in action against the sheriff, recover for such advances the crop made by the tenant on this land, the sheriff having seized it under a warrant issued upon a merchant's recorded lien of later date, given by the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Agriculture, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. ⟸12.]

[3. Landlord and Tenant ⟸244.]

A landlord, to secure a lien for advances made to his tenant, or for rent exceeding one-third of the crop, must comply with the same terms and conditions as are imposed by the statute upon all others.

Before Wallace, J., Orangeburg, May, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. T. B. Whaley, for appellant.

Mr. James F. Izlar, contra.

March 24th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On January 5, 1881, Lawrence M. Whaley entered into a written agreement with one Samuel Middleton as follows: "I, Samuel Middleton, do hereby agree to *plant and cultivate properly, in cotton and provisions, during the year 1881, at my own cost and expenses, thirty-five acres of L. M. Whaley's land in Orangeburg county, and at my own cost and charges to gather and prepare for market the crops to be made thereon, and to deliver the same in accordance with the directions of the said L. M. Whaley or his agent. I further agree to repair and keep in good condition the fencing around said land, in consideration of which the said L. M. Whaley hereby agrees to advance the said Samuel Middleton, during the year aforesaid, fertilizers and supplies, amounting to three hundred dollars, to be used in the cultivation of said crops; that the said Samuel Middleton shall occupy, during the year, the premises now in his possession; and after the said L. M. Whaley has realized twelve hundred pounds of lint cotton, and has also paid the advances to be made as aforesaid, with interest thereon, then the said Samuel Middleton shall have the residue of said crops," &c.

This contract was never indexed or recorded, but Middleton took possession under it. He got some supplies from Whaley under the contract, there being still a balance therefor of $116 due Whaley. During the year he desired other supplies, and in February he gave an agricultural lien for supplies to B. Jacobson & Son, merchants, to the amount of $135. This lien was properly indexed in the clerk's office, February 23, 1881. Middleton delivered the 1,200 pounds of lint cotton to the landlord, Whaley, but did not pay him the balance for advances by him. On December 29, 1881, B. Jacobson & Son procured from the clerk a warrant to seize the crop remaining in the possession of Middleton, and A. M. Salley, the sheriff, levied on cotton seed, fodder, hay, and rice straw, and was about to sell the same, when Whaley, the landlord, brought this action before a trial justice to recover possession of said articles as his property, there being still a balance due to him for advances made during the year.

The jury in the trial justice's court rendered a verdict for defendant, and the plaintiff appealed to the Court of Common Pleas. Judge Wallace affirmed the decision, and the plaintiff appeals upon the following exceptions: "1. Because under the agreement, Middleton's interest in the crop to be produced by his labor was *not such as to enable him in advance to subject it to a legal lien. 2. Because Middleton had no right to give a lien upon the crop which belonged to the plaintiff until the residue, or his share, was set apart and delivered to him. 3. Because in the cultivation of plaintiff's land Middleton was not his tenant, but his employé merely, and could not encumber with a lien more than his interest in the crop. 4. Because Middleton had no right or title to any of the produce until the residue was ascertained and delivered to him."

This court has held in several cases that a mere employé, who cultivates the crop of another for hire, either in money or a part of the crop, is not, in the sense of the agricultural acts, "a cultivator of the soil," and entitled, before a division of the crop, to dispose of it or encumber it with liens; but that one who is the owner, or entitled under contract or lease to the possession of the soil which he cultivates on his own account, may give a lien upon the crop thereon produced, subject, however, in the case of a lessee, to the right of the landlord to have his rent first to the extent of one-third of the crop, and that without recording or filing. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C., 551; Richey & Miller v. DuPre, 20 S. C., 6; Carpenter v. Strickland, Id., 1.

The first question is as to the relation which Middleton bore to Whaley, the owner of the land. Did the contract make him a tenant or a mere employé? It is somewhat confused, and all of its parts are not consistent with each other; but taken as a whole, we think it gave Middleton possession of the premises, and was substantially a lease for a year. A lease is defined to be "in effect a conveyance of the possession of property (generally lands or houses) for a fixed period, and usually with the reservation of a rent." Rap. & Law. L. Dict., 735.

It is true that the stipulations which required Middleton to deliver the crops after they were gathered, "in accordance with the direction of Whaley or his agent," looks as if there was some intention to retain possession of the place; but, on the other hand, the stipulations that Middleton was to "occupy the place" and "keep it in repair," and that "the landlord would make advances to him," are only consistent with the idea of a temporary transfer of possession. Middleton was to occupy the premises, to *plant and cultivate cotton and provisions at his own cost and expense, and to repair and keep in good condition the fencing; in consideration of which he agreed to take advances during the year; "and after the said L. M. Whaley has realized 1,200 pounds of lint cotton, and has paid (we suppose Middleton) the advances to be made as aforesaid, with interest thereon, then the said Middleton shall have the residue of the crops," &c.

This contract is very different from that in Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C., 83 [40 Am. Rep. 680] which gave the landlord "the entire control of the time and services of the employé in working his lands under his exclusive direction and control from sun to sun." "A servant, strictly speaking, is a person who, by contract or operation of law, is for a limited period subject to the authority or control of another person in a particular trade, business, or occupation." Wood M. & S., 2. We think Middleton was a tenant of the landlord, Whaley, and "a cultivator of the soil" in the sense of the agricultural acts.

Taking this as settled, Middleton had such an interest in the crop to be made as enabled him to encumber it with liens for advances, subject always to the rights of the landlord for his rent to the extent of one-third of the crop. But in this view, it is urged that the plaintiff also made advances, and being the landlord, his lien was "prior and preferred," whether it was registered or not. It was Middleton's covenant to take "the residue of the crop after these advancements were paid;" and if he had delivered the crop to the landlord in discharge of this obligation, Jacobson & Son could not have recovered their claim in money from him. See Kennedy v. Reames, supra. But Middleton did not so deliver the crop, which, remaining in his possession, was seized under the warrant of Jacobson & Son, and this gives rise to a different question, viz., whether the landlord had such title in the crop as to enable him to recover possession of it from the sheriff, not under agricultural warrant, but in an ordinary action for delivery of personal property.

As an ordinary lienee, he certainly had no such right, for several reasons, and especially because his lien was not recorded as required by law. As landlord he had the right to his rent to the limit before indicated.

What was his rent? Was it limited *to the lint cotton delivered, or did it include also the payment of the advances made? Can the obligation of Middleton that these advances should be first paid be properly regarded as a part of the rent promised by him? The obligation to pay these advances was not in a separate paper, according to the usual form in such cases, but in the original rent contract, and we have little doubt that such agreement was one of the inducements which moved the landlord to grant the lease, and therefore to that extent was part of the consideration of the lease. But it was rather an unusual way of securing rent, and if it were possible so to consider it, we do not see how it could be estimated, especially in view of the limit in the amount of the landlord's lien. The whole amount could not be added as so much more consideration for the use of the land, i. e., rent, for the consideration is expressly declared to be for advances to be made.

The law favors the landlord, but we do not suppose that, in giving priority to rent, the legislature had in contemplation such contracts as this, or intended to do more than to secure the rent proper to the landlord, and then leave him to make agricultural advances to his tenants upon the same terms and conditions as to recording, &c., as were imposed upon all others. The law expressly declares such to be the intention as to so much of the crop as exceeds one-third, and we do not see why it should not be so construed in reference to advances made by the landlord to his tenant, which are not in its proper sense "rent."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., York, June, 1883.

This was an action by W. W. Gaffney against Daniel Peeler and others for the recovery of a tract of land, commenced in 1882. The defendants are the heirs-at-law of Daniel Peeler, sr. The plaintiff claimed under this same Daniel Peeler, sr., under the chain of titles stated in the opinion of this court. The releases to the widow were in the shape of bonds, whereby the obligor bound himself, on payment of the purchase money, to execute good titles to the obligee for his or his wife's share, or if partition should be ordered, then to execute a power to the obligee to receive the share awarded to the obligor. The first of these bonds bears date October 26, 1840, and was executed by Moses M. Dunn, husband of one of the distributees, to Anthony Peeler, and by intermediate bonds of others, and finally by bond of Anthony Peeler to Levicey Peeler, the widow, dated November 6, 1846, all of the shares were transferred, or attempted to be transferred, to Levicey Peeler, except that of Mrs. Moss, a widowed daughter, who resided on the place. But the married *daughters signed none of these bonds; they were executed by their husbands, two of whom have survived their wives. On March 14, 1863, Levicey Moss, widow, by a like bond, transferred her share to her mother.

There was no evidence of any deed from Gist to Daniel Peeler, jr., but plaintiffs introduced in evidence a minute of a meeting of the stockholders of the King's Mountain Iron Company, proved to be in the handwriting of R. V. Gist, approving a purchase of the property from Daniel Peeler, jr. A declaration of Gist that he had purchased the Peeler land for the Iron Company was also proved.

In 1842 all the children of Daniel Peeler, sr., had moved to Georgia, except Levicey Moss and Daniel Peeler, who remained with their mother on the place. This situation continued until March, 1863, when Levicey Peeler made her deed to Gist, about which time the land was abandoned by the Peeler family. In 1879 the defendants, heirs of Daniel Peeler, sr., and of his wife Levicey (who died in 1865), entered upon the land and held it adversely.

The Circuit judgment was as follows:

The plaintiff brings this action against the defendants to recover possession of a tract of 695 acres of land, which it is alleged they wrongfully withhold from him, and of which he is seized in fee. The defendants deny the title of the plaintiff, and lay claim to the said land as heirs-at-law of Daniel Peeler, sr., deceased, and of his deceased widow, Levicey Peeler. By the pleadings the action is one involving the title to real estate. No equitable feature is engrafted upon the action, neither in the complaint nor in the answer.

The parties, waiving trial by jury, and desiring a trial by the court, procured the issues of law and of fact to be referred to a special referee. Accordingly references were held and much testimony was taken, and this testimony, with the findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the exceptions thereto, bring the case for hearing before me. To the testimony and report of the referee, reference must be had for the detail of the facts, a statement of which I cannot incorporate into this judgment because they are so voluminous.

*In such an action it devolves upon the plaintiff to shew perfect title in himself to the disputed land, in order to recover of the defendants who are in possession claiming title. The plaintiff must rely upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that of the defendants. It is in order therefore first to examine the title of the plaintiff as set up and ascertain its strength. If he has shewn a prima facie title, it will be in order then to examine the title established by the defence, so as to determine whether or not it be paramount to that of the plaintiff.

Both parties claim under Daniel Peeler, sr., deceased, to whom the land was granted by the state in July, A. D. 1819, and who died seized and possessed thereof about 1830. The following is the plaintiff's abstract of title which he claims has been sufficiently established:

1. Deed to the locus in quo bearing date May 6th, 1881, sold by virtue of an order of the Court of Common Pleas at the suit of T. J. Bell, who held it as agent of the creditors of the King's Mountain Iron Company.

2. Deed to the locus in quo by the sheriff of York to T. J. Bell, bearing date May 18th, 1880, the same having been levied on and sold by said sheriff at the suit of the said execution creditors of the King's Mountain Iron Company in 1869 and deed made in 1880, and possession taken by Bell in 1869.

3. Deed of Daniel Peeler, jr., bearing date June 12th, 1863, conveying the land to the King's Mountain Iron Company.

4. Alleged deed of Richard V. Gist shortly prior to the last named deed of June 12th, 1863, conveying said land to Daniel Peeler.

5. Deed March 14, 1863, of Levicey Peeler, conveying said land to R. V. Gist.

6. Deeds of the surviving children of Daniel Peeler, sr., conveying their respective shares of said land to their mother, Levicey Peeler, evidenced by bonds for title given at different days and times between 1840 and 1863, but mostly prior to 1846.

7. Death of Daniel Peeler, deceased, about 1830, seized in fee of this land, which was granted to him by the state July 19th, 1819, leaving him surviving his widow, Levicey Peeler, and ten children.

*This abstract of plaintiff's alleged title I have formulated from the testimony, and it is very clear that if the evidence establishes it, he must recover of the defendants. The plaintiff has, by proper and sufficient proof, established the first, second, and third links in his chain of title. The deeds of conveyance are in evidence, and no question has been made as to their execution and delivery. By this proof the plaintiff has traced his title through successive owners of this land back to June 12th, 1863.

But the fourth link is missing. No deed from R. V. Gist to Daniel Peeler, jr., has been produced. There is no evidence that such a deed was ever made. Neither the original nor an office copy can be found, nor has any witness been produced to prove that such a paper ever existed. Betwixt the time when Levicey Peeler, the widow, conveyed to R. V. Gist, and the time when Daniel Peeler conveyed to the King's Mountain Iron Company, but a few months intervened, to wit, from March 16, 1863, to June 12, 1863, but how Daniel Peeler got title does not appear. To make it appear that such a transfer of title was made, the plaintiff introduced before the referee declarations of Gist, who is living in the state, and the minutes of the King's Mountain Iron Company, to the effect that Gist had bought the land from Levicey Peeler. But none of these declarations are to the effect that Gist conveyed to Daniel Peeler, jr., but are statements of other facts, from which we are asked to conjecture or infer that he did so.

All these declarations, even if admissible, when duly weighed, are insufficient to support the inference that Gist sold and conveyed the land to Peeler. But this loose hearsay testimony is clearly inadmissible in behalf of plaintiff's title. He claims under the King's Mountain Iron Company, and also under Gist, and the declarations of these persons in favor of their own title are inadmissible in behalf of the plaintiff. A witness for the defendants stated on his examination that while in Georgia he saw a paper purporting to be a bond for titles from Gist to Peeler in the possession of Peeler, but it had neither date nor witness. This does not cure the want of proof by plaintiff, and, intrinsically, is worth little as testimony. I conclude that this fourth *link in the plaintiff's chain is missing, and that it is unsupplied by proof.

It is suggested that we might conclude that the title of Gist was the title of the company, and thus make the connection. But such is not the plaintiff's allegation in his complaint, nor is there any legitimate testimony going to sustain such a conclusion. In fact, the circumstances negative this theory, because, if such were true, why would the company have taken title from Daniel Peeler, under whom they held and claimed? Why not take from Gist? If Gist bought for the company, there appears no reason at all why they should not have taken his title, instead of title from another. This theory has no evidence to support it, and is negatived by the circumstances. Now, it seems that T. J. Bell held the title of the King's Mountain Company for the period of ten years, and this might save the plaintiff's case, provided he could go beyond 1863 and connect himself with other owners of the land, the united possession of whom would cover a period of more than twenty years, so as to presume a grant from the state.

If he were making out his title before a jury, and proved title in Bell and his possession of the land for ten years or more, still he would be nonsuited, unless he could connect Bell with preceding owners and occupants of the land, whose period of ownership would form a period of twenty years or more, from the plaintiff downward, in which the land had been owned connectedly and successively by citizens of the state under whom plaintiff claims. Subjected to this fundamental rule as to the mode of raising the presumption of a grant, the plaintiff would be nonsuited, because he stops short in his proof at June 12, 1863, which leaves him within the period of twenty years, and deprives him of the benefit of the presumption of a grant by the state.

But so far as Bell's title and possession are concerned, the plaintiff can derive little benefit therefrom, because that possession was interrupted, before the lapse of ten years, by the defendants, who, as heirs at law of Daniel Peeler, sr., and of their deceased mother, the widow, re-entered upon the land and ousted Bell, and still hold against the plaintiff. At the sale at which the plaintiff purchased this land, the defendants caused full and explicit notice, in writing, to be published, declaring their posses*sion and title to this land. The plaintiff purchased with his eyes open, and, it is said, bought at a nominal price. He accepted the gage thrown down to him, and coming into this court to assert his title to the territory which he knew to be possessed and claimed by the defendants, he has failed in his venture under the most liberal construction of the rules of evidence and principles of law.

Now the plaintiff holds the title of Daniel Peeler, jr., to this tract of land. He is one of the heirs at law of Daniel Peeler, sr., to whom the land was granted by the state in 1819, and were it not that Daniel Peeler, jr., parted with his interest and estate as heir to his father long ago, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover that part, which is the one-fifteenth of the whole. But as far back as December 15th, 1842, he sold his interest to his mother, and her title thereto became absolute and perfect before she, in March, 1863, sold and conveyed to Gist.

I conclude, therefore, as a matter of fact, that plaintiff has failed to show title to the land in dispute, and hence cannot recover possession thereof from the defendants. All the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the referee at variance with the facts herein found and the principles of law herein announced are overruled.

I deem it unnecessary to examine in detail the merits of the defendants' title, as they are allowed to stand upon their possession of the land until ousted by paramount title. It would be very tedious to follow the learned referee in his various findings of fact and conclusions of law bearing upon the various and frequent transfers of title by the heirs at law of Daniel Peeler, sr., the one to the other. It is enough to say that I cannot agree with him in his views of the effect of the attempts of the husbands of Peeler's daughters to convey or to sell their wives' shares in this land. My own opinion is that Levicey Peeler, the widow, under a proper construction of the law and findings of fact, did get good and sufficient title to shares of such of the children as, being sui juris, sold to her; the lapse of time and possession curing the absence of proof of deeds. She also got title to the husbands' shares of their wives' parts in each case where the husband sold and survived the wife; but in cases where the wife *survived the husband, his previous attempt to convey conferred no estate, but the whole survived to the wife.

It is a mistake also in the referee to hold that in South Carolina, prior to 1868, a husband surviving the wife had an estate in curtesy to her separate real estate. The act of 1791, in my opinion, fixed his right as one of her heirs, and abolished the estate by curtesy in her fee simple estate by necessary implication. The provisions of that act are totally inconsistent with the estate of curtesy in the husband.

Should the plaintiff hereafter be able to put the defendants to the exact proof of title, it will be time enough for the court to adjudge in detail which of the defendants have, and which have not, title superior to that of the plaintiff. Having adjudged that he has not proved title, we are called on to go no further.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complaint be dismissed, and that the defendants have execution for their costs.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

It is respectfully submitted that his honor the presiding judge erred:

1. In overruling the finding of fact by the referee that R. V. Gist had conveyed the land in dispute to Daniel Peeler, jr., since, being a case at law, and all the issues having been referred to the referee: (a.) The said finding was not without evidence to sustain it. (b.) It was in accordance with the clear preponderance of the evidence. (c.) The evidence in support of the finding was conclusive, and there was no evidence to rebut it.

2. In holding that the alleged conveyance from Gist to Peeler was unsupported by the proof.

3. In excluding from the evidence the minutes of a meeting of the stockholders of the King's Mountain Iron Company, at which Gist, the agent of the company, and a stockholder, was present, and reported the purchase for the said company of the land in dispute from Daniel Peeler, offered to show: (a.) That Gist had conveyed to Peeler. (b.) And, generally, that Gist's title was in the company.

*4. In excluding from the evidence the declarations of the said Gist in favor of the said company's title, made whilst its agent.

5. In holding that Levicey Peeler, when she conveyed to Gist, was not seized of the several interests of the married daughters and their husbands in the land in dispute.

6. In holding that the plaintiff took nothing by the deed of Daniel Peeler, jr., to the King's Mountain Iron Company, because he had previously conveyed his interest away, and that he can retain the possession, in the face of his own deed, against the plaintiff.

7. In adjudging that the plaintiff's complaint should be dismissed.

8. In holding that plaintiff, in his proof of a chain of successive possessions in preceding owners for twenty years, stopped short at June 12, 1863, the testimony being that Levicey Peeler, who sold to R. V. Gist, March 14, 1863, continued to hold until January 1, 1864, when she surrendered the possession to the King's Mountain Iron Company.

9. In not holding that the possession of the King's Mountain Iron Company was not broken by T. J. Bell, when he entered in 1869, but that he must be taken to have held under and for the said company until he accepted the sheriff's title, May 18, 1880, and because of such acceptance.

10. In not adjudging that the plaintiff is seized of all the right, title, and and claim that the said Gist ever held in the premises, and that he is entitled to recover the same, with damages for the withholding, according to the proof.

11. In not adjudging that Daniel Peeler, jr., and the other defendants who claim to hold as the heirs at law of Daniel Peeler, sr., and Levicey Peeler, are estopped from denying transfer of the said Daniel Peeler, jr.'s title, as one of such heirs at law, to the plaintiff or his grantors.

12. In not adjudging that the plaintiff was entitled, as against the said Daniel Peeler, jr., and the defendants claiming as aforesaid, to be let into possession of the premises to the extent of the interest of the said Daniel Peeler, as an heir at law of his father and mother, and to damages for the withholding, according to the proof.

*13. In not recommitting the report to the referee for his findings of fact from the testimony not adjudged to be incompetent.

Messrs. C. E. Spencer and J. H. Rion for appellant.

Mr. James F. Hart, contra.

April 2d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover possession of a certain tract of land in York county, "And that the title should be adjudged in the plaintiff in fee simple, and in the event that judgment in his favor should be for only an undivided interest in the same, the plaintiff will demand judgment that the premises aforesaid be divided between plaintiff and the parties in interest according to their respective shares, or if division in kind be impracticable, that the said premises be sold, and the proceeds divided as aforesaid." In his complaint he sets out his chain of title as follows:

1. A grant to Daniel Peeler, sr., dated July 19th, 1819.

2. Death of Daniel Peeler, sr., intestate, about 1830, leaving as his heirs at law his widow, Levicey, and ten children.

3. Releases from the children to the widow.

4. Deed from widow to R. V. Gist, dated March 14th, 1863.

5. Deed from Gist to Daniel Peeler, jr., date unknown.

6. Deed from Daniel Peeler, jr., to the King's Mountain Iron Company, dated June 12th, 1863.

7. Deed from sheriff of the interest of said company sold under execution to T. J. Bell.

8. Deed from clerk of court to plaintiff, dated May 6th, 1881, in pursuance of a sale made by him under proper proceedings for that purpose.

In the second count of the complaint, as it is called, the plaintiff simply sets up a claim that he is seized in fee of the premises in dispute, without specifying the sources of his title; and in the third count he claims that he was lawfully in possession of the premises in question, and that defendants unlawfully entered upon and disseized the plaintiff and forcibly keep him out of possession. The answers contained a general denial of the plaintiff's *title, and no further statement of what they contain need be made as the question turns upon the validity of plaintiff's title.

A trial by jury was waived, and an order was granted referring it to a referee, "to hear, determine, and report upon all the issues of law and fact raised by the said pleadings, with the right reserved to either party to file exceptions to said report, and to have the same heard in this court; it being understood that neither party waives the right to a subsequent trial by jury of the issues raised, whether Thomas J. Bell, Esq., through whom the plaintiff claims, acquired title to the property in dispute by possession subsequently to the execution sale, at which it is alleged he purchased the same."

Accordingly, the case came before the Circuit judge upon the report of the referee, with exceptions thereto filed both by plaintiff and defendants, and he held that the plaintiff had failed to establish the fourth link in the chain of title, as the Circuit judge stated the chain, but the fifth link in the chain of title as herein above stated; and that as plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversaries', who may rely simply upon their possession, he rendered judgment dismissing the complaint. The judge, however, does go on to express his dissent from certain legal propositions announced by the referee, in reference to the effect of the releases of such of the children of Levicey Peeler as were married women at the time—the papers claimed to operate as releases being signed by the husbands and not by their wives—and in reference to the right of the husbands to estates of tenancy by the curtesy, which are made the basis of one of the exceptions.

The plaintiff appeals upon numerous grounds, which are fully set out in the "Case," and need not be repeated here. The first and most material question made is, whether the judge erred in holding that the plaintiff had failed to establish any conveyance from Gist to Daniel Peeler, jr., the fifth link in the plaintiff's chain of title as we have stated it. The referee having found that such a conveyance was proved by the evidence before him, it is contended that as this is a case at law, the Circuit judge had no right to overrule this finding of fact, but was bound to accept it as a verdict of a jury. It will be observed, however, that the *terms of the order of reference plainly show that such was not the intention of the parties, but that all the findings of the referee, both of law and fact, were open to review, and under such an order of reference, as is intimated in Ross v. Linder, 18 S. C., 605, the parties would be estopped from making the question.

But in addition to this, where, as in this case, the finding of fact by the referee is based upon incompetent testimony, there surely cannot be a question as to the right of the judge to reverse such finding upon the ground of error of law. Here the referee based his finding of fact upon certain minutes made upon the books of the King's Mountain Iron Company, of which Gist was agent, and certain declarations made by Gist, which we think were clearly incompetent, amounting to nothing more than declarations of parties under whom the plaintiff claims, in favor of their own title. The question whether Gist had conveyed to Peeler was a question of fact, and the decision of the Circuit judge is conclusive. The point made in the argument, though not appearing very distinctly in the exceptions, that Gist, when he bought from Mrs. Peeler, though he took title in his own name, really bought for the company, and that the purchase money was paid out of the company's funds, rests upon the declaration of Gist and the minutes of the company, which, as we have seen, were incompetent testimony, and for this reason cannot be sustained.

Next, as to the effect of the papers claimed to operate as releases to Levicey Peeler of the interests of her several children. So far as the rights of those of them who were married women are concerned, we agree with the Circuit judge in the view which he has taken. The only mode by which a married woman, prior to 1868, could dispose of her estate of inheritance in land, is that prescribed by the act of 1795, and unless that mode is strictly pursued, the interest of the wife does not pass. McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 S. C., 402.

So, too, we agree with the Circuit judge that the necessary effect of the act of 1791 was to abolish the husband's right to hold as tenant by the curtesy lands of his wife which she held as tenant in fee simple. This question, so far as we are informed, does not seem to have been distinctly decided in any reported *case in this state, though Chancellor Dargan, in Wright v. Herron, 5 Rich. Eq., at page 446, in speaking of the effect of the act of 1791, says: "Upon the construction of this act it has been held, that the husband is not entitled to his curtesy in fee simple estates," notwithstanding the fact that he does go on to use language which would seem to imply that he was inclined to a different opinion.

It seems to us, however, that the necessary effect of this act was to abolish the husband's estate by the curtesy. The object of the act, as expressed in its title and preamble, was not only to abolish the right of primogeniture, but also to provide for the "equitable distribution of the real estates of intestates," as specially enjoined by art. x. § 5 of the constitution of 1790. Accordingly, in the first section, it declares, amongst other things, "that when any person possessed of, interested in, or entitled unto a real estate in his or her own right, in fee simple, shall die without disposing thereof by will, the same shall be distributed in the following manner," and then proceeds to provide for the various contingencies which may occur, and the mode of distribution in such contingencies, amongst others, as follows: "On the death of any married woman the husband shall be entitled to the same share of her real estate as is herein given to the widow out of the estate of the husband," etc. It will be observed that the language of the act is imperative, that the real estate of an intestate "shall be distributed" in the manner prescribed by the act, and therefore any other disposition of it would not be lawful.

It will also be observed that while the act nowhere recognizes the preëxisting estate of curtesy, it does, in section 6, expressly recognize, but does not undertake to create or re-establish, the preëxisting estate of dower. It will be further noticed that the act gives to the husband, not the same interest which a surviving wife would take out of the real estate of her deceased husband, but "the same share of her real estate as is herein given to the widow out of the estate of the husband." It would seem to follow, therefore, that while the act of 1791 cannot be regarded as excluding the widow's right of dower, inasmuch as it expressly recognizes such right, it must be construed as excluding the right of curtesy, which is not recognized, and which, if allowed, would *disturb and defeat the mode in which the act declares the estate of an intestate "shall be distributed."

Looking to the special features of the act as above pointed out, we are unable to see the force of the view suggested by Chancellor Dargan, above referred to. His language is as follows: "But as the widow is allowed to elect between her distributive share and her dower, and as the act expressly declares that the husband shall be entitled to the same share in his deceased wife's real estate as it allows to the widow out of the husband's estate, would it not be a just construction to allow the husband his election between his distributive share and his curtesy, and this even in fee simple estates? Is there any case which adjudges this question which refuses him his election?" As we have seen, however, that while the act expressly recognizes the estate of dower, and shows by the plainest implication that the intention was not to abrogate, or in any way interfere with that estate, it does not recognize the estate by the curtesy, and its recognition or allowance would seriously interfere with and practically defeat the scheme of the act. Again, as we have said, the estate of dower is not "herein given," it is not created or provided for by the act, and it only gives to the husband "the same share of her real estate as is herein given to the widow out of the estate of the husband." There is, therefore, no ground for construing the act as intending to give to a surviving husband an equivalent estate to that of dower, for it expressly provides that his share shall be the same as that provided for the widow by the terms of the act, and the estate of dower is not so provided for.

It is true that there is a case (Gray v. Givens, 2 Hill Eq., 511) in which the husband was allowed to elect to hold his deceased's wife's lands, as tenant by the curtesy, or to take under the statute of distributions, but in that case the question was not raised or discussed. On the contrary, the bill itself prayed that the husband might be required to elect whether he would hold as tenant by the curtesy or take his share under the statute of distributions. The case cannot, therefore, be regarded as any authority upon the question under consideration.

In the case of Wright v. Herron, supra, the question arose whether a surviving husband was entitled to hold, as tenant by *the curtesy, the lands of which his deceased wife had held in fee conditional, and it was in discussing that question that Chancellor Dargan threw out the obiter dictum, in reference to estates held in fee simple, which has been quoted above. Inasmuch as the act of 1791, in express terms, applies only to estates held in fee simple, and could not well apply to an estate held in fee conditional, where by the very nature of the estate the succession is limited to a particular class of heirs, it is quite clear that the question in Wright v. Herron was a totally different one from that which we are called upon to determine. But even the question there presented does not seem to have been by any means free from difficulty, for at the request of two of the chancellors it was referred to the Court of Errors (6 Rich. Eq., 406), and that court being equally divided upon the question, it was referred back to the Court of Equity, which held that the husband was entitled to hold, as tenant by the curtesy, lands of which his deceased wife held an estate in fee conditional, and that decision has been subsequently approved in Withers v. Jenkins, 14 S. C., 597; but from what is said by the chief justice, at page 608, in delivering the opinion of the court, it is very apparent that a different conclusion would have been reached if the estate of the wife had been a fee simple instead of a fee conditional estate.

The next point raised by appellants' sixth, eleventh, and twelfth exceptions is as to the plaintiff's right to recover the interest of Daniel Peeler, jr. It seems that on June 12th, 1863, he conveyed, with general warranty, the premises in dispute to the King's Mountain Iron Company, whose title the plaintiff holds. The effect of this deed, containing a general warranty clause, was to convey to that company, and consequently to the plaintiff, not only whatever interest he then had, but also any that he might thereafter acquire. Reeder ads. Craig, 3 McC., 412; Harvin v. Hodge, Dud., 25; Starke v. Harrison, 5 Rich., 8. It is true that he had previously sold his interest as heir at law of his father to his mother, but if he subsequently acquired an interest in the land, either as heir at law of his mother, or otherwise, such interest would pass under his deed to the company. It is likewise true that the plaintiff introduced a deed from his mother conveying the land to Gist, but the defendants *contend that Gist abandoned his claim to the land in favor of the heirs at law of Levicey Peeler, of whom Daniel Peeler, jr., was one. Be this, however, as it may, we find Daniel Peeler named as one of the defendants in this action, and his deed to the King's Mountain Company will certainly estop him, as well as any who claim under him as heirs at law or otherwise (it being suggested in the argument that he has died since the commencement of the action), from disputing the title of the plaintiff, who holds the title of said company. Upon this point, therefore, we think the Circuit judge erred, and that the case must go back.

This disposes of all the exceptions except those which raise questions of fact, which we have no power to review.

The point made in the argument, but not in the exceptions based upon what is called the third count in the complaint, that the plaintiff, without regard to title, is entitled to recover on account of his priority of possession, from which he was wrongfully ejected by the defendants, is not properly before us. It does not appear to have been presented to, and certainly was not passed upon by, the Circuit judge, and there is no exception raising the point.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

McNAIR v. INGRAHAM.

SAME v. SAME.

[2. Execution ⟸98.]

An execution more than twenty years old was renewed by order of court, the defendant having failed to appear and show any cause in answer to a summons properly served upon him. Held, that this renewal was an acknowledgment by defendant that the judgment was a subsisting lien, that the matter was res judicata, and the renewal *execution valid, and that a sale of defendant's land thereunder gave title to the purchaser.[1]

3. This case distinguished from Tobin v. Myers, 18 S. C., 324.

Before Fraser, J., Chesterfield, April, 1883.

The opinion states the cases.

Mr. W. L. T. Prince, for appellant.

Mr. Knox Livingston, contra.

In action for the recovery of real estate, the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title. Tyler Eject., 72; 14 S. C., 483; 15 Id., 268. In making a sale, there must be a valid process to which the sheriff can refer his authority: Rorer Jud. Sales, § 590; 1 Hill, 416; 1 Bailey, 618; 13 Rich. Eq., 246. In execution sales, both judgment and execution are necessary links in the title. Rorer, § 794; 1 Nott & McC., 408; 2 Id., 418; 18 S. C., 327. If either be wanting, the sheriff had no authority to sell, and the purchaser takes nothing. Ibid.; 3 Rich., 120; 14 S. C., 483. Over twenty years had elapsed since the entry of judgment, and therefore it was presumed to have been paid. 2 Hill Ch., 234; 1 Rich. Eq., 55; 3 Strob., 450; 5 Rich., 501; 14 S. C., 100; 17 Id., 485; 18 Id., 328. The issuing, and renewal by summons, of the executions did not rebut this presumption of payment, for the presumption begins to run from the entry of judgment, and subsequent admissions must be such as would revive a debt barred by the statute of limitations, and that is an express promise to pay. Dudley, 121; Harper, 355; 2 Bailey, 278; 6 Rich., 117; 15 Id., 374; 14 S. C., 102. There was no such promise in the defendant's default of appearance. If the summons had been issued before the expiration of twenty years, would a plea of payment in an action afterwards brought on the judgment fail? If not, then a fortiori not here. The order on the default was not res judicata of the question here involved. 2 Sm. Lead. Cas., 424; 15 S. C., 576; 17 Id., 40; 18 Id., 209. The renewal of the execution was not *a revival of the judgment. 3 McCord, 419; 2 Strob., 218; Code, §§ 310, 424. Otherwise, a judgment could be collaterally renewed, and fatal defects therein would be cured, and the execution alone a sufficient proof of title. In Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C., 207, and Bull v. Rowe, 13 Id., 362, the plaintiffs sought relief from judgments which they had previously had an opportunity to attack. No such principle is here involved.

April 3, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These cases were heard together. The first was an action to recover fifty-one acres of land, which the plaintiff purchased at sheriff's sale on March 6, 1882, under a judgment and execution obtained by one N. D. Stricklin in his lifetime, against the defendant, Peter Ingraham. The second was an action to recover possession of another tract of fifty acres of land, also purchased by the plaintiff at sheriff's sale on July 9, 1882, under the same judgment and execution against Peter Ingraham, the defendant, Thomas Ingraham, being in possession of this tract. The defence was, that at the time the lands were sold by the sheriff, he had no authority to sell, and therefore his conveyances of the two tracts to the plaintiff were both void.

[1] See next succeeding case, Freer v. Tupper.

It appeared that the judgment against Peter Ingraham had been recovered on September 21, 1859; that execution was duly entered thereon; that the judgment was destroyed by Sherman's army during the war, but the execution was not; that this execution having lost its active energy, one John J. Wilson, administrator of the said Stricklin, the judgment creditor, on January 1, 1881, procured to be issued his summons against the said Peter Ingraham, the defendant in execution, requiring him "to be and appear at the next term of the court, &c., and then and there to show cause, if any you can, why said execution should not be renewed according to law in favor of the said administrator," &c.; that the said Peter Ingraham was regularly served with said summons, but failed to make any defence; and that on June 2, 1881, an order was passed renewing said execution; which renewed execution was levied on those lands, which were at different times sold by the sheriff and purchased by the plaintiff, to whom the sheriff executed titles.

*After the plaintiff had closed his testimony, the defendant moved for a non-suit, on the ground that the judgment was more than twenty years old and presumed to be paid, when the proceedings to renew the execution were instituted, and was therefore functus officio; and the renewed execution being a nullity, the sheriff had no authority to sell. The presiding judge granted the non-suit, and the plaintiff appeals to this court on the following exceptions:

1. "Because the plaintiff, having made a prima facie case, was entitled to go to the jury thereon.

2. "Because, admitting that a presumption of payment of the judgment would arise from lapse of time, the objection to plaintiff's case should have been urged as matter of defence, and not on motion for non-suit.

3. "Because the plaintiff should have been allowed the opportunity to rebut the presumption of payment.

4. "Because the defendant in execution is estopped from denying or attacking the title of the purchaser at sheriff's sale.

5. "Because the validity of the judgment is res adjudicata by the proceedings renewing the execution, and defendants are estopped thereby.

6. "Because the defendants are estopped from objecting to any error or irregularity in the proceedings under which the sale was made.

7. "Because the errors and irregularities in such case must be corrected by a direct proceeding for that purpose, and cannot be made available by way of a collateral attack."

The judgment was rendered on September 21, 1859, and the lands were not sold until 1882, more than twenty years thereafter; and we may say in passing, that if, in the meantime, there had been no act or admission on the part of the defendant in execution, or failure to act when properly called upon to do so, the presumption of payment from lapse of time would have been complete, and the sales by the sheriff void. But the presumption which arises from lapse of time is not one of law and conclusive, but of fact, and may be rebutted by acknowledgments, in analogy to the principles regulating admissions to take a case out of the statute of limitations. Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618].

*This being the case, we think the renewal of the execution after the lapse of twenty years from the date of its rendition, without objection on the part of the defendant in execution, was the most conclusive acknowledgment by him, that the judgment had been kept alive by admissions on his part, and was a valid subsisting lien at the time. Having had a formal opportunity to show that such was not the fact; that there had been no admissions or promises, and therefore the judgment must be presumed to have been paid, and having failed to do so when he was served with summons for renewal, he cannot now make the defence, but is bound by that kind of estoppel which is known as res adjudicata. The defence could have been made, indeed the proceeding challenged him to make it, and failing to make it, the result must be the same as if he had formally made it and failed. Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strob., 207 [47 Am. Dec. 591]; Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C., 197; Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 Id., 127; Trimmier v. Thomson, 19 Id., 253. The precise point was made in the case of Jackson v. Patrick, supra, where it was ruled as follows: "Where a judgment debtor served with a rule to show cause why the execution should not be renewed, has a valid defence which he neglects to make, he is estopped by the judgment renewing the execution, and cannot afterwards be relieved therefrom."

There is nothing in the case of Tobin v. Myers, 18 S. C., 324, inconsistent with the views here presented. The point ruled in that case was that "a judgment will be presumed paid after twenty years have elapsed since its entry, notwithstanding an ex parte renewal of the fi. fa. within that time." The attempted renewal there was only the act of the plaintiff in execution, without serving the defendant or giving him an opportunity to be heard on the question. The very ground upon which the estoppel proceeds is that the defendant had an opportunity to make the defence and failed to do so. As was said in that case, quoting from Dillard v. Brian, 5 Rich., 501: "To explain the indulgence, there must be some act or admission on the part of the defendant, showing the continuance of the debt. In the issuing, returning, and renewing of executions (by mere copy), the defendant has no action. It may be done and redone for forty years, and unless he is astute enough to examine the clerk's and sheriff's offices, he will be ig*norant of the facts." Such, however, is not the case, where the defendant is served with the summons proposing to renew the execution.

The judgment of this court is, that the nonsuit in each of the cases stated in the title of this opinion be set aside, and said cases remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be thought necessary in conformity with the conclusion herein announced.

FREER v. TUPPER.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Evidence ⇐82.]

There is always a presumption in favor of legal process, regular in form.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. ⇐82.]

[2. Mortgages ⇐562.]

Under a decree of foreclosure which ascertained the amount due on a mortgage, directed a sale, and authorized execution to be issued for the deficiency, an execution might issue for the deficiency when ascertained, without further order of the court. Where a decree of foreclosure ordered land of one county to be sold in another, and execution to be issued for the deficiency after such sale, from which decree no appeal was taken, and subsequently the defendant made default to a summons requiring him to show cause why the execution issued in the case should not be renewed, neither he nor his vendee can dispute the title of a purchaser who bought under such renewed execution. Mr. Justice McIver concurred in result.

Before Wallace, J., Colleton, October, 1883.

Action by J. H. Freer, trustee, against George Tupper and J. Moreland Campbell, commenced in July, 1883. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Boyle & Howe, for appellant.

*I. Defendant's motion for non-suit should be sustained: First. (Exc. 3.) "That his honor erred in not holding that the decree of foreclosure in the said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, was not such a decree as authorized the issuing of an execution for its enforcement, as no definite sum of money was found by the terms of the decree to be due from Schultz to Freer, trustee, and contained no order for the payment of the same, and, therefore, that the plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the land claimed." 13 S. C., 254; 6 Id., 106; 12 Id., 27.

Second. (Exc. 1.) "That his honor erred in not holding that there being no evidence of a sale of the mortgaged premises, in the cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, that plaintiff herein had failed to prove any title to the land claimed." Under §§ 12, 13, Gen. Stat. (1872), 474, the mortgagor had the right at any time before the sale to pay the mortgage debt, with costs, and, therefore, execution could not issue until the sale had taken place. The sale was a contingency upon which leave was granted to issue an execution; hence the necessity of proving that sale did take place. 12 S. C., 26; 17 Id., 163.

Third. (Exc. 2.) "That his honor erred in not holding that if the sale of the mortgaged premises, in the cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, was in pursuance of the decree of foreclosure in said cause had in Charleston county, the same was null and void, said mortgaged premises being in the county of Colleton; and that if said sale was had in any other than the county of Charleston, contrary to the terms of the decree of foreclosure in said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, said sale was null and void, and, therefore, that the plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the land claimed." The sale should have been made at the place fixed by law for the sale of property under execution. Gen. Stat. (1872), 474, § 14. The sale of real property under execution must be made in the county where it lies. Code (1872), § 310. Where a place is fixed by law at which sales of real property must be made, a sale made at any other place is void. Rorer Jud. Sales, § 779, and authorities there cited. The decree of foreclosure orders the land to be sold in Charleston county; a sale made in any other county would therefore be void. Ibid, § 103; 1 Bail., 611. If this sale of the mortgaged premises *under the decree of foreclosure was void, all subsequent proceedings were also void.

Fourth. (Exc. 4.) "That his honor erred in not holding that there being no evidence of any report of sale by the sheriff in the said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, there was no judgment in personam, and no judgment upon which an execution could issue, and that, therefore, plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the land claimed." 12 S. C., 9; 13 Id., 254; 18 Id., 324; 1 Abb. Pr., 130; 8 How. Pr., 66; 10 Paige, 116.

II. Defendant is entitled to a new trial because his honor, the presiding judge, charged: First. (Exc. 1.) "That the failure of Schultz to answer the summons upon him to show cause why the execution in the case of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, should not be renewed, relieved the plaintiff from the obligation of proving that any deficiency existed after the sale of the mortgaged premises, and may be considered by the jury as an admission by Schultz that the execution had been regularly issued." The failure to show cause why an execution should not be renewed cannot render a void judgment upon which it issued valid, nor does the case of Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C., 197, sustain the contrary as ruled by the Circuit judge. 13 How. Pr., 178; 8 Rich., 37; 3 Abb., 243; 2 Strob., 207; Freem. Exec., §§ 73, 81; 18 S. C., 324.

Second. And because his honor refused to charge: (Exc. 2.) "1. The jury are instructed that if they find the sale of the mortgaged premises, in the said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, was made in Charleston county, said sale was null and void, and their verdict must be for the defendant. 2. The jury are instructed that if they find the sale of the mortgaged premises, in the said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, was made other than in Charleston county, said sale was made contrary to the terms of the decree in said cause, and that said sale was null and void, and their verdict must be for the defendant." See supra.

III. His honor, the presiding judge, should have granted defendant's motion for a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to his honor's charge, because: (Exc. 1.) "That his honor, the presiding judge, having charged the jury as requested by this defen*dant, 'that if they find there was no sale of the mortgaged premises, in the cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, then their verdict must be for the defendant,' and there being no evidence whatsoever of said sale, said verdict was contrary to the law as charged by his honor." 16 S. C., 1.

(Exc. 2.) "That his honor, the presiding judge, having charged the jury, as requested by this defendant, 'that no execution could issue on the decree of foreclosure, in the said cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, save for the deficiency ascertained and specified by the sheriff's report of sale in said cause,' and there being no evidence whatsoever that the sheriff ever made a sale or report of the same in said cause, said verdict was contrary to the law as charged by his honor, the presiding judge." Ibid.

Messrs. M. Glover and Henderson & Behre, contra.

April 8, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for the recovery of a lot (2¼ acres) and the buildings thereon, near Summerville, Colleton county, known as the "Schultz lot." The plaintiff claimed as purchaser at sheriff's sale, and proved a deed to himself from Robert Black, sheriff of Colleton county, December 5, 1882, purporting to have been made in accordance with a sale by him as sheriff, under execution in the case of J. Hamilton Freer, trustee, v. F. C. Schultz. The defendant, Tupper, alone answered. He admitted the sale and conveyance by the sheriff to the plaintiff, but insisted that the whole proceeding was void for the reason that there was no judgment in the case which authorized the issuing of an execution against property; and that he afterwards, viz., February 5, 1883, purchased the said lot from the alleged debtor, Schultz, and leased it to J. Moreland Campbell, who is in possession of the same.

The record in the case of Freer, trustee, v. F. C. Schultz, was introduced, which showed that it was an action to foreclose a mortgage on "the Club House tract of land in St. George's parish," &c., instituted in Colleton county, but that by consent it was removed to Charleston county, that on July 16, 1874, Judge Graham made a decree of foreclosure, which, among other things, *provided as follows: "It is adjudged that the mortgaged premises * * * be sold at public auction, in the county of Charleston, by the sheriff of said county, upon the first Monday of November next, or upon some convenient salesday thereafter, upon the terms, &c.; that the said sheriff give public notice of the time and place of such sale, &c.; that out of the moneys arising from such sale (after deducting the amount of his fees, &c.), the said sheriff pay to the plaintiff, trustee, or his attorney, the sum of $108.98, for costs and charges in this action, and also to the plaintiff, or his attorney, the amount so reported due as aforesaid, viz., the sum of $994.75, * * * or so much thereof as the purchase money of the mortgaged premises will pay of the same, take receipt therefor, and file it with his report of sale; that he pay over and deliver the surplus money, or surplus proceeds of sale, if any, to the clerk of this court; * * * that if the proceeds of such sale be insufficient to pay the amount so reported to be due to the plaintiff, * * * the said sheriff specify the amount of such deficiency in his report of sale, and that the defendant, Frederick C. Schultz, be required by execution to pay the same to the plaintiff, and that the purchaser, or purchasers, at such sale be let into possession on production of the sheriff's deed and a certified copy of the order confirming the report of sale," &c. This judgment of foreclosure was enrolled in Charleston on July 16th, 1874, and transcript thereof lodged in the clerk's office at Walterboro, Colleton county, on September 14, 1874, for decree $994.75, and costs $108.98.

On January 12, 1875, the clerk of Colleton issued an execution, which, after reciting the judgment of foreclosure, and stating that "the sum of seven hundred and thirty-three dollars and seventy-three cents ($733.73) is now actually due thereon," directed in the usual manner, that the said amount "be satisfied out of the personal property, or if not, &c., then out of the real property of the said judgment debtor," &c. This execution lay in the sheriff's office until April 20, 1882, when it was returned "unsatisfied." The defendant, Schultz, was served with summons to renew the execution, and having made default, Judge Hudson, on March 7, 1882, granted an order that the plaintiff have leave to renew his execution; and a renewed execution was *filed under which the house and lot in contention were levied and sold, and conveyed to the plaintiff.

When this evidence was offered, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was refused by the presiding judge, who submitted the case to the jury, and under the charge they found for the plaintiff the premises in dispute and $100 damages. The defendant, Tupper, made a motion for a new trial, and that being refused, he appeals to this court He made several requests to charge, some of which were charged and others refused by the presiding judge. It will not be necessary to copy them all here as they are in the "Case." We will only notice those which were refused, and as to which error of law is charged. Alleged errors of the judge in refusing to grant a new trial upon questions of fact cannot be considered here.

First in the order of time is the exception "that his honor erred in not holding that the decree of foreclosure, in the cause of Freer, trustee, v. Schultz, was not such as authorized the issuing of an execution for its enforcement, as no definite sum of money was found by the terms of the decree to be due from Schultz to Freer, and contained no order for the payment of the same, and, therefore, the plaintiff had failed to prove title to the land."

There is always a presumption in favor of legal process regular in form. The complaint in the case of Freer v. Schultz is not in the brief, and, therefore, we do not know its precise scope and purpose; but in the absence of proof to the contrary, we must assume that the action was not for what is called a "strict foreclosure" for the sale of the land and no more; but that it was in the usual form, and prayed not only for the sale of the land, but also judgment for the deficiency of the debt, if there should be any.

Taking this view and reading the decree of foreclosure carefully, it will be found that it adjudged three things: 1. That the sum of $994.75, besides the costs, were due by Schultz to Freer on the mortgage debt. 2. That the sheriff should sell the mortgaged premises at a future day (November), and pay to the plaintiff the amount so reported due, viz., $994.75, or so much thereof as the purchase money of the mortgaged premises will pay of *the same. And 3. "That if the proceeds of such sale be insufficient to pay the amount, &c., the sheriff specify the amount of such deficiency in his report of sale, and that the defendant, Frederick C. Schultz, be required by execution to pay the same," &c.

It seems to us that, taking the whole decree together, it did authorize an execution to issue for whatever might be the deficiency, if any. It is true that the precise amount for which it should issue was not named in the decree, for the reason that at the time it was rendered it could not be foreseen what the land would realize; but it directed the sheriff to make the sale and apply the proceeds, and that then the execution should issue for the "deficiency." It may be that it would have been the better practice for the plaintiff to reserve his final order until after the sheriff had made his report as to the sale, and then have moved for leave to issue execution for the exact balance in terms then ascertained; but there was a decree for the whole mortgage debt (subject to be reduced by the proceeds of sale), and we cannot say that it was fatally defective in failing "to authorize the issuing an execution for its enforcement."

In this respect the case is different from that of Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C., 9, cited and relied on by the appellant. In that case, as we understand it, there was no instant decree for the whole debt, but the decree "directed a foreclosure and sale at a future day, unless a specified sum was previously paid, with the privilege to plaintiff, in case of deficiency, to enroll his decree and issue execution for the balance due; a money decree was instantly enrolled and execution issued for the whole sum specified. Held, that the enrollment and execution were erroneous, and created no lien on the defendant's property. Distinction drawn between this case and that of Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq., 208."

It is next contended: "That his honor erred in not holding that, there being no evidence of a sale of the mortgaged premises in said case of Freer v. Schlutz, there was no judgment in personam, and no judgment upon which an execution could issue, and that, therefore, plaintiff failed to prove any title to the land." There is no doubt that the sale as directed, and application of *the proceeds on the debt, were conditions precedent to the issuing of the execution for the "deficiency;" and it seems to us that it would have been better if the sale by the sheriff and his return thereon had been put in evidence, especially as the judgment of foreclosure had not fixed the precise amount of the deficiency for which the execution should issue. But those were both questions of fact, and the order directing sale in November, and the time when the execution issued, January, 1875, after the time indicated for the sale, and the reduced amount ($733.73) for which it issued, as well as the presumption that the officers of court did their duty, afforded some evidence that there had been a sale, which the judge left to the jury, and, although there may have been some risk in it, we cannot say that he erred in so doing. He could not properly say there was no evidence upon the subject and non-suit the plaintiff on that ground. The jury must have found the fact that there had been a sale and proper application of the proceeds.

But assuming that the sale was made, it is still further ingeniously urged for the appellant "that his honor erred in not holding that if the sale was made in Colleton, it was void, as being in violation of the decree of foreclosure which ordered it made in Charleston; and that if it was made in Charleston, it was void under the general law of force at the time, which declared that a sale of real property under execution 'must be made in the county where it lies.' Code (1872), § 310." The defendant, Tupper, holds under Schultz, chargeable with plaintiff's prior claim as purchaser under an execution in a public office, and can make no defence which Schultz could not. Tupper is a privy in estate of Schultz, and could receive from him no higher rights than he possessed.

It will be observed that Schultz is not a party in this case, and has never made the defence which is now set up by his alienee. He was a party to the foreclosure proceedings instituted in Colleton county, but transferred, by his consent, to the county of Charleston. He did not appeal from the decree of foreclosure there made ordering the land sold in that county; and afterwards, when he was served in Colleton county with a copy of the summons proposing to renew the execution which had *issued in that county for the reduced amount of $733.73, he made no objection or defence to the same. If the land had never been legally sold in accordance with the decree rendered in Charleston by his consent, and the proceeds of sale properly credited, he then had an opportunity to make all such defences, and having failed to do so, neither he nor any one holding under him with notice can now make them, but is bound by that species of estoppel known as res adjudicata, and "must ever afterwards hold his peace." As was said in the late case of McNair v. Ingraham, ante, 74: "The defence could have been made —indeed, the proceeding invited him to make it, and failing to do so, the result must be the same as if he had formally made it and failed. Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strob., 208 [47 Am. Dec. 591]; Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C., 199; Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 S. C., 127."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result, upon the ground that the question as to the legality and sufficiency of the judgment and execution was adjudged by the order to renew the execution; and Schultz being thus estopped from raising the question, one who claims under him since the sale is likewise estopped.

R. GARVIN v. J. GARVIN.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Execution ⇐83.]

Under action to enjoin a judgment and execution and for account, a decree was rendered sustaining the judgment and giving leave to defendant to issue his execution for balance due in the former case and for the costs of this. Execution was accordingly issued, entitled of the later case, and the judgment debtor's lands were sold thereunder. Held, that this execution was duly authorized and rightly entitled, but if entitled wrong, that it was a mere irregularity, which did not render the execution void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. ⇐83.]

[2. Judgment ⇐922.]

Where a decree found a balance due on a former judgment and directed execution for its enforcement, this second judgment absorbed *and superseded the first, and the clerk of court properly entered up judgment in such second cause for the amount so found due.
*84

Mr. P. A. Emanuel, for appellant.

Messrs. Henderson Bros. and Croft & Dunlap, contra.

April 3, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a motion to set aside an execution and sales of land made under it. The contest is between brothers, has now been waged for nearly ten years, having been in this court twice before, and has become so complicated that it cannot be understood without a short summary of the facts.

In 1858, one John Fox loaned Robert Garvin $2,600, and took a note signed by Robert Garvin, John Garvin, William Meritt, and J. J. Howard. After the war (1868), the amount was reduced to $1,800, and a new note given by Robert Garvin, John Garvin, James Garvin, J. L. Garvin, and J. A. Garvin, all of whom confessed judgment on the note, which was entered in Lexington county, April 3, 1868. Payments were made on the judgment from time to time, some by Robert and some by John, which reduced the amount due to $359, on August 5, 1872. For this balance the judgment was assigned to Livingston, who transferred it to John Garvin, and he removed the judgment to Aiken county, and claiming that he was only surety and as such had paid for his principal the amount of $1,836.40, he claimed that the execution to that extent belonged to him under the act of 1849, and levied the property of Robert thereunder.

At this stage, Robert instituted proceedings against John, for the double purpose of enjoining the judgment on the ground that John was one of the principals and that the judgment was paid in full; and also for "an account," claiming that John was indebted to him in a large amount, $3,635.73, "for timber, lumber, cash loaned," &c. John answered that he was only surety *on the Fox note and judgment, and that he was entitled to the whole of the execution paid by him, $1,836.40, and that he owed Robert nothing on the large account claimed against him. He prayed that the complaint should be dismissed, but did not in terms pray for affirmative relief. The issues of law and fact were referred to J. M. Williams, Esq., as referee, who found the principal facts for John—that he was only surety on the Fox note, that he owed Robert nothing, and "that defendant (John) should have leave to enforce said judgment to the amount mentioned in his said execution, with interest from its date," &c. Exceptions were filed by Lee & Clyde, at that time attorneys for Robert. The case was heard by Judge Reed, who filed his decree September 14, 1877, as follows: "On reading and filing the report of J. M. Williams, Esq., special referee herein, and on hearing argument on the exceptions by S. J. Lee, Esq., for defendant, and Messrs. Croft & Henderson for plaintiff, it is ordered that the exceptions be overruled and the report of the referee herein be confirmed, and the plaintiff have leave to enter judgment in accordance therewith, and the same become the judgment of this court."

There was no appeal from this decree, but with the written consent of Lee & Clyde, attorneys for Robert, it was enrolled in form as a money decree of John against Robert, instead of simply dismissing the complaint, and leaving the old Fox judgment standing for the benefit of John to the extent of his payments as surety, but for the precise amount of those payments and costs. This judgment, after reciting the statements of the report and the order of Judge Reed, provides as follows: "It is adjudged that the appeal from the report of the referee be dismissed; that the defendant have leave to issue execution against the plaintiff for the sum of eighteen hundred and thirty-six 65-100 dollars, with interest thereon from the 9th day of May, 1876, on the judgment of J. H. Livingston, assignee of John Fox v. Robert Garvin, which said judgment has been assigned to the defendant, and that the defendant do recover of the plaintiff the further sum of four hundred and seventy-two 40-100 dollars, the costs, and that he have leave to issue execution for the same." This judgment was signed by the clerk of the court, under the seal of the *court, with this statement appended: "I agree to the within taxation of costs, and consent for within judgment to be this day entered up, and acknowledge service of copy on me. September 17, 1877. (Signed) Lee & Clyde, per Samuel J. Lee, plaintiff's attorneys."

On December 10, 1877, an execution entitled Robert Garvin v. John Garvin was issued upon and in conformity to the terms of the judgment for $1,836.65, besides interest and $472.20 costs and disbursements. This execution was levied on eight tracts of land of the defendant, Robert, and his interest in two other tracts, which were all sold by the sheriff of Aiken county on January 7, 1878, and purchased by John Garvin, to whom the sheriff executed titles.

Robert at first refused to surrender possession of the premises, but finally, as he alleges under duress, signed a lease attorning to John; but, in the meantime, having procured the assistance of other counsel, at the June term of the court for 1879, he made a motion before Judge Hudson to set aside the judgment under which the lands had been sold, which the judge refused, on the ground that the motion had not been made within one year as required by the code. The Supreme Court, holding that the motion might be made in two years under the act of 1869, then of force, to vacate erroneous judgments, reversed the order disclaiming jurisdiction. See 13 S. C., 160.

The matter went back, and in 1880 came up before Judge Pressley, who heard the motion on its merits, and refused to vacate the judgment as erroneous. From this refusal, an appeal was again taken to this court, which affirmed the judgment below, but in doing so said: "The alleged irregularities in the execution issued on the Fox judgment transferred to Aiken were not directly in the case. That execution, as we understand it, had been superseded by the decree of Judge Reed, and was not before the court as a subsisting execution. If any irregularities exist in the last execution to carry out that decree, the Circuit judge made no ruling thereon, and the question is not before us." 14 S. C., 630.

Upon this, Robert Garvin renewed the struggle on the Circuit, alleging that the matter of irregularity of the execution at *least had not been adjudicated. This motion to set aside the execution came also before Judge Pressley, and he refused it, saying: "The former motion before me was to set aside the judgment, and no motion to set aside the execution was therein involved, except in so far as that would follow from setting aside the judgment. But if I am mistaken in that matter, and really failed to decide a point then before me, I now decide that the execution under which the sale was made in said case was clearly authorized by the decree of Judge Reed confirming the report of the referee, which expressly gave John Garvin leave to enforce said judgment, and that amounts to leave to issue execution for that purpose," &c.

From this order refusing to set aside the execution, Robert Garvin now appeals to this court, upon the following exceptions:

1. "That his honor erred in deciding that no motion to set aside the execution was involved in the former motion, except that which would follow from setting aside the judgment.

2. "That his honor erred in deciding that it was the duty of Robert Garvin to include the motion which he now makes to set aside the execution in his former motion, and that failing to do so, it is waived.

3. "That his honor erred in not deciding that, though irregularity was not mentioned in the notice of motion formerly before him as a ground for setting aside the execution, yet the evidence was before him, showing the irregularity as clearly as it is now made to appear; that his failure to decide this motion left it in statu quo, after the end of the term, as though no motion had been heard, and the act of the judge should not prejudice the rights of plaintiff; his motion was before the court then, and remained there until this decision, and it cannot be said that he has waived his rights, he having appealed to the Supreme Court upon the ground that the Circuit Court erred in not setting aside the execution, and that court refusing to pass upon the question because of failure of decision of the Circuit Court.

4. "That his honor erred in deciding that the execution under which the sale was made in said case was clearly authorized by the decree of Judge Reed; but he should have set it aside upon the following grounds:

*5. "That the execution under which the plaintiff's land was sold was irregular, null, and void, because there were two executions issued under the seal of the Court of Common Pleas in the office of the sheriff upon the same judgment, upon which no return has been made, and that prevented another execution under the judgment of Robert Garvin by John Garvin being issued.

6. "That the execution issued from Lexington, dated April 6th, 1868, could not support the sale because it had been returned and was dead.

7. "That the execution dated August 5th, 1875, was irregular and void, because the execution issued on April 6th, 1868, had run four years, to April 4th, 1872; that it had to be returned at the May term of court for Lexington, A. D. 1872; that from the said May term, 1872, to August 5th, 1875, was more than three years, requiring a motion for leave to issue execution, and none such being made, said execution was irregular and void, and could not support the sale.

8. "That the execution did not conform to the judgment in Robert Garvin v. John Garvin, and was irregular and void, because it enabled the said John Garvin to enforce his judgment for costs obtained in that case in violation of the homestead laws.

9. "That leave was given to enforce the judgment upon which execution had been stayed; that no order which was passed could operate to destroy the lien of the execution of August 5th, 1875, and that the judgment in Robert Garvin v. John Garvin restored the execution to its former condition and status, requiring its return before another execution could issue for the amount of said judgment.

10. "That the levy under the said execution of date August 5th, 1875, made in October, 1877, and which is evidenced by the sheriff's advertisement, the order of injunction issued by Judge Wiggin in November, 1877, concludes the defendant that said execution was of vitality and force, requiring its return before another could issue."

This contest has been urged by Robert Garvin with such persistence, and with so many earnest and reiterated declarations of "wrong, injury, and injustice," that we have taken the trouble *to look back through the whole record, with more care than the question at issue actually required. Robert Garvin seems never to have realized the fact that, as soon as the report of referee Williams on the merits had been confirmed by the Circuit Court without appeal, the case was res adjudicata, and beyond the power of reconsideration by any court, except possibly upon a strong case of subsequently discovered evidence or fraud, which he failed to make. It may be that his lands sold for less than their value, at a forced sale for cash by the sheriff, to which possibly he contributed himself by forbidding the sale as illegal and unauthorized; but, however much that may afford grounds for regret, it cannot be considered as a good ground for relief by the court.

As the assault upon the judgment was under the act of 1869, now repealed, which did not in express terms include executions, and the separate motion to set aside the latter, if made, was not pressed to a decision before Judge Pressley when the judgment was considered, we will now consider the question of irregularities in the execution. "Independent of statutory provisions, the Court of Common Pleas, by virtue of its own inherent right, from the general nature and intent of its jurisdiction, has always exercised the power of looking into its own records, and on motion affording that remedy after judgment has been entered up, which is obtained by writ of error in the English courts. Mooney v. Welsh, 1 Mill Con. R., 133; Bank of Pennsylvania v. Condy, 1 Hill, 210. The purpose is amendment, not destruction, and the end desired and sought must be in a mode through which it can likely be attained." Charles v. Jacobs, 5 S. C., 350.

Was the execution under which the sales were made so irregular and illegal as to avoid the sales? It seems to us that, when properly understood, the objections are purely technical, and amount to this, that the execution was called by the wrong name. The judgment entered in the case of Robert Garvin v. John Garvin, authorized the defendant (John) "to issue execution against the plaintiff (Robert) for the sum of $1,836.65, with interest thereon from May 9th, 1876, on the judgment of Fox v. Robert Garvin, assigned to the defendant, and that defendant do recover of plaintiff the further sum of $472.40, costs," &c. *Was this not judgment on a money decree for $1,836.65, and the further sum of $472.40? The execution issued for the precise sum authorized, but entitled of the case out of which it arose, Robert Garvin v. John Garvin, and not of the old Fox judgment for the use of John. We incline to think the execution was properly entitled of the case in which the judgment was rendered.

But suppose it had been styled (as contended it should have been) "John Fox for the use of John Garvin," how could that have benefited Robert Garvin? He makes the effort to show, first, that it should have been so issued; and, second, that if so, it would have been irregular and void, for the reason that the age and status of that old execution rendered it impossible to be renewed or revived. But it will be perceived that this view entirely overlooks the fundamental fact that the judgment giving leave to issue the execution cut up at once all such defences as to the old execution. The execution was certainly to issue, whether it went in the old name or put into a new form, to enforce judgment for the money paid by John, being, however, for the identical amount due on the old execution by Robert. We think the execution was authorized by the enrolled judgment, and that it properly retained the title of the judgment upon which it was based. But even if there was a misnomer as to the title, that could not be more than an irregularity, which did not render the execution absolutely void. Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strob., 208 [47 Am. Dec. 591]; Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 S. C., 120; Tobin v. Myers, 18 Id., 324.

But it is further ingeniously argued that if the enrolled judgment authorized the execution, the decree of Judge Reed did not authorize the judgment, which was enrolled, and a motion to correct the "abstract judgment book" No. 381 is made a part of the relief asked for. Section 286 of the code, in reference to a trial by jury, provides that "if a different direction be not given by the court, the clerk must enter judgment in conformity with the verdict;" and section 289, in reference to a case heard by the court, provides that after the decision has been filed, &c., "judgment upon the decision shall be entered accordingly." Was this judgment entered according to the decision? There is some lack of clearness in the language used, but we think the decision, taken as a whole, substantially authorized the judgment.

*There is no force in the fact that Judge Reed transposed the terms "plaintiff" and "defendant." John Garvin claimed to be "plaintiff" in the Fox judgment, but he was "defendant" in the case then being heard, brought by Robert Garvin; and hence the clerical error. A surety who has paid a judgment against his principal and himself may claim the original judgment as his own, under the act upon the subject supra; but he is not bound to do so. He may claim a new judgment for the money paid, and that is the simplest course when there is no conflicting lien. Judge Reed in substance gave John Garvin a judgment for the money he paid as surety. The words of the decree are that "the plaintiff (manifestly defendant) have leave to enter judgment." He confirmed the referee's report, which, as Judge Pressley said, "expressly gave John Garvin leave to enforce said judgment, and that amounts to leave to issue execution for that purpose."

If the intention had been simply to remit John, already in court, back to his right of subrogation in the Fox execution, then (as insisted) incapable of renewal, there would have been no propriety or sense in giving him instant "leave to enforce said judgment to the amount mentioned in his said execution, with interest from its date." That, on the contrary, unmistakably indicates present judgment, which superseded and absorbed as legal process the old Fox judgment and all the executions issued at different times upon it, which, although functi officio, were kept on file probably as the evidence on which the final judgment was rendered. Besides, the three attorneys of Robert Garvin exressly assented to the judgment in the form in which it was enrolled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

J. GARVIN v. R. GARVIN.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐966.]

A refusal by the Circuit judge to continue a case is not error of law appealable to this court.

*Before Pressley, J., Aiken, February, 1883.

This case is supplemental to the case of R. Garvin v. J. Garvin, next case ante, p. 83, and the two were heard together in this court. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. P. A. Emanuel, for appellant.

Messrs. Croft & Dunlap and Henderson Bros., contra.

April 3d, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for possession of a tract of land, containing 640 acres, being the homestead tract of Robert Garvin, the defendant, which had been sold by M. T. Holley, sheriff of Aiken county, and by him conveyed as No. 4 in the deed to plaintiff, John Garvin, of date January 7, 1878. This tract of land, with others, was sold under the judgment and execution considered in the opinion of this court, just pronounced in the case of Robert Garvin v. John Garvin, next case ante.

Both that case and this were heard at the same term of the court, but that of Robert to vacate the execution first in order. In that case the Circuit judge refused the motion, but notice of appeal was given. When this case was reached a motion was made for a continuance, on the ground that it could not be properly tried until after a final determination of the motion to set aside the execution under which the sale was made. The judge, considering all the facts which appeared in the former motion as before him in this, refused to continue the case and submitted it to the jury. Under the charge they found for the plaintiff the land in dispute and two hundred dollars damages.

The defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. That his honor erred in refusing to continue the case, inasmuch as the defendant was entitled to have his motion decided by the Supreme Court upon appeal relating to setting aside the executions upon which the plaintiff's title depended, he having shown by affidavit his intent to appeal, and being unable to attack the execution for irregularity in a collateral manner *under the decisions of this state. 2. That his honor erred in not charging the jury that the executions upon which the title of plaintiff depended were irregular, and that the defendant is entitled to have the motion fully decided before the hearing of issues therein. 3. That his honor erred in deciding that the executions upon which the plaintiff's title depended are not void, but sufficient to sustain the title of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the motion made."

In reference to the first ground of appeal, this court has often ruled, that refusal to continue a case is not error of law appealable to the Supreme Court, but that it is one of those matters which arise in the progress of a case, and must, from necessity, be left to the wise and prudent discretion of the Circuit judge.

The court is always reluctant to disturb vested rights. The appellant's counsel frankly states that "the agreement of counsel is that the exceptions state the judge's charge, and that the brief now before the court on appeal relating to the motion shall constitute the case herein, except as to the charge and exceptions. We may say that the entire case hinges upon the result of that motion. If decided against appellant, we have no case. If decided for him, then this appeal must prevail."

This is a correct statement of the relation of the cases to each other; and having affirmed the judgment below in the case of Robert Garvin v. John Garvin, it follows that the result must be the same in this.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, April, 1883.

This was an action by Richard Davis, as administrator of his son, Richard J. Davis, against the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company, to recover $20,000 damages for killing Richard J. while in the employment of the defendant. The intestate was killed on the night of May 20, 1881, and the action was commenced January 2, 1883. The opinion states the grounds of the action as alleged in the complaint.

Richard Davis testified that he depended on this and two other sons' exertions for his support; that he owned a house in Columbia worth $2,500, and received the income of a plantation, but that others were dependent on him; that deceased received $1 per day; never paid witness anything, but gave deceased's mother money and supplies, amounting to $8 or $10 a month, during which time deceased lived with witness and paid no board; when deceased was out of work witness supported him; while witness lived in Abbeville deceased and his brothers lived in the Columbia house, and he gave nothing to witness or to his mother.

J. A. Hall testified that he was engineer and Davis a train hand of freight train; at Piedmont latter got on top of train and *signalled with his lamp for witness to go ahead; noticed that lamp went out; as train passed Grove Station was signalled to stop; did so; went back and found Davis lying across the track dying; was struck on right side, body badly broken; thinks he was struck by projecting timbers of tank at Grove Station; deceased was required by rules of the company to be on top and keep a light at night; thinks tank was too close; it was removed three or four weeks afterwards; heard deceased say on day before that he had $14 to send his mother; was good train hand, sober, energetic, saving; ladder was on side of car next tank.

X.—Had been on road two years, but not now; pump was there when I came; freight train did not use this pump; deceased had never stopped there for water; was running twelve to fifteen miles an hour; heard that deceased was next man for promotion; cannot say how much too near tank was; was closer than any other; so near I had to take my head in from engine while passing; tank was removed soon afterwards.

John Cox testified that he and Davis were train hands on this train; Davis was on top and signalled engine; cup dropped out, because lamp was no account; he came down in cab to get another and at once started up ladder on side of car when he was struck by tank and rolled between car and tank; if lamp had been any account, the cup would not have fallen out; cannot tell when tank was removed; a few weeks afterwards; train hands are required to stay on top of cars and to keep a lamp.

X.—Railroad company furnish the lamps; when Davis came down he found another cup in the car; cup fastened in the lamp by springs on side; brakemen attended to lamps; did not hear Davis complain that night about lamp being out of fix; don't know who fixed the lamps that day.

XX.—Conductor makes requisition for lamps; his business to see that train has them; brakemen can't make requisition; when a new cup was put in the lamp I believe it was perfectly good; cup may be pushed in far enough to hold, and yet fly out when the lamp is jerked to be swung around as a signal.

W. T. Davis testified: Was section master on this part of the road; the tank at Grove Station was from 12 to 18 inches closer than those now built are placed; in going up side of car, if a *person pulled himself hand over hand up, he might pass; but if not very careful, he would be knocked off; if a person went up the side of car on ladder, having to raise his feet and bend his body, he could not pass this tank without being struck.

X.—The tanks just after the war were closer than they are now; canvas pipes were used then, now iron pipes; at that time brakes were all inside the cars, now they are on top.

E. T. Kemp testified: In May, 1881, lived near railroad track at Grove Station; was there when Davis was killed; it was between 8 and 9 o'clock at night; the train was running very rapidly; did not stop at tank, but stopped soon after; trainmen ran back to tank; stayed half an hour, and went on; soon heard man was killed; went there and saw Davis dead; examined tank and saw where lantern struck it; saw where projecting timbers on which tub rested had been moved quarter of an inch; the tank was too near track for a person to climb up ladder between car and track when train was passing it; the sills on which tank rested projected toward track.

Dave Henderson testified: Am a carpenter; helped build a tank at Grove Station; after it was built went to Silver Street; got word from Carpenter, who was our boss, that it must be moved back; after it was moved Carpenter said it was still two inches too close; it was built when the road was in the hands of the receiver.

J. H. Roberts testified: Was section master on the section which this tank is on; heard Carpenter, supervisor of the road, say that the tank at Grove Station was too close to the road, and that it was no account; that he was going to move it; Carpenter had charge of tanks and bridges on C. & G. R. R.; the tank was taken down three or four weeks after the man was killed; the timbers of the tank were moved three-eighths of an inch where Davis struck it; the tank was too close to the track eighteen inches; it was an oversight of the company.

X.—Tank was removed upon completion of a new one a mile or so further east; new tank is filled from a spring by pipes; old one was filled from a well by a force pump; when canvas bags are used tanks have to be nearer than when iron pipes are used.

XX.—Can put plank under canvas pipe and have it as long as an iron pipe.

*T. R. Davis testified: Am a brother of deceased; father's health has been bad for two or three years; my deceased brother and myself mainly supported the family; have been a conductor for a long time on C. & G. R. R.; it is the duty of conductors to make requisition for equipment of his train, and to see that they are all in good order; seven lamps are required; the tank was too near the track, and has been torn down; my brother has been on the road two months, and running on the freight from Hodges to Greenville two weeks; was next man in line of promotion.

X.—My brother contributed all he could to the support of the family; meals of train hands will cost about ten dollars per month; if train hand needs anything, it is his business to report it to conductor; if train hand were to come and say he wanted a good lamp, of course he could get it; the rent of house in Columbia is worth about $25 per month; my dead brother and myself paid all expenses of the family.

XX.—Duty of conductor to see that all equipments of train in good condition before he leaves terminal points.

The plaintiff closed and defendant moved for a non-suit, which was granted, no grounds being stated in the order.

Plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

"It is submitted that the Circuit judge erred in granting a non-suit: 1. Where there is any proof to sustain the allegations of the complaint the question must go to the jury. 2. The question of negligence was a mixed question of law and fact, and should have been submitted to the jury. 3. The question of negligence in this case should have been submitted to the jury, because it was proved that the railroad company had notice that tank was too near track. 4. Four witnesses having sworn that the 'tank was too close to track,' the judge should not have decided that there was no negligence. 5. The tank having been removed very soon after Davis was killed and being newly built, it should have been submitted to the jury whether this was not an admission of negligence on the part of the company. 6. The evidence being that it was the duty of defendant to furnish good lamps, and that of Davis being worthless, the jury should have passed upon negligence in this respect. 7.

The proof showing *that tank was too near track, the defendant was liable for accidents to employés occasioned by improper or dangerous structures, if employé was in discharge of his duty. 8. Under the proof the company was liable to administrator for death of intestate. 9. Two witnesses having sworn that the supervisor of the road, charged with the management of the tanks of the road, had said this tank was too close to the track, and was no account, it was error in the presiding judge to say there was no evidence of negligence. 10. Because that his honor erred in holding that the deceased was chargeable with knowledge of the dangerous proximity of the tank, it being in proof that he had only been on that end of the road two weeks, had never stopped at the tank for water, and passed it at night."

Mr. M. L. Bonham, Jr., for appellant.

This action is brought under Lord Campbell's act, Gen. Stat., §§ 2183-84. It is a question of negligence, which has been considered in 15 S. C., 453. The inquiry is, what is defendant's duty towards its employés? The servant takes the ordinary risks of his calling, but the master must provide safe and proper appliances and machinery. 1 Add. Torts, 603; 18 S. C., 262, 275; Wood M. & S., 749. If the defendant failed so to provide, it is liable. 52 Ill., 183; 55 Id., 492; 90 N. Y., 558; 29 Mo., 495; 46 Id., 163; 76 Pa. St., 389. The questions are, did the person injured know of the danger, or might he have known; did the master know, or might he have known? And these are questions for the jury. Therefore the non-suit was improper. In non-suits the inquiry is, what are the material allegations, and is there any evidence to sustain them? 19 S. C., 510. And a non-suit should be granted only where there is a total failure of evidence. 2 Bay, 126; 3 McCord, 131; 3 S. C., 1; 7 Id., 142; 18 Id., 607; 19 Id., 20, 30; 1 Strob., 203; 17 Wall., 657. The decision in Carter v. Railroad Company, 19 S. C., 20, must have related solely to the existence or non-existence of facts; it could not have intended to invest judges with the decision of facts, for this the constitution prohibits. The judge therefore erred, for there was unquestionably some evi*dence of negligence. The judge must have based his decision on supposed knowledge by the deceased of the danger, and that he assumed it as one of the risks of his calling. But, as we have shown, this was for the jury. See, too, 95 Pa. St., 211. The supervisor of the road said it was too close. Deceased could not have known this, for he had no opportunity of learning it. To hold him responsible for knowing it, was to charge him with contributory negligence, which is a matter of defense. 19 S. C., 20. But if he knew, defendant is still liable, if negligent. 31 Grat., 812; 76 Pa. St., 387. There was certainly evidence enough to carry the case to the jury. The plaintiff had a beneficial interest in the life of the deceased. Cool. Torts, 272; Wood Mayne Dam., 75, 93. The judge relied solely for his order on Gibson v. Erie R. R. Co., 63 N. Y., 449, which is in many particulars unlike the case at bar, and was decided by a divided court.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, same side.

Mr. J. C. Haskell, contra.

April 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, appellant, as administrator of his son, Richard J. Davis, deceased, against the respondent, to recover damages for causing from negligence the death of the said Richard, who at the time of his death was in the employment of the respondent in the capacity of road hand on a freight train. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, on motion of the respondent, a non-suit was ordered.

The plaintiff's action is based upon an alleged beneficial interest in the life of the deceased, and negligence on the part of the company, the negligence consisting of an alleged failure on the part of the company to furnish the deceased with a safe lantern while in the discharge of a duty imposed upon him to ride on top of the conductor's cab attached to the train, running in the night time from Columbia to Greenville, and in negligently erecting and permitting a pump or tank to remain closer to the *track than the requirements and necessities of the company demanded, by which negligence, it is alleged, the deceased lost his life.

This sad event happened in this way: While the deceased was on top of the cab in the discharge of his duty, the bottom of the lantern dropped out and the light was extinguished, which made it necessary for the deceased to descend to the cab for another, and on his return to his post, by means of a ladder attached to the outside of the cab, the only means of reaching the top again, just at that moment the train passed the tank, the timbers of which struck the deceased and knocked him from the train, causing his death. The negligence relied on as the foundation for the action was in reference to the lantern and the tank. The non-suit was granted, in part at least, because in the opinion of the Circuit judge the plaintiff failed to introduce testimony as to those matters sufficient to entitle him to go to the jury.

The law as to non-suits in this state, settled and repeated in a number of cases from Bay's Reports down to the present time, is that an entire failure of evidence as to one or all of the material facts upon which the action depends, will alone authorize the granting of such motion. The plaintiff is required to state in his complaint the facts which constitute his cause of action. As a general rule it is not difficult to understand what the facts are, and when properly stated in the complaint and denied in the answer, they make the issue between the parties litigant, which is to be tried by the jury upon the testimony offered; and under our system, after the case reaches the jury, they are the sole judges whether these facts at issue have been proved. It is their duty to hear the testimony submitted, to weigh it, and to determine its force and effect.

In every case, however, a question may arise whether any pertinent testimony has been offered by the plaintiff to sustain his complaint. This, if it arises, is always a preliminary question, and before the case goes to the jury, and it is a question of law to be decided by the judge. If, in such case, no testimony directed to the facts at issue has been introduced (and this is for the judge to determine), a non-suit is proper. If, however, any testimony has been offered, whether in the estimation of the judge *true or false, the case must be submitted to the jury. It will be observed, then, that the preliminary question referred to, to be decided by the judge when it arises, in no way impinges upon the constitutional mandate, that the juries are the judges of the facts, and alone shall try them, while the judge shall decide the law. Because in this preliminary question there is no dispute as to the facts, or as to what has been proved, and therefore nothing for the jury to determine, but the question is, admitting the truth of the testimony as offered, is it pertinent? Does it touch the allegations in the complaint, the facts at issue?

There are some loose expressions in some of the cases to the effect that insufficient testimony will sustain a non-suit. These expressions should not be understood, however, as giving power to the trial judges to determine the quantum of testimony sufficient to prove an alleged fact, or to decide as to the truth, force, or effect of such testimony; but they should be interpreted in the sense rather of pertinency or relevancy. In fine, the rule is, that where there is any competent, pertinent, and relevant testimony offered to the facts in dispute, the case passes into the hands of the jury and beyond the judge; but where no such testimony is offered, it is the province and duty of the judge to non-suit. Thus understood, the rule is clear and it harmonizes the respective functions of the court and the jury, making our judicial system the complete and perfect system that it is; leaving the law to those who have made it a special study, and therefore better able to decide it—the judges—and the facts to those who, from their practical common sense, are perhaps best able to solve them—the jury.

The subject of non-suits has been discussed in this state in the cases here cited, and the rule established is as above stated, which may be succinctly expressed thus: In the absence of all testimony in support of the material allegations in the complaint, which is a question for the judge, a non-suit is proper; but where there is any testimony directed to said allegations, the weight, truth, and sufficiency of which are to be determined, the case must go to the jury. Brown v. Frost, 2 Bay 126 [1 Am. Dec. 633]; Hopkins v. De Graffenreid, 2 Bay, 187, 441; Singleton v. Hilliard & Brooks, 1 Strob., 218; Graff & Co. v. Caldwell, 7 Rich., 133;

O'Neall *& Chambers v. S. C. R. R. Co., 9 Id., 465; Redding v. S. C. R. R. Co. 3 S. C., 9 [16 Am Rep. 681]; Ahrens v. State Bank, 3 S. C. 401; Boykin v. Watts, 6 Id., 83; Holley v. Walker, 7 Id., 144; Rowe v. G. & C. R. R. Co., Ibid, 167; Hogg v. Pinckney, 16 Id., 387; McCall v. Cohen, Ibid. 448 [42 Am. Rep. 641]; Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, 19 S. C. 30; Carter v. G. & C. R. R. Co., Ibid, 20 [45 Am. Rep. 754].

Now apply these principles to the case under consideration. The action is properly brought under the act of 1859 (Gen. Stat., §§ 2183–84), under which the plaintiff is entitled to recover "such damages as the jury may think proportioned to the injury resulting from the death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit it is brought." Admitting that the term injury in this act refers alone to pecuniary loss, and not to the wounded feelings of the survivors, or the sufferings of the deceased, yet we think there was some testimony taken from the father and the brother of the deceased on the subject of a beneficial interest—uncertain, it is true, but enough perhaps for the jury to consider. We will therefore pass on to the most important question, the question of negligence.

Actionable negligence is defined to be the absence of that care which men ordinarily bestow upon their business. The negligence complained of here is an alleged failure on the part of the company to do its duty in two particulars: First, in failing to supply the deceased with a safe and perfect lantern, on account of which his light was extinguished while on top of the car, and he was therefore compelled to descend to the cab for another, and then immediately to ascend again to his signal post, when the accident happened, and but for which it would not have happened; second, in erecting a tank so near the track as to cause injury and endanger the safety of the employés of the road, and in permitting this tank to remain in this close proximity to the road.

As to the act of negligence first alleged: There is no doubt that employers are required to use all ordinary care in furnishing their employés with safe and perfect utensils with which to discharge their respective duties, and to do their allotted work, and a failure to bestow this care will amount to actionable negligence. In this instance, no doubt, it was the legal duty of the defendant *to bestow reasonable and ordinary care in furnishing the deceased with safe lanterns by which he was expected to signal danger to the train from the top of the cab; but before the company could be made liable, or before even the question of negligence in this respect could be submitted to the jury, it was necessary that some testimony directed to the point of failure to bestow this care should have been introduced. Was there such testimony offered? The testimony is direct that the deceased a short time before the accident happened was at his post on the cab, with his lantern lighted; that he signalled the engine ahead; that the cup of the lantern dropped out; that he came down into the cab and procured another, and then started back up the ladder on the side of the car, when this awful calamity overtook him.

This is all the testimony in reference to the lantern, except that the witness who testified to these facts also stated generally that the cup of the lantern dropped out, because it was "no account." No doubt it was the duty of the deceased when his lamp went out to procure another as speedily as possible, and no doubt he adopted the only course possible at the time to procure another; but it will be seen that the turning point in these different steps was the extinguishment of the light. It was this that necessitated all the rest. Is there any testimony as to the cause of the extinguishment of the lantern connecting the defendant therewith? Take the matter as stated by the witness, to wit, that the cup dropped out, and this was because the lantern was "no account." Does this connect the defendant with the result? Does the whole or any part of the testimony go to the point that the defendant had failed to exercise reasonable and proper care, such as men ordinarily bestow on their business in furnishing the deceased with safe lanterns?

We find not a word in the testimony on that subject, at least none to the precise point necessary to inculpate the defendant, to wit, that the deceased was using a defective lantern, because of the fact that defendant had negligently furnished him with such; on the contrary, it appears that the deceased procured another from the cab, which we suppose was safe and perfect, as there is no testimony to the contrary. He might have taken that one at the first. That he did not was perhaps his own negligence, *rather than that of the company. We think there was an entire absence of all testimony directed to the negligence of the company as to the lantern.

Next, as to the proximity of the tank. The testimony is very clear that the deceased was killed by the timbers of this structure, and it appears therefore that whether the tank was closer to the track than was necessary for the purposes of the road, yet it was close enough to crush a person who happened to be on the outside of the car as it passed. It also appears that the supervisor of the road, Mr. Carpenter, had said that it was too close; one of the witnesses said it was 18 inches too close, and it was established that it was about that much closer than tanks are now located; hence iron pipes had come into use instead of rubber, and hence the brakes have been put on top of the cars instead of inside. It further appeared that notwithstanding the fact of its proximity, yet a person might go up the ladder hand over hand with safety. This was the entire testimony as to the tank. These were all necessary facts, but admitting them all, where is the testimony as to the main link in the chain by which the company is to be connected with the event complained of. Where is the testimony to the point that there was the absence of due care, or such care as is ordinarily bestowed in such cases by the company in building this tank so near the track? The fact that a structure is built so near a railroad track that a man hanging on the outside of a car would be struck in passing (and this is all the testimony), is not in itself any evidence of negligence, at least it would not be evidence in every case.

Negligence is a relative term. What would be negligence under one state of facts might be entirely free from negligence under another. No doubt it is the legal duty of a person engaging in any business dangerous to others to exercise due care in providing against such dangers, and the absence of such care as the case requires would be negligence, but at the same time the character of the danger, whether remote or proximate, probable or possible, would be a material fact in determining the question of negligence, growing out of the care bestowed in guarding against it. In other words, the fact of negligence would, in a given case, greatly depend upon the character of the danger to *be apprehended, whether thus remote or proximate, possible or probable. And it would be impossible to determine the question without evidence upon this essential fact. Much greater care is necessary when a train of cars is crossing a highway than when passing along its track at a point distant from a highway. And much greater care must be observed along a crowded street than in the open country. The surroundings are absolutely necessary to be ascertained before the question of negligence can be determined.

Now in this case the deceased was knocked from the train and killed while he was upon the ladder on the outside of the car when the train was passing this structure, and, it is true, that such an accident could not have happened had the tank not been located as it was. But whether the danger of such an accident happening at that point and in that way was of such a character as to have required the company to locate this tank a few inches back, was a material fact in determining whether due care had been exercised, and consequently a material fact on the question of negligence. In locating this tank, did ordinary or reasonable care or foresight demand that the company should foreknow, or even apprehend, that it was probable, remote or otherwise, that the lantern of a brakeman who was posted on the top of the conductor's cab, and required by the rules of the company to remain there, would go out just as the train was approaching this point, and at the moment that it swept by, that this brakeman, after descending to the cab for a second lantern, would be on the ladder returning to his position?

It seems to us that these facts, or at least some facts showing the character of care that should have been bestowed, and that it was absent, the danger to be apprehended, and that it was not provided against, or something of that kind, were material facts on the question of negligence before that question could be properly submitted to a jury. But we find no testimony in the record directed to these points. The substance of the entire testimony is, that the tank was close enough to the track to strike one who happened to be on the outside of the car when the train was passing that point; that the deceased was on the outside at this precise moment and was killed; but there was no testimony *that in locating this tank so near, the company, in view of such a conjuncture of circumstances, or of any danger resulting therefrom, failed to exercise reasonable care, such care as men ordinarily exercise in the conduct of business. In the absence of such testimony the non-suit was not without authority of law.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN dissenting. I cannot concur. It seems to me that the question of proper care on the part of the company should be considered with reference to the event which actually occurred, and not the probabilities in advance, whether the concurrence of circumstances necessary to produce it might or might not take place.

YORK COUNTY v. FEWELL.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸843.]

Where respondent consents in writing that the judgment of the Circuit Court shall be reformed in the particulars complained of by the appellant, all is conceded that could be obtained by an appeal; and, therefore, the appeal will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Doty v. Crawford, 39 S. C. 5, 17 S. E. 377.

[2. Highways ⟸19.]

Special commissioners appointed for the purpose having laid out a highway between two towns, the Board of County Commissioners assessed the damages sustained by the land owners, and on appeal to the Circuit Court, the amount of damages was referred to a jury, on the testimony already taken. Held, that this was error, and that the proper mode of proceeding to obtain a condemnation of the right of way was that indicated in sections 1550 et seq. of General Statutes.[1]

Before Kershaw, J., York, March, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. C. E. Spencer, for plaintiff.

*Messrs. Hart & Hart, for defendant.

April 14th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Sundry citizens of York county having filed a petition in the office of the county commissioners of said county praying for the opening of a new road from Ebenezer to Rock Hill, three special commissioners were appointed by the Board of County Commissioners, under the provisions of subdivision 9 of section 611 of the General Statutes of 1882, to lay out said road, and also to asseses the damages sustained by the persons over whose land said road should pass. These special commissioners filed their report on August 21st, 1882, designating the route of said road, estimating its width at thirty feet, and assessing the damages of the land holders, amongst others to the defendant, S. M. Fewell, $250. To this report exceptions were filed by said Fewell on three grounds: 1. Because the compensation allowed is insufficient. 2. Because the width of said road was established at thirty feet, instead of twenty feet, as provided for by law. 3. Because it is not the best and shortest road between the two designated termini.

The Board of County Commissioners having heard the report and the exceptions thereto, together with the evidence adduced in support of said exceptions, confirmed the report, from which action of the board the defendant appealed to the Circuit Court, upon certain grounds set out in the "Case," but not necessary to be recited here. The appeal was heard by Judge Kershaw, who rendered judgment, holding, first, that, in view of the conflict of testimony as to whether the compensation allowed was sufficient, it was proper that that question should be referred to a jury. Second. That the objection as to the width of the road was not tenable, as he could find no law limiting the width of a public road to less than thirty feet. Third. That the necessity for the road in question, as well as the propriety of the route selected, are matters so much in the discretion of the commissioners that in the absence of any manifest unfairness or impropriety the court would not interfere. He therefore adjudged that the question of the amount of compensation which should be allowed the defendant, Fewell, be referred to a jury "upon the testimony *already taken herein," and that in all other respects the decision of the county commissioners be affirmed, and "that upon the finding of the jury upon the question of damages, the appellant have judgment for the amount by them to be determined, upon the approval of the same by the judge presiding at the rendition of the verdict."

From this judgment both parties appeal, the plaintiff upon the following grounds: "1. For that his honor, the Circuit judge, erred in referring the question of compensation to a jury, and in not sending it back to the county commissioners to appoint a new board of special commissioners to assess the damages, as contemplated by law; or in not himself appointing said special commissioners for said purpose. 2. For that his honor erred in referring the said question of compensation to a jury 'upon the testimony already taken herein,' whereas it should have been submitted to the jury de novo, or at least without any restriction upon the right of either party to introduce such testimony as he might be advised to offer. 3. For that his honor erred in not making the judgment for the amount of damages (when determined) conditional upon the appropriation of defendant's land by the plaintiff or its agents."

The defendant's appeal is based upon the ground that there was error in establishing the width of the road at thirty feet instead of twenty feet. Before the "Case" was settled or agreed upon, the attorney for the plaintiff served a written notice on the attorneys for defendant consenting to a reformation of the judgment, so that the width of the road should be fixed at twenty instead of thirty feet, as provided by section 1064 of General Statutes of 1882, which seems to have been overlooked on the Circuit. This, it seems to us, disposes of the appeal on the part of the defendant, as it concedes to him all that he could obtain by the judgment of this court sustaining his appeal.

It only remains, therefore, to consider the appeal on behalf of the plaintiff, but under the view which we take of the case, it will not be necessary to consider the grounds in detail. It seems to us that the parties have entirely mistaken the mode of proceeding provided by law for ascertaining the amount of compensation to which a land holder, whose land may be appropriated *for a public highway, shall be entitled. The constitution (Art. I. § 23) provides that "private property shall not be taken or applied for public use, or for the use of corporations, or for private use, without the consent of the owner, or a just compensation being made therefor;" but it does not provide any mode by which the amount of such compensation shall be ascertained. That was left for the legislature to do. Accordingly, in section 1550 of the General Statutes and those immediately succeeding, provision is made for the purpose: "Whenever any person or corporation shall be authorized by charter to construct a railway, canal, turnpike, or other public highway," &c. (the italics being ours). Subdivision 9 of section 611 of the General Statutes, under which the parties seem to have proceeded in this case, makes no provision for the assessment of the amount of compensation to which a land holder may be entitled whose land is appropriated for the use of the public as a highway by the special commissioners therein authorized to be appointed. It simply authorizes the Board of County Commissioners to appoint special commissioners to lay out public highways, and after they are so laid out, then for the purpose of acquiring the right of way, the mode prescribed by section 1550 et seq. must be pursued.

It is true that some of the language employed in these sections would seem to indicate that they were intended to apply to railway and other like companies; but as the constitution expressly declares that private property shall not be taken or applied even to public uses without the consent of the owner, or without just compensation being made therefor, and as there does not seem to be any other law providing a mode by which the amount of such compensation shall be ascertained, we think the fair and necessary construction is, that the mode prescribed by these sections must be pursued when private property is to be taken or applied to the use of the public by the establishment of a public highway. We think, therefore, that it was error to refer the question of the amount of compensation to which the defendant was entitled to a jury to be determined by them upon the evidence previously taken; but that, on the contrary, the amount of such compensation should be ascertained in the mode hereinabove indicated.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

MONTS v. KOON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[Witnesses ⟸159.]

In a proceeding to revive an execution, instituted by the administrator of the assignee, the Circuit judge erred in permitting defendant to testify that he had placed two notes in the hands of the deceased assignee to collect. Code, § 400.

Before Kershaw, J., Lexington, September, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. G. T. Graham, for appellant.

Messrs. Meetze & Muller, contra.

April 14th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. One Levi Monts, of Lexington county, in 1872, obtained judgments against J. L. Koon, Thomas L. Boyd, and David Shealy, separately, on a joint and several sealed note for the sum of $217.79, upon which executions were issued in 1873. In June, 1872, Monts assigned these judgments to William Fort, who has since died. Thomas L. Boyd and Shealy have also died since said assignment. H. Arthur Fort is the administrator of William Fort, and the defendants, David Counts and Jesse M. Shealy, are the legal representatives respectively of Boyd and David Shealy, deceased. The proceedings below were instituted in behalf of Arthur Fort, administrator of William Fort, to renew the executions, it being alleged that their active energy had expired, and the defendants were summoned in separate proceedings to show cause why said execution should not be renewed. The defendants, Koon and Counts, answered, pleading payment by certain notes which Boyd in his life-time had placed in the hands of William Fort, after the judgments had been assigned to him.

*The cases came first before Judge Witherspoon, and it appearing that the defendants desired a trial by jury, the judge ordered an issue. At the next term they came on for trial before Judge Kershaw, the case against Koon coming up first. In the progress of this case, the defendant, Koon, was presented as a witness for the defence, who testified that he had placed certain notes in the hands of William Fort for collection. At this point, the plaintiff objected, and claimed that the witness could not testify as to transactions between himself and William Fort, under section 415 of the code [now section 400]. The objection was sustained, but the court held that the rule had not been violated thus far, as the witness had only stated his own action.

After other testimony and a charge from the judge, this case went to the jury, and the one against Counts was taken up. While this was in progress, and before it reached the jury, a verdict for the defendant in the first case was returned and published, the jury having found a verdict showing that the judgment had been satisfied; whereupon the second case, the one against Counts, was ordered by the judge to be withdrawn from the jury, and that the motion to renew the execution therein be refused, stating in the order that "the jury in the first case having found the judgment against the principal satisfied, no renewal can be had against the surety."

The appeal raises three questions: 1. Whether the evidence of the defendant, Koon, as received, was in conflict with section 415 of the code? 2. Was it error of law for the Circuit judge to withdraw the case from the jury and to order the motion therein refused, under the circumstances stated? 3. Did the judge invade the province of the jury in his charge as to the facts of the case?

Section 415 of the code is somewhat complex and cumbersome in its phraseology, and it is sometimes difficult to determine the question of its applicability to a special case. It is admitted, however, in this case, that the parties occupied that relation towards each other which rendered that section pertinent, and would have excluded any testimony from the defendant, Koon, as to any "transaction or communication" between himself and William Fort, deceased; but the Circuit judge, recognizing this *fact, held that the testimony admitted was not in violation of the rule, as it was only a statement of what the witness had done, and therefore was not a transaction or communication in the sense of the section between himself and the deceased Fort. We think the judge was in error in drawing this distinction. The foundation of the defence was payment, payment by certain notes, which Koon in his answer claimed that he had placed in the hands of Fort for collection, and the evidence admitted was intended to sustain this defence. It showed that Koon had placed these notes in the hands of Fort, and it involved not only the act of Koon in putting the notes in Fort's hands, but also the act of Fort in receiving them. This was certainly a transaction between the two, and therefore the testimony was in violation of the section of the code under consideration.

The cases must be remanded on this ground; hence it will be unnecessary to consider the other exceptions.

It is the judgment of the court that the judgments below be reversed and the cases remanded for new trials.

21 S. C. 112

BLACKWELL v. RYAN.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Specific Performance ⟸121.]

In suits for specific performance, the contract must be established by competent and satisfactory proof, such as is clear, definite, and certain. The Circuit judge sustained in his findings of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 387–395; Dec. Dig. ⟸121.]

[2. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸196.]

A vendor has the right in equity to claim specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, and in such proceeding to have decree for payment of unpaid purchase money or a sale of the land therefor, but he is not entitled to recover rents and profits from the vendee.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 497, 16 S. E. 472.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. ⟸196.]

[3. Equity ⟸87.]

To such an equitable proceeding, the statute of limitations as such has no proper application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 242–244, 395; Dec. Dig. ⟸87.]

[4. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸82.]

A subsequent agreement in this case between the vendee and the administrator of the vendor held not to have changed the relative condition of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139; Dec. Dig. ⟸82.]

[5. Adverse Possession ⟸63.]

One who goes into possession of land under a contract to purchase it, cannot acquire title against the vendor by the statute of limitations, until payment of the purchase money; neither can the widow of such vendee after his death.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McSween v. McCown, 23 S. C. 351; Watts v. Witt, 39 S. C. 369, 17 S. E. 822; Peake v. Young, 40 S. C. 59, 18 S. E. 237; De Hihns v. Free, 70 S. C. 351, 49 S. E. 841; Good v. Jarrard, 93 S. C. 241, 76 S. E. 698, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383.

For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 343; Dec. Dig. ⟸63.]

[6. Adverse Possession ⟸63.]

*Although there was in this case a positive and unequivocal assertion of adverse right made to the vendor by the widow of the vendee, still the bar of the statute cannot as such be interposed to a proceeding on the equity side of the court for specific performance of an executory contract.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Poston v. Ingraham, 76 S. C. 170, 56 S. E. 780.

[7. Specific Performance ⟸105.]

But where, as in this case, there has been long and unexplained delay, the original parties are all dead, the widow of the vendee has been in uninterrupted possession for more than fourteen years asserting exclusive ownership, and other circumstances are adverse to the claim, a Court of Equity will not decree specific performance of the contract in favor of the vendor. The Court of Equity, in exercising discretion, will follow, as far as practicable, the analogies of the law.

[This case is also cited in Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 144, 18 S. E. 680, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Edgefield, June, 1883.

The opinion fully states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting such matters as are repeated in the opinion, was as follows:

Putting together the testimony of Mr. Griffin as to the admission of James Blackwell to him of the amount repaid to him by B. Jabez Ryan, the testimony of Mrs. Ryan, (somewhat indefinite it is true,) as to the amount paid on his bond out of her interest in the estate, real and personal, of John Dobey, and the fact that this agreement between Landon Tucker, the administrator of James Blackwell, and B. Jabez Ryan, carefully provided for the payment of the moneys paid by him on said bond, and that the same shall be first paid out of the sale of the hotel, and makes no mention of any amount due to his intestate's estate from payments made by him in his life-time, I must conclude that nothing remains unpaid by B. Jabez Ryan except the amount paid on the bond by Landon Tucker, $500 February 7th, 1860, and $2,000 July 7th, 1863, and the interest thereon. The $500 payment was certainly not made with reference to Confederate money, as it was before the war. The $2,000 was made on a bond executed long before the war, and extinguished it pro tanto at a specie valuation, and B. Jabez Ryan, in his agreement with Landon Tucker, never set up any such claim as that it was subject to be scaled.

The rental value of the property for 1868 to 1870 was about $300 per annum; from that time to the present about $200 per annum; but I do not think that the defendants are in any *event accountable for rent. The plaintiffs, if entitled to anything, have a right to the unpaid money and interest, and to have the land sold for the payment. They cannot have interest and rent both.

Mrs. Frances Ryan, the defendant, widow of B. Jabez Ryan, and her children, have been in the possession and in the receipts of the rents and profits ever since the death of her husband. If this was all, I would think that the plaintiffs would have a right to have the hotel and lot sold for the payment of the money paid out by Landon Tucker, and the interest, under the agreement between himself and B. Jabez Ryan, to be divided between Landon Tucker and the heirs of James Blackwell in such manner as they have seen fit to agree to amongst themselves. Soon, however, after the death of B. Jabez Ryan, some three months, Mrs. Ryan says in her testimony: "I had a conversation with Landon Tucker. He wanted me to sign an instrument of writing about this property. I told him it was my property, and that I would not leave it unless by fire or death."

An uncompleted contract to convey is an equitable mortgage. Adams Eq., 123. The land becomes in equity the property of the vendee, and the purchase money that of the vendor. * * * On the death of the vendor, it will pass to his executor, for whom the devisee or heir will be a trustee. Ibid, 140, 141. If a man has entered into a valid contract for the purchase of land, he is treated in equity as the equitable owner of the land, and the vendor is treated as the owner of the money, and the purchase money is treated as the personal estate of the vendor, and goes as such to his personal representatives. 2 Story Eq., § 790.

Landon Tucker, then, is the person who, either in his own right or as administrator, was competent to deal with the payment of it. He alone could give a valid receipt for the same, and he had a right to enforce this lien on the hotel and lot as in case of an ordinary mortgage, without making the personal representatives a party, and proceeding against the heirs alone, unless a decree is sought against the personal representatives. Mrs. Ryan and her children, in their answer, set up title in themselves and claim the benefit of the statute of limitations.

The Supreme Court of the United States

liken the relations of *landlord and tenant to the relations of mortgagors and mortgagees, and consider that there is no more propriety in refusing a lessee, who has openly disavowed the title of the landlord, the protection of the statute, than there is any other fraudulent, trustee, from the time the fraud is discovered. There is no rule in law or equity which makes it a matter of duty to do so. All the cases, however, show that every presumption is in favor of possession in subordination to the title of the true owner, and that the adverse possession must be made out, not by any inference, but by clear and positive proof of a claim on the part of the tenants and of an acquiescence on the part of the landlord who is knowing to the same. Aug. Lim. (6 edit.), § 444, citing Zeller v. Eckert, 4 How., 289.

In the case referred to, the court seems to have been considering the case of a tenant and landlord, but says that they are like the relations of mortgagor and mortgagee, and thence deduces the principle which is applied to the former. It seems to be a wholesome rule to be applied in all cases where parties occupy similar relations. In the case of Norton v. Lewis, 3 S. C., 31, the question of the right to set up the statute of limitations against a mortgage was reopened and the plea was not allowed in that case. The Supreme Court in that case says that the defendants "do not allege anything in the character of their possession amounting to an active opposition to the claim of the mortgagee, but rely on the naked fact of holding as purchasers under title derived from the mortgagor." It is true that the court does not say what would have been the effect of active opposition to the mortgagee, but enough is said to prevent that case from being an authority, that in no case can the statute of limitations be set up against a mortgage.

In the case before me, Mrs. Ryan very emphatically claimed the property, and announced to the creditor her determination not to give it up, and that she claimed it as her own. She has continued with her children in possession, and she is in the receipt of the rents and profits more than ten years consecutively immediately before the commencement of this action, February 27th, 1882. Landon Tucker had a right then, early in 1868, under his agreement with B. Jabez Ryan, to the rents and profits of the *hotel and lot, and has allowed fourteen years to pass without taking any steps by law to assert his rights, and that, too, after he had been informed in a most positive manner by Mrs. Ryan that she claimed the hotel and lot as her own, and did not intend to leave it. He could have forced a sale after January 1st, 1869.

The question is not here made as to the liability of Elbert Ryan as administrator of B. Jabez Ryan, and no judgment will be rendered upon it; but I think that the plea of the statute of limitations set up by the defendants against the sale of the house and lot to pay any alleged balance due to Landon Tucker, either immediately or as administrator of James Blackwell, deceased, must be sustained. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the complaint be dismissed.

Messrs. W. T. Gary and Ernest Gary, for appellants.

Messrs. Butler & Simkins and Bettis & Wardlaw, contra.

April 14th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In November, 1856, the real estate of John Dobey, previously deceased intestate, was sold by the commissioner in equity for Edgefield district for partition under orders in the case of John L. Dobey et al. v. Matilda Dobey et al. At this sale, B. Jabez Ryan bid off the Planters' Hotel at the price of $6,510, payable half in one year and the other half in two years; but he could not comply with the terms of sale, and his friend, James Blackwell, assumed the bid, gave bond with surety for the amount, and, as we suppose as a matter of course (although it is not expressly stated), took title from the commissioner.

At the time of the sale, or soon after, there was a written agreement entered into between Blackwell and Ryan that the latter should have the hotel if he would pay the bond given by Blackwell for the purchase money; and upon that being done, he, Blackwell, "would execute good and sufficient title to said hotel and premises unto the said Ryan." This paper is lost; but as Ryan afterwards entered into another agreement, reciting the original contract, there seems to be no dispute about its terms. *Under this contract, Ryan took possession. Various payments were made on the Blackwell bond to the Dobey estate, as appears by receipts, indorsed on it, but without stating from whom the money was received, down to the death of Blackwell, which occurred November 29, 1858; and immediately thereafter administration upon his estate was granted to Landon Tucker. Afterwards further payments were made on the bond, some by Ryan and others by Landon Tucker, the administrator of Blackwell, until July 7, 1863, when, there being due on the bond $2,000, this sum was paid by Landon Tucker, and the bond cancelled.

All this time Ryan and family were in possession of the hotel, and after the war, viz., on October 2, 1866, Ryan and Landon Tucker entered into a written covenant, under seal, which after reciting the sale, &c., provided as follows: "And whereas the said James Blackwell, after his said purchase, by a certain instrument in writing, agreed with B. Jabez Ryan that if he, the said Ryan, would pay the said bond given by the said Blackwell to secure the purchase money of said hotel, that he, Blackwell, would execute good and sufficient titles to said premises unto the said B. Jabez Ryan; and whereas neither the said Blackwell, in his life-time, nor the said B. Jabez Ryan, paid the bond hereinabove referred to, but the same has been satisfied and paid by Landon Tucker, who has, therefore, become entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the said James Blackwell in the premises, the said Jabez Ryan having paid a portion of the purchase money, and having an equitable claim therefor to have the agreement between Blackwell and himself specifically performed, but being anxious to secure the said Landon Tucker the amount paid by him upon the bond aforementioned: Now know all men by these presents that it is agreed by and between the parties thereto —that is to say, the said B. Jabez Ryan of the one part and the said Landon Tucker of the other part—as follows: That the said Landon Tucker shall have the control and management of said hotel from the first day of January, A. D. 1867, until the first day of January, A. D. 1869, and shall receive the rents and profits thereof until the latter date, at which time the said hotel and premises shall be sold, the proceeds of said sale to be first chargeable with the payment of that portion of the pur*chase money paid by the said Landon Tucker, together with interest," &c.

It does not appear that this agreement was ever carried out; but Ryan remained in possession of the hotel until he died intestate in January, 1868. His family, consisting of his widow, Frances, and her children, Adela, wife of Frank Sandland, and defendants, Elbert Ryan and Alma Belanger, still continued to hold possession of the hotel. Letters of administration upon the estate of B. Jabez Ryan were never granted until March 2, 1882, when his said son, Elbert, became administrator. Things stood in this condition until February 27, 1882, when these proceedings were instituted by the heirs and administrator of James Blackwell against the heirs and administrator of B. Jabez Ryan, deceased, for specific performance of the contract of sale of the hotel. The defendants denied that there was anything due on the purchase money; but if so, they insisted that the plaintiffs were barred from prosecuting their action "by the statute of limitations, laches, and lapse of time."

There was no reference to ascertain how much, if anything, of the Dobey bond remained unrefunded, but Judge Fraser heard all the testimony and reached the conclusion of fact "that nothing remains unpaid except the amount paid on the bond by Landon Tucker, $500, February 7, 1860, and $2,000, July 7, 1863, in Confederate money." But he held further, as follows: "Mrs. Frances Ryan, widow of B. Jabez Ryan, and her children, have been in the possession of the rents and profits ever since the death of her husband. If this were all, I would think that the plaintiffs would have a right to have the hotel and lot sold for the payment of the money paid out by Landon Tucker. * * * Soon, however, after the death of B. Jabez Ryan, some three weeks, Mrs. Ryan says in her testimony: 'I had a conversation with Landon Tucker. He wanted me to sign an instrument of writing about this property. I told him that it was my property, and that I would not leave it unless by fire or death.' * * * I think that the plea of the statute of limitations set up by the defendants against the sale of the house and lot to pay any alleged balance due to Landon Tucker, either immediately or as admin*istrator of James Blackwell, deceased, must be sustained; and the complaint is dismissed," &c.

From this decree, the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his honor erred in decreeing that nothing remains unpaid by B. Jabez Ryan except the amount paid on the bond by Landon Tucker, the proof showing that James Blackwell, in his life-time, made numerous large payments on said bond.

2. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the statement of Mrs. Ryan to Landon Tucker, to the effect 'that the property was hers, and that she would not leave it unless by fire or death,' was such a disclaimer of title in James Blackwell as would bind the heirs of James Blackwell and give currency to the statute of limitations.

3. "Because his honor erred in deciding that the plea of the statute of limitations, set up by defendants against the sale of the house and lot to pay any alleged balance due to Landon Tucker, either individually or as administrator of James Blackwell, must be sustained.

4. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the defendants were tenants at will of the heirs of James Blackwell, deceased, and could not hold the possession of said house and lot adversely to said heirs without first notifying said heirs of said intention.

5. "Because his honor erred in not deciding that the agreement between Landon Tucker and B. Jabez Ryan was an equitable mortgage of said hotel, which was pledged to secure the amount paid by Landon Tucker, as administrator of James Blackwell, on said bond.

6. "Because his honor erred in deciding that a mortgage could be barred by the statute of limitations in less than twenty years," &c.

The first question is one of fact—how much, if anything, is due upon the purchase money of the hotel? In suits for the specific performance of contracts, the contract must be established by competent and satisfactory proof, clear, definite, and certain. The whole of the Dobey bond was certainly paid, but by whom is far from being clear. As to the first instalment paid to Com*missioner Simkins, it is not stated by whom the payments were made, but as it does appear that during the time Ryan paid money directly to Blackwell, we infer that the payments were made by Blackwell himself. Upon this supposition, it is claimed that these payments were all refunded. It does not satisfactorily appear whether they were or not; but as nothing on that account was claimed to be due in the subsequent agreement of 1866, and the onus was upon the plaintiffs to prove their claim, we agree with the Circuit judge that it was not shown with sufficient clearness that any of the first instalment remains due and owing.

The second instalment of the bond fell due after the death of Blackwell, and was all paid to Commissioner Carwile by Ryan himself, except two payments by Tucker, administrator of Blackwell, viz., the first paid as administrator, $500, February 7, 1860, and the other as an individual, $2,000, in Confederate money, July 7, 1863, making $2,500. Is the whole of this sum, and if not, what part of it, still unrefunded? It appears that on May 9th, 1859, Ryan paid to Tucker the sum of $900, which would reduce the aggregate amount paid by him to $1,600; a sum less than that paid in Confederate money. Whether that $900 paid to Tucker was needed to refund the balance of payments made by his intestate, Blackwell, or should be credited on the above amount paid by himself, does not satisfactorily appear. The recitals in the agreement of 1866 unfortunately do not state the amount due to Tucker; but they favor the view that at least the last payment of $2,000 (which it seems was paid by him as an individual, and not as administrator) had not been refunded, for it is there stated as follows: "But the same (Dobey bond) has been satisfied and paid by Landon Tucker," &c. This would seem to point specially to the last payment, which satisfied the bond. But as in another place reference is made to "the amount paid by him upon the bond," without making any discrimination between the two payments, we concur, with some hesitation, with the Circuit judge in his finding that at the time of the execution of the agreement (1866) both the sums paid by Tucker, whether as an individual or as administrator of Blackwell, remained unpaid; and as no proof was made of payments after that time, that they still remain unpaid.

*Then as to the right of the parties now to recover this balance. This is an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, by which the vendee agreed to pay (without naming the time) a certain amount as purchase money (the Dobey bond), and the vendor agreed to make title when said purchase money was paid. This contract embodied mutual covenants, dependent one upon the other, and was, therefore, what is known as an executory contract as to land, which conferred upon the vendor what Herman and Jones and other elementary writers denominate "a lien by contract or reservation," as distinguished from the technical "vendor's lien," in which the title is conveyed to the vendee. "Before conveyance, however, and while there is a contract of sale merely, the vendor has the legal estate in the land, and the vendee has the equitable interest—the former being a trustee of the beneficial interest in the land for the latter; the latter being the trustee of the purchase money for the former." Whilst in this state we do not recognize the technical "vendor's lien," it is well settled that the vendor has a right, by a proceeding on the equity side of the court, to have such a contract for land specifically performed. Gregorie v. Bulow, Rich. Eq. Cas., 245; Walker & Trenholm v. Kee, 16 S. C., 76. The scope of the proceeding reaches only to the unpaid purchase money, if any; and if that is not paid, to have the land sold for the payment of it, so that rents and profits are not in the case. The defendants entered under a contract to purchase, and are entitled to the use and occupation until the time comes to get title from the vendor, or performance is decreed.

We agree with the appellant's counsel, upon the force of the authorities cited, that to such an equitable proceeding for specific performance the statute of limitations as such has no proper application. As was tersely said by Judge O'Neall, in the leading case of our State upon the subject, Gregorie v. Bulow, supra: "I concur fully with the chancellor that, either at law or equity, the statute of limitations could not be pleaded by the vendee against the vendor while the contract was executory on both parts." It seems that the authorities go so far as to hold that the nature of the contract remains unchanged even if the purchase money is put in the form of a note, which at law *would be barred; that either party would still have the equity to ask specific performance of the contract taken as a whole whenever he could show that he had fully performed, or was ready to perform, his part of it. "The agreement of the vendor substantially is this: when you pay the price you can have the title; till you pay, I retain it. The title is held as security for the price. The vendee cannot compel a conveyance until he pays the price; 'not even,' says the Supreme Court of Alabama, 'though the notes given for the price are barred by the statute of limitations, and no recovery at law can be had thereon.'" Herm. Mort., § 211; Driver v. Hudspeth, 16 Ala., 348; Relfe v. Relfe, 34 Id., 500; Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Grat., 232.

So far as the rights of the vendee are concerned, we do not see that it makes any difference whether the money was paid by Tucker as an individual or as administrator. We think it must be considered that he paid it as administrator out of the assets of the estate of his intestate. One of the receipts so states, but the other does not. He had, however, no connection with the matter, or right to meddle with it, except as administrator of Blackwell, whose bond was outstanding and about to be sued. But considered in either way, it comes to the same thing. If paid out of the assets of the estate, of course it was for the benefit of the heirs of Blackwell. If Tucker as an individual advanced the money for the estate of Blackwell, he thereby acquired pro tanto the original contract of Ryan to pay the purchase money, and all the rights connected with it; and thereafter the heirs of Blackwell held the legal title as trustees for him as the owner of the balance of the original obligation; or as it was well expressed in the agreement of October, 1866, Tucker was "entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the said James Blackwell in the premises." Walker & Trenholm v. Kee, 16 S. C., 76; 1 Jones Mort., § 235. Events changed the parties who have a right to enforce it, but the contract itself remains unchanged in character, being still executory. "In no case can a sale of lands be regarded as complete until the purchaser has paid his money and the seller has conveyed the land." Herbemont v. Sharp, 2 McC., 264; Buckner v. Railroad Company, 7 S. C., 328; Burris v. Gooch, 5 Rich., 5.

*Nor do we think that the agreement of 1866 between Ryan and Tucker created any new obligation or changed the relative condition of the parties. That was simply a recital and acknowledgment of rights previously existing with an abortive attempt to close up the matter by sale of the hotel.

Then as to the other branch of the statute, that claiming title to the hotel by adverse possession for more than ten years. It is a familiar doctrine that one who goes into possession of land under a contract to purchase it, and has not paid the whole of the purchase money, cannot acquire title against the vendor by the statute of limitations. Richards v. McKie, Harp. Eq., 190; Secrest v. McKenna, 6 Rich. Eq., 72; Milhouse v. Patrick, 6 Rich., 352; Gregorie v. Bulow, supra. Ryan entered into possession under such a contract, and in 1866, a short time before his death, admitted that the whole of the purchase money had not been paid. It is clear, therefore, that if he were living and the defendant here, he would not be heard to say that he held the hotel adversely to the heirs and representative of his vendor.

But it is urged that the case is different as to such claim on the part of his widow, who has been in possession ever since his death, and that possession was made adverse by her declaration to Tucker soon after her husband's death in 1868, that "the hotel was her property, and she would not leave it unless by fire or death." Mrs. Ryan went into possession with her husband, and must be considered to have done so on the terms and conditions upon which he received it. "When there is no new entry but the heir is in as of his ancestor's possession, the possession of the heir is that of the ancestor." Reeder & Davis v. Dargan, 15 S. C., 182, and authorities there cited.

Assuming then that Mrs. Ryan was in possession under the contract of her husband to purchase as his privy, and that all of the purchase money had not been paid, was her declaration to Tucker, the representative of the vendor, "that the property was hers, and that she would not leave it unless by fire or death," enough to change the character of her possession, so as to put the statute to running in her favor, as against the vendor or his representatives? Her declaration was certainly a very positive and unequivocal assertion of adverse right, and it is difficult to un*derstand how Tucker, who controverted it, could have acquiesced in it and taken no steps to enforce his claim for more than ten years, unless upon the supposition that, originating for the most part in Confederate money, he was conscious that, in justice, it was at least doubtful.

It is undoubtedly true that ten years adverse possession gives title against all who are capable of suing and do not; but it seems to us that the legal bar of the statute cannot as such be interposed to a proceeding on the equity side of the court for the specific performance of an executory contract. See Smith v. Smith, McMull Eq., 134, where Chancellor Dunkin said: "The remedy which complainant seeks [specific performance] is purely of an equitable character. * * * How far and in what manner this court [equity] is governed by the statute of limitations, has been often discussed. It is well stated by Lord Redesdale, in Bond v. Hopkins, 1 Sch. & Lef., 428. 'The statute of limitations does not apply in terms to proceedings in courts of equity. It applies to particular actions at common law, and limits the time within which they shall be brought according to the nature of these actions, but it does not say that there shall be no recovery in any other mode of proceeding. Nothing is better established in courts of equity than that where a title exists in conscience, though there be none at law, relief should, though in a different mode, be given in equity.'" &c.

But from the fact that the legal bar of the statute as such is not applicable to an equitable proceeding for specific performance, it does not necessarily follow that a court of equity will in all cases grant the relief prayed for. Judge Story says: "The interference of courts of equity in decreeing specific performance is discretionary, and they will not interfere to decree specific performance, except in cases where it would be strictly equitable to make such a decree. There is no pretence to say that it is the doctrine of courts of equity to carry into specific execution every contract in all cases. * * * In general it may be stated, that to entitle a party to a specific performance, he must show that he has been in no default in not having performed the agreement, and that he has taken all proper steps towards the performance on his own part. If he has been guilty of gross laches, or if he *applies for relief after a long lapse of time, unexplained by equitable circumstances, his bill will be dismissed; for courts of equity do not, any more than courts of law, administer relief to the gross negligence of suitors. * * * It should be clear that there has been no change of circumstances affecting the character or justice of the contract, that he who asks a specific performance is in a condition to perform his own part of the contract, and that he has shown himself ready, desirous, prompt, and eager to perform the contract." 2 Story Eq. Jur., §§ 749, 771, 776.

The same doctrine is announced and the authorities collected in 6 Waits A. & D., 810. "It is the doctrine of equity that specific performance will not be decreed in favor of a complainant who has been guilty of laches, either in performing his part of the contract or in applying to a court for relief." We may add the authority of our own case of Gregorie v. Bulow, supra, in which stress is laid on the depreciation of the value of the property to the injury of the party sought to be charged, and the remark of Mr. Maddox is cited with approbation. "Where a contract has long lain dormant, thirteen years for instance, a specific performance has been refused; and laches of much less continuance is sufficient to dissolve the contract."

Now let us apply these principles to this case. The contract of Ryan to pay the Dobey bond was made about 1856. On July 7, 1863, when the last payment was made and the bond satisfied, the amount not paid by him was balance of purchase money then due, and the right of Tucker, the administrator of Blackwell, to demand specific performance was as perfect then as it is now; but we hear of no effort to enforce payment, except the abortive agreement of 1866, until February 27, 1882, when this action was commenced, a period of nearly nineteen years. It is true that the last payment on the Dobey bond was made in the midst of the war, when the courts were disorganized, but if we move up the transaction to October 2, 1866, when the agreement was executed, that was nearly sixteen years; and if we pass by the date of that acknowledgment, and count only from the time the attempted arrangement was to have been consummated, January 1, 1869, that was nearly fourteen years before action brought; and during the whole of this time Mrs. Ryan was in possession under the *very positive declaration that she would yield to nothing but "fire or death."

After such a long and unexplained delay, can we say that the representatives of the deceased vendor were "ready, desirous, prompt, and eager to perform the contract"? Would it be equitable now to grant specific performance of a contract made more than a quarter of a century ago by parties now dead, as to which the claim on one side, at least to the extent of four-fifths, originated in the use of Confederate money, and has been growing larger by the accumulation of interest, while on the other the property has been probably depreciating in value? The exercise of undefined power is always embarrassing, and in order to restrict it and introduce something like system, one of the rules laid down for directing the discretion of the court in such cases is to follow, as far as practicable, the analogies of the law. As remarked by Chancellor Dunkin, in Smith and Smith, supra: "In regard to equitable titles, courts of equity are to be considered as affected only by analogy to the statute of limitations. If a party be guilty of such laches in prosecuting his equitable title as would bar him, if his title was solely at law, he shall be barred in equity."

We assume that the heirs of Blackwell, who hold the title of their ancestor as trustee for Tucker, the party beneficially interested, are ready and willing to make titles upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money to said Tucker; but under all the circumstances of the case we feel constrained to hold that the claim is stale, and that he has not shown himself entitled to the equitable relief which he asks.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CHALMERS v. TURNIPSEED.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Courts ⇐23.]

By order of the Circuit Court, with consent of all parties, including creditors, certain personalty was assigned to a widow as a chattel exemption, and $1,000 out of the proceeds of her husband's land, *as a homestead: Held, that these parties were estopped from afterwards claiming a return of this property from the estate of the widow, notwithstanding that the order of the Circuit Court transcended its jurisdiction, and that the exemption, both of personalty and homestead, was illegal.

For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. ⇐23.]

[2. Exemptions ⇐3.]

The constitution and acts of assembly relating to homesteads and chattel exemptions, create no new estate, but simply exempt certain property from levy and sale, and when such property is assigned, the head of the family holds it as other property is held, except that it is exempt from enforced sale.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Watson v. Neal, 38 S. C. 102, 16 S. E. 833; Trimmier v. Winsmith, 41 S. C. 114, 117, 19 S. E. 283; Stewart v. Blalock, 45 S. C. 65, 22 S. E. 774.

For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 3; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[3. Homestead ⇐1.]

The right to homestead under the constitution depends upon two conditions: 1. There must be a head of a family; 2. There must be a dwelling-house where he resides. When these two conditions do not exist there is no right under the constitution to a homestead, and when they cease to exist the homestead ceases and becomes subject to the law of distribution, sale for debts, &c.

[4. Homestead ⇐142; Mortgages ⇐551.]

A homestead assigned to a childless widow out of her husband's realty under the act of 1872, 15 Stat., 229, returns at her death to the husband's estate, but her estate is not responsible for any diminution occasioned by the legitimate use thereof, nor for loss or destruction without fault on her part. And the same principle governs a chattel exemption to this widow under the act of 1873. 15 Stat., 372.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇐142; Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1578; Dec. Dig. ⇐551.]

[5. Executors and Administrators ⇐402.]

Under a bill for the settlement of an intestate's estate, lands of the intestate, covered by a mortgage held by one of the defendants, was sold by the sheriff under order of the court, which directed the proceeds to be paid to the clerk, subject to the further order of the court. A part of this money the sheriff embezzled: Held, that the amount so embezzled should not be credited on the mortgage, as the sheriff was in no sense the agent of the mortgagee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1608; Dec. Dig. ⇐402.]

[6. Payment ⇐24.]

A higher security taken for an antecedent indebtedness is an extinguishment of the lower, if accepted as satisfaction; and in the absence of proof to the contrary, the law will imply such satisfaction. Gardner v. Hust, 2 Rich., 608, recognized and followed. The sealed note of two partners, held to be an extinguishment of a promissory note of the firm.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

[7. Partnership ⇐258.]

A judgment against the survivor (since deceased) of a partnership is not entitled to priority of payment out of the partnership assets, except so far as it had acquired a lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 587; Dec. Dig. ⇐258.]

[8. Homestead ⇐142.]

[Where an estate of homestead terminates by the death of an intestate's widow without children, it becomes subject to the law of distribution of the intestate's estate.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇐142.]

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

All the facts of this case are stated in the opinion. The Circuit decree, so far as it is involved in this appeal, was as follows:

This case began for settlement of the estate of Robert Stewart, *and now involves, also, settlement of the partnership affairs of Stewart & Coate, of whom the latter survived, but is now dead also. The numerous points involved will be taken up separately.

1. The widow of Robert Stewart, in the early stage of this case, claimed homestead, and Judge Moses allowed her $1,000 out of the proceeds of sale of the family residence, and $477 of the personal property. There was no appeal from that decision, and she received the amounts so allowed to her. It remained unquestioned for more than six years; until after her death, and until April 30, 1880, when the administrator, de bonis non, filed his petition in this case, calling on her administrator to refund it. Assuming that Judge Moses did not have jurisdiction in the matter of homestead, and that I, therefore, am not bound by his decision, which was clearly erroneous, yet I am forced to the conclusion that money paid out in the progress of a case under decree of the court, is notice to all having an interest in it, and the statute of limitations is therefore a bar to all claim for the same against the estate of Eliza Stewart.

* * * * * *

3. James Y. Harris holds a note of Robert Stewart for $4,000, payable twelve months after date, "with interest from date at 12 per cent. per annum until paid." It was secured by mortgage, and the proceeds of the mortgaged land, except the widow's dower, and $1,239 wasted by the sheriff, was paid on said note. The questions now before me are, whether said note is to be further credited with the amount wasted by the sheriff, and whether the first year's interest, after it was due, bears interest at 12 per cent., or only at the legal rate. The principal is to bear interest from date, at 12 per cent.; but there is no provision in said note as to the rate to be borne by the interest, if not paid when due. The terms of the note cannot possibly be applied to the interest, because that would make it bear 12 per cent. from the date of the note. Such a construction could not have been intended when the note was made. The interest on the first year's interest should therefore be calculated at 7 per cent.

As to the money wasted by the sheriff, I have no proof that Mr. Harris could have prevented that by the utmost diligence. If the sheriff could then have been forced to pay said amount, *the motion for a rule against him should have been made at the instance of the clerk of the court, who, by order of the court, was authorized to receive said funds from the sheriff. The said mortgagee is therefore entitled to receive, out of the remainder of the estate, the balance due to him, calculating the interest as above ruled.

* * * * * *

5. Robert Stewart and John Coate were partners in trade, under the name of Stewart & Coate. The father of J. M. and R. H. Wright held in his life-time a promissory note of said firm. After his death, it came to his said sons, as distributees, and they divided it, each taking for his share a sealed note, signed Robert Stewart, John Coate.[1] The referee reports it as a partnership debt, and I agree with him. Whichever of the partners may have signed the name of Stewart & Coate to the original note is not material. Both acknowledged its validity as a partnership debt when they substituted their sealed notes for it, and their omitting the partnership name in said sealed notes is no proof that they thereby intended to remove it from being a partnership debt, and make it an individual joint and several debt. Said notes must therefore rank as partnership debts.

6. After the death of Robert Stewart, L. J. Jones, executor of Gilbal, entered judgment on a partnership debt in a suit against Coate, survivor of Stewart & Coate. He claims that it should rank as a judgment in this case. I adjudge that if any lien was acquired under said judgment, upon partnership property, the proceeds whereof are now in court for distribution, then, in that case, said proceeds must be first applied to the said judgment. But if no such lien was acquired, then my judgment is, that in marshalling partnership assets, the death of the partners does not bring said assets under the act concerning intestate estates, and so entitle judgments to be paid in preference to general debts. This ruling is also intended to cover sealed obligations.

*From this decree all the other creditors of Robert Stewart, except James Y. Harris, and all the creditors of the firm of Stewart & Coate, except Robert H. Wright, James M. Wright, John A. Bedenbaugh, and Joseph Caldwell as executor, appealed on the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in holding that the estate of Eliza R. Stewart was not responsible for the $1,000 assigned to her as homestead in land, but that the claim for the same made by the administrator and creditors of the estate of Robert Stewart was barred by the statute of limitations.

2. Because his honor erred in not charging the estate of Eliza R. Stewart with interest upon the said $1,000 from the date of its receipt by her.

3. Because his honor erred in holding that the estate of Eliza R. Stewart was not responsible for the personalty assigned to her herein as homestead exemption, or its value, to wit, $477; but that the claim therefor made by the administrator and creditors of the estate of Robert Stewart was barred by the statute of limitations.

4. Because his honor erred in not charging the estate of Eliza R. Stewart with interest upon the value of said personalty, to wit, $477, from the date she received it as such exemption.

5. Because his honor erred in holding that James Y. Harris, mortgage creditor, should not lose the sum of $1,239, arising from the sale of the property covered by his mortgage, and embezzled by the sheriff; but that the other creditors should lose the same.

[1] In the agreed statement it is said that each of the distributees took for his share a new note under the firm name for the original partnership note to Zacheus Wright, and that subsequently two of them took the sealed notes of Stewart & Coate "in the place of" the notes so held by them.—REPORTER.

6. Because in any event his honor erred in allowing the said mortgage creditor, James Y. Harris, interest upon $1,239 of his debt from the date that said amount, as proceeds of said sale, was paid into court.

L. J. Jones, as executor of A. Gilbal, and other creditors of Stewart & Coate, also appealed on the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in holding that the sealed notes signed by Robert Stewart and John Coate, held by J. A. Bedenbaugh, R. H. Wright, and J. M. Wright, are partnership debts of the firm of Stewart & Coate.

2. Because his honor erred in holding that the judgment of *L. J. Jones, as executor of A. Gilbal, against John Coate, survivor of Stewart & Coate, was not entitled to be first paid out of the copartnership assets of Stewart & Coate.

Mr. T. S. Moorman, for plaintiff.

The assignment of homestead was a nullity. 17 S. C., 9. Especially in regard to the personalty, as there was no confirmation. 15 Stat., 229; 7 S. Ct., 146. The statute of limitations cannot protect the widow as to the homestead, for ten years had not elapsed; nor as to the chattel exemption, for she held it as administratrix. There is no estoppel against creditors. 17 S. C., 9. Besides, these orders were intermediate, and may now be reviewed. Ibid.; Code, § 11. The Harris mortgage should be credited with the amount applicable thereto lost by the sheriff. If the sheriff refused to pay the clerk, Harris could at any time have required it: but he seems to have done nothing. It was his negligence, not that of the creditors, that permitted the embezzlement, and the loss should not be thrown upon the latter. 2 S. C., 14. At least he should lose the interest, which is damages for money detained; but here the estate did not detain it, but it was paid into the hands of the officer of the court under its order.

Mr. Geo. S. Mower, same side.

Mr. L. J. Jones, for Gilbal's estate and other creditors of Stewart & Coate.

The facts show that the Wright notes were taken as payment. They were so intended, and being a higher security, so operate. Riley Eq., 181; Story Part., § 369; 2 McMull., 348; 2 Rich., 608; 15 S. C., 36; Big. Estop., 578; 2 Speer, 438; 4 Rich., 59; 16 S. C., 198. The judgment against Coate, survivor, was a judgment against Stewart & Coate and against Coate, and should rank as such against both firm and individual assets.

Mr. Y. J. Pope, same side.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, contra.

*The claim against Mrs. Stewart cannot be sustained, for her right to the property has been adjudicated. Landsdowne, 2 Jac. & W., it is significant that Powell, the attorney, was made a party, suggesting that there may have been misrepresentations in that case. See, too, 15 Am. Rep., 323; 2 DeSaus., 592; Bail. Eq., 492. Her estate is also protected by the statute of limitations. She did not hold this personal property for life only. There is no such limit in the constitution, nor in any of the statutes. Nor did she hold it as administratrix, for she took it as her own, and the statute began then to run in her favor. Ang. Lim., § 174; Speer Eq., 375; 1 McCord Ch., 176; 7 Johns. Ch., 90; 7 Rich. Eq., 34; 4 Id., 60, 92; 14 Id., 176; 15 S. C., 241; and consult Bail. Eq., 324. As to the homestead, she certainly is not liable for interest on the $1,000. Nor did she hold the corpus for life only. The constitution does not limit a homestead to the life-time. Some of the statutes undertook to do so, but they did not do so effectually. 2 S. C., 216. But if so, the order gave this money to Mrs. Stewart absolutely. And from the time that she took this money she held it adversely, and is now protected by the statute of limitations. As to the Harris mortgage, there can be no blame attached to Harris, for the money was to be paid into court, subject to its further order, and Harris could not disregard this order. The Wrights are creditors of the firm of Stewart & Coate. The new sealed notes of the partners was not a payment of the partnership notes. 75 N. Y., 535; 1 Quincy, 179; 12 Johns., 409; 11 R. I., 609; 11 S. C., 527; 15 Id., 72. There is no law to sustain the claim asserted by Gilbel's estate.

April 14th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Robert Stewart, late of Newberry county, died intestate in August, 1869. He left a personal estate, which proved to be insolvent, not paying his specialty *debts, most of which were contracted before the adoption of the constitution of 1868. His real estate consisted of two lots in Newberry village, one the homestead and the other known as "Stewart's corner." His widow, Mrs. E. R. Stewart, administered, and in July, 1870, commenced the action below to marshal the assets. The heirs at law, a creditor, one James Y. Harris, who held a mortgage on the lot known as Stewart's corner, and John Coate, the survivor of Stewart & Coate, were made parties, and the creditors, both of Stewart individually and of the firm of Stewart & Coate, were called in. During the progress of the action. Coate died, and his administrator, C. H. Suber, was made a party.

Mrs. Stewart claimed dower in the two lots and homestead in the home place, and in the personalty also. Dower was allowed in both the lots, and by order of the court, December 10, 1872, she was adjudged to be entitled to homestead in the home place, which was ordered to be sold, and out of the proceeds $1,000 to be paid her as a homestead, and on April 9th, 1873, commissioners were appointed to appraise and set off to her a homestead in the personalty. Accordingly, personalty to the value of $477 was appraised and assigned to her. The return of the appraisers was filed with the clerk, but it does not seem to have been confirmed. The above orders adjudging the homestead, &c., seem to have been passed by the consent of all the attorneys in the cause representing the various parties.

Harris established his mortgage as the first lien on the corner lot, to the extent of $4,000, by note dated January 7th, 1869, due at twelve months, with interest at 12 per cent. from date, the interest to be paid annually till paid; and by order of the court, March, 1871, this lot was sold by the sheriff at the price of $9,000, one-third cash, the balance in one and two years, the sheriff being directed to pay out of the cash proceeds $1,500 to the widow for her dower, and the remainder, after his costs and expenses, &c., to be applied to the Harris mortgage. This remainder amounted to $1,239.15. Before this application was made, by a second order, March 31, 1871, the court directed the application to be suspended until the next term of the court, and the sheriff was directed to turn over all proceeds of the sale to *the clerk of the court. Before the next term of the court, the sheriff embezzled these cash funds, and they were lost. The notes for the credit portion of the sale, however, were turned over to the clerk, out of the collection of which he paid the widow her dower, $1,500. The status of the Harris mortgage having been referred to a referee, it was urged before him that Harris should lose the amount embezzled by the sheriff, or at least the interest after it was paid into the hands of the sheriff. The referee reported otherwise, and upon exceptions, the Circuit judge sustained the referee, and ordered the application of the proceeds in the hands of the clerk to the mortgage. Under this order, the clerk applied the balance in his hands. There is still a balance due on this mortgage. No proceedings seem to have been taken against the sheriff or his sureties.

Certain creditors by the name of Wright, who at one time held promissory notes on the firm of Stewart & Coate, as partners and in their firm name, afterwards gave up their notes and took sealed notes for the same amount, signed by Stewart and Coate in their individual names. Upon the call for creditors, these parties appeared and presented these last notes against the assets of the firm of Stewart & Coate. The referee and the Circuit judge sustained these claims. The estate of one Gilbal, after the death of Stewart, obtained a judgment against Coate, as survivor of Stewart & Coate, in 1869, and this judgment was presented before the referee, claiming priority over all creditors of the firm because in judgment. This claim as a prior claim was overruled, except as to such property, if any, over which the judgment had lien.

In 1879, Mrs. Stewart died testate, appointing Mrs. Turnipseed her executrix. The plaintiff, Chalmers, was then appointed administrator de bonis non of Robert Stewart, and was substituted as plaintiff in this action. Chalmers, after thus becoming a party plaintiff, with the view to bring the question before the court as to the liability of the estate of Mrs. Stewart for the homestead received by her, filed a petition in re, alleging that the orders by which Mrs. Stewart obtained the homestead were nullities and void, and demanded that the estate of Mrs. Stewart should be held responsible for both the personal property and the $1,000 in place of real estate which she had received under these *orders. Mrs. Turnipseed, executrix of Mrs. Stewart, was made a party defendant, and she pleaded orally (by agreement) res adjudicata and the statute of limitations.

Under this state of facts, and upon a report of the referee, the case was heard by Judge Pressley. 1. As to the homestead, Judge Pressley held that although the orders under which Mrs. Stewart obtained said homestead were manifestly erroneous, yet it having been allowed by the court, and paid out in the progress of the case, from which there was no appeal, and having remained unquestioned for more than six years, and until the death of Mrs. Stewart, that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. 2. That the Harris mortgage should not lose the money, $1,239.15, embezzled by the sheriff; that his note should bear interest at 12 per cent., the interest on the first year's interest to be at 7 per cent. 3. That the claims of the Wrights should be established as against the firm of Stewart & Coate as partnership debts, and that the Gilbal judgment did not have priority over the other creditors of Stewart & Coate, except so far as to any lien it may have acquired over any other property of the firm subject to lien. In other words, that the dissolution of the partnership by the death of one of the parties did not bind the assets under the act relating to intestate estates, entitling judgments to be paid in preference to general debts. The appeal involves the correctness of Judge Pressley's ruling on all of these different points.

First, as to the accountability of the estate of Mrs. Stewart for the personalty valued at $477, assigned to her as a homestead out of personalty, and for the $1,000 paid her out of the proceeds of the home place as a homestead therein. It is very clear that Judge Moses, in ordering the homestead, transcended his jurisdiction, both as to the personalty and the realty, and its allowance to Mrs. Stewart was illegal on several other grounds, yet these orders appear to have been passed by the consent of all parties interested in the matters then before the court, creditors and all. They were passed under a mistake of law, perhaps, that Mrs. Stewart was entitled to a homestead, and no doubt, too, under a belief that the Circuit Court had jurisdiction in such matters. But be that as it may, they were passed by consent, *and they were intended and accepted by all parties, including Mrs. Stewart, as setting apart to her a homestead, such as the law allowed to parties entitled thereto. The property was turned over to her with that understanding, and was so accepted and enjoyed during her life, all parties acquiescing.

Under these circumstances, we think it is too late to change front, and for the creditors, either through themselves or by their representative, the administrator de bonis non, or for any other party to the proceeding, now to claim that the whole thing was a nullity and therefore void from the beginning, and on that account to require the estate of Mrs. Stewart to restore the original status. On the contrary, we must regard the proceeding as legal, so far as it applies to this case, and that it accomplished what all parties desired and intended to accomplish; that it gave Mrs. Stewart a homestead, such as the law provided for widows and children, and the parties on all sides must be estopped from taking any other position. Hand v. Savannah and Charleston R. R. Co., 12 S. C., 314.

Having reached this conclusion, the next question is, the homestead having terminated by the death of Mrs. Stewart, and there being no children, what has become of it? Does it return to the estate of Stewart and become liable to his creditors, or does it descend to his heirs free from the claims of creditors? This is a very important question, and it is one which has never been presented squarely to this court before, nor have we been able to find any authority on the subject elsewhere upon which we can rely. We must, therefore, adjudge the point as our own construction of the constitutional provision on the subject of homesteads and the acts of assembly in reference thereto may demand.

It has been held in several cases recently decided by the court that neither the constitution nor the acts on the subject of homesteads create any new estate different from that already vested in the head of the family; on the contrary, as we have held, their only effect is to exempt certain property from levy and sale without affecting or changing in any way the character of the estate therein. In other words, a certain portion of the property of the head of the family, as it already exists, so far as the estate therein is concerned, is set aside and walled in, so to speak, as a *homestead against invasion by process from any court. This is certainly the extent of the constitutional provision on the subject. See Constitution of 1868, Article II., § 32. No new estate then being created, nor any change being made in the title, interest, or tenure of the head of the family in the exempted property, it would follow that he would hold it, so far as the provision of the constitution is involved, precisely as he would any other of his property, except that this being a homestead it is exempt from enforced sale by court process or order.

But how long is this exemption to continue, supposing the acts of assembly to be as silent on the subject as is the constitution? Upon examination it will be seen that the constitution, it is true, does not in express terms fix a limit to the exemption as to time. The language is, "That the family homestead of the head of any family, &c., shall be exempt, such homestead to consist of the dwelling house, &c." Now although no duration is expressly fixed in this section, yet is it not necessarily limited to the existence of the thing exempted? The exemption depends upon certain conditions and surroundings, to wit, first there must be a head of a family, and, second, there must be a homestead, a dwelling house, a place where the head of a family resides. When these two conditions are present, the constitutional exception as to realty attaches, and as long as they exist the constitution is a perfect shield. But when these conditions, on account of which the exemption has been evolved, cease to exist, does not the exemption cease also? And is not a limit thus necessarily implied in the very nature of the surroundings or conditions which produce the exemption? The exemption is not a privilege or right which every citizen can claim, but it only extends to the heads of families, and it embraces only certain species of property, the homestead or dwelling place. Suppose that these essentials, one or both, are absent, either when the homestead is first claimed or afterwards, can the shield be then interposed? We think not, because the property attempted to be shielded does not occupy the position which the section demands. The section protects a dwelling house of the head of a family, and by the supposition which we have made, the property sought to be protected is not the dwelling house of the head of a family. It may *have been once, and when it was, then the protection could have been invoked, but it is not now, and therefore the protection cannnot be claimed.

This must be so, otherwise there would be discrimination between classes of citizens as to the right of property, while there would be no difference in the relations which they sustained to said property. Why should one, after he ceases to be the head of a family, be entitled to any greater protection than one who has not become the head of a family? What reason is there for the homestead of the one to be exempt from his debts, and not that of the other? There can be none. It would seem to follow from this reasoning that when the constitutional provision is alone considered, the inhibition from enforced sale would terminate when either of the conditions constituting the property a homestead ceased; and the title or estate therein of the party not having been in any way changed or affected, it would be governed by the law of descent, devise, distribution, dower, and sale for payment of debts, as are applicable to any other of his property.

Now, what has been the effect of the acts of assembly on this subject? The constitution provides that the general assembly at their first session shall enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation; and in pursuance of this authority and direction, the general assembly did, at its first session, and at various sessions since, enact laws on the subject, and these acts have gone somewhat further than the terms of the constitution. For instance, there is nothing in the constitution which extends the homestead in terms to the widow and children of the former head of the family. No doubt its spirit and true intent embraced them, however. The general assembly has so interpreted the constitution, and all of the acts have made provision for the widow and children to claim. The first act, the act of 1868, continued the homestead of the head of the family to his widow and minor children, expressly declaring, however, that it was to be held and enjoyed by them until the youngest child became twenty-one years of age, and until the marriage or death of the widow, and that it should be limited to that period. Under this act, a limit being fixed, of course when the event determining that limit happened, the homestead ceased, and the property being freed from this *incumbrance, it fell back to the party to whom it originally belonged, or to the estate, and again became subject to all the laws which governed his other property.

The second act on the subject, "An act to reduce all acts and parts of acts as to homesteads into one act," was approved March 13, 1872. 15 Stat., 229. This act provided in section 4 that the homestead, when assigned as therein directed, should "vest in the heads of the family in fee simple and be freed and discharged from all debts and liabilities whatever so long as he or she shall remain resident of the state, and no longer." It is difficult to say what was intended by this section, but it is not necessary to do this now, because whatever may have been its intent, it applied to the head of the family, and not to his widow and children, and therefore is not involved here. That act, after providing for the head of the family as above, in section 8 further directed that the widow and minor children of any deceased father shall be entitled to the right of the homestead, to be set apart by the Probate Court, but there is nothing said as to the limit, or as to the estate therein of these parties. It was while this act was of force that the order of the Circuit Court was passed allowing Mrs. Stewart, as widow, the homestead in the realty of her husband, and under which the $1,000 was paid her December 10, 1872.

The third act was approved February 22, 1873. This act, after providing for setting apart the homestead to the head of the family, without specifying any limit, or attempting to create or define the estate therein, as was attempted in the act of 1872, further provided, "that if the husband be dead, the widow and children, &c., should be entitled to the exemption in like manner as if the husband or parents were living, the exemption to be subject to partition among all the children of the head of the family in like manner as if no debts existed." It was while this act was of force that the homestead in the personalty was allowed under an order passed April 9, 1873. There has been a subsequent act, the act of 1880, the one now of force, but it has no application here, and need not be considered.

Section 8 of the act of 1872 is the section which applies to the widow and children under that act, as we have already observed. This section does not attempt to create a new estate, *nor in terms to perpetuate or limit the homestead. It simply declares that the widow and children of the deceased father and husband shall be entitled to the right of the homestead, and it provides for setting it off by the Probate Judge. The same principle then by which we have determined that the homestead described in the constitution would cease, after its conditions ceased, and would then fall back to the original estate, subject to the general law governing and controlling the property of the citizen, would apply here, and would hold that the $1,000 (as corpus) should belong to the estate of Robert Stewart on the death of his widow, disencumbered of the homestead, there being no children surviving. Having been set apart, however, to her as a homestead, by the consent of all parties, she had the right to enjoy it as such, and therefore the annual interest or income was hers. Nor should her estate be held responsible for any diminution in the corpus occasioned by the legitimate use thereof or any loss or destruction not the result of fault on her part.

The personal property, valued at $477.15, was set apart to her in kind under the act of 1873, and under that act was subject to partition among the children, but in this case there are no surviving children. Had there been, another difficult question would have been presented. Section 2 of this act does provide that when the homestead is set off, as the act directs, to the head of the family, it shall be forever discharged from all debts of said debtor then existing, or thereafter to be contracted. This provision is also found in the act of 1880, but it is not in the act of 1872. What effect this section will have on homesteads set off under the act now of force has not been considered here. There is nothing in this act which gave the widow any greater right than simply to enjoy the homestead, and she had this right to the fullest extent during her life, and at her death the property in kind fell back as she left it, impaired or consumed, if consumed, in its lawful use, as it might be.

Next, should the Harris mortgage be credited with the $1,239.15, lost by the sheriff? This mortgage covered the entire corner lot, and was entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of said lot, prior to any other claim except dower. But there could be no payment, either in whole or in part, until said proceeds *reached the hands of the mortgagee, either in person or by his agent. It is very certain that this mortgage was never paid to Harris himself. Was the sheriff his agent in such sense as that his receipt, under the circumstances, was the receipt of Harris? In Sims et al., creditors of Rochelle, v. Campbell and Chambers, 1 McCord Eq., 53 [16 Am. Dec. 595], it was held that the sheriff was the agent of the plaintiff in an execution for certain purposes, but he is also the agent of the law, and the plaintiff is no further bound by his acts than as they come within the scope of his authority. In O'Neall v. Lusk, 1 Bail, 220, the sheriff received a sum of money from a defendant in execution, taking his receipt, to be applied to the executions in his office. The plaintiff's execution was the oldest, and the amount received was more than sufficient to satisfy it, but the sheriff failed to apply the money, and went out of office leaving plaintiff's execution open. Upon the question whether the defendant was entitled to a credit, the court said upon the facts there could be no doubt about it; that the sheriff having plaintiff's execution in his hands, he was clearly entitled to receive the money, and having done so the defendant was discharged, and the plaintiff should look to the sheriff and his sureties.

Now, if the sheriff in the case below had been acting under an execution of Harris, lodged by him, to make the money, then in receiving it by virtue of such execution he would have been the agent of Harris, and of Harris alone; and this act being within the pale of the authority delegated by Harris, would have been in substance the act of Harris. In such case the two cases, supra, would have applied. But the proceeding under which the property here was sold, was in the nature of a creditor's bill. It was sold for the benefit of all claimants, according to their respective rights. The proceeds were in the hands of the court awaiting an order of distribution. While in this condition the sum in question was lost by act of an officer of court, and before the court had determined finally as to the application. Under such a state of facts it cannot be said that the sheriff was the agent of Harris. Nor can Harris be held responsible on account of negligence, as there is no testimony in that direction.

As to the claim of the Wrights. The two latest cases on this *subject are Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C., 527, and Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C., 72. In these cases the doctrine applied was that where a creditor takes an obligation of an inferior or equal rank with the old debt, whether it shall be regarded as payment or renewal, is a question of fact depending upon the intention of the parties, the burden of proof being upon the debtor. In the case, however, of Gardner v. Hust, 2 Rich., 608, it was held, "that in general the taking of a higher security is an extinguishment of the lower, provided the higher security is accepted as satisfaction, and if not so accepted, then it is merely additional or cumulative security for the same debt," referring to 1 Mason, 505. And in the absence of proof to the contrary, the authorities seem to favor the notion that the law will imply the higher security was in satisfaction of the inferior.

The difference between the two classes seems to be that the taking of an equal or inferior security raises a question of fact, with the burden of proof on the debtor; while, when a higher security is taken, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, the law will imply a payment. In the case below a higher security was taken, to wit, sealed notes signed by Stewart and Coate in their individual names, in the place of promissory notes in the name of the firm, which last notes were given up; and there was an absence of all testimony as to a different intent. Under the case of Gardner v. Hust, supra, the law implies a payment, and the Circuit judge having held otherwise, we think his ruling was error.

The appeal of the administrator of Gilbal cannot be sustained. One creditor has no priority over another in the assets of their debtor, except in cases of intestacy, or where he has secured a lien. The debt of Gilbal did not occupy either of these positions as to the assets of the firm of Stewart & Coate. Although both of the partners were dead as individuals, and intestate, yet it cannot be said that the copartnership was intestate. It is by special act that debts of an intestate are paid in a certain order; but this does not apply to the distribution of the assets of a dissolved or extinct copartnership. The Circuit judge ruled that the judgment of Gilbal should only have preference in such property as it covered with a lien. This, we think, was correct.

*It is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be modified as herein, and that the case be remanded to be enforced in accordance with the principles herein announced.

21 S. C. 143

HAGOOD v. RILEY.

[Action ⇐70.]

Complaint was filed and answer made, and nothing more was done in the cause by either party for ten years, when plaintiff gave defendant notice that he would press for trial at the ensuing term; whereupon defendant gave notice of a motion to strike the case from the calendar, on the ground that the action had abated by reason of plaintiff's laches. The Circuit judge ruled that the plaintiff was out of court, and gave judgment of dismissal. Held, that this ruling was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pudigon v. Goblet, 24 S. C. 477, 479.

For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 754; Dec. Dig. ⇐70.]

Before Pressley, J., Barnwell, April, 1883.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Robert Aldrich, for appellant.

Mr. John R. Bellinger, contra.

April 14th, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Proceedings were instituted in April, 1873, in the name of the plaintiff, late commissioner in equity for Barnwell county, to foreclose a mortgage on real estate situate in said county. The mortgage was executed in 1853, and the defendant, Lancaster, being in possession, as a purchaser from an intermediate purchaser, was made a party, by service upon him of the summons and complaint. Lancaster answered on April 25th, 1873.

The case remained in this condition without further proceeding until in 1883, when Mr. Robert Aldrich, as attorney for plaintiff (Mr. Hay, the attorney who instituted the proceeding, having in the meantime died), gave notice to Mr. Bellinger, the attorney of Lancaster, that the case would be pressed for trial at the ensuing *April term of the court, i. e., April, 1883. Up to this time no attorney had been regularly substituted in the place of Mr. Hay, nor had the case been placed on any calendar. In response to the notice, Mr. Bellinger gave notice that he would move at the same term to strike the case from the calendar, on the ground that the action had abated by reason of the laches of the plaintiff, and could only be revived by supplemental complaint, by leave of the court first had, &c., with notice also of other motions, should this fail.

The questions raised by these notices were heard by Judge Pressley, who passed the following order: "It is adjudged that the plaintiff is out of court, and it is therefore ordered that the cause be stricken from the docket, with ten dollars' costs of motion." From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

In support of the appeal, the appellant relies upon section 276 of the code; and in opposition, the respondent relies upon subdivision 4 of section 296. It devolves upon us to determine the application of these sections and their effect upon the case. Section 276 provides that, "in all issues to be tried by the court or a jury, the plaintiff shall, at least fourteen days before the court, file in the clerk's office the summons and complaint in the cause, endorsing thereon the nature of the issue and the number of the docket upon which the same shall be placed; and if the plaintiff fail so to do, the defendant, seven days before the court, may file copies of said papers with a like endorsement, and the clerk shall thereupon place said cause upon its appropriate docket, and it shall stand for trial without any further notice of trial or notice of issue." Subdivision 4 of section 296 provides that "the court may dismiss the complaint with costs in favor of one or more defendants in case of unreasonable neglect on the part of the plaintiff to serve the summons on other defendants, or to proceed in the cause against the defendant, or defendants, served."

Neither of these sections fixes the time within which after action commenced the case shall be placed upon some calendar of the court. The first simply provides that to have case placed on a calendar by the plaintiff, he must, at least fourteen days before the court, file in the clerk's office the summons and complaint, endorsing thereon the nature of the action and the number of the *calendar upon which it is to be docketed; and if the plaintiff fails to do this, the defendant may do it seven days before the court. But there is no limit prescribed as to the time within which this must be done, with forfeiture of the right if not done. The second authorizes the court to dismiss the complaint for unreasonable delay in proceeding with the case.

There is nothing in either of these sections which is conclusive of the question raised here. The Circuit judge, in his order appealed from, dismissed the complaint because, in his judgment, the plaintiff was out of court, on account of the delay in having the cause docketed. There is nothing in section 276 which declares that failure to docket within a prescribed time after action begun puts a party out of court; on the contrary, that section provides a mode by which delay, if objected to by either party, may be prevented. Either party may have the cause docketed and the trial had by pursuing the directions given in this section. Nor does failure by plaintiff to proceed after docketing his cause, or after service of summons on the defendant, of necessity have this effect of putting the plaintiff out of court, under section 296. That section only provides that the court may dismiss the complaint in case of unreasonable neglect to have the summons served on all of the parties, or to proceed against those served. The Circuit judge seems to have based his order dismissing the complaint upon the legal conclusion that the plaintiff was out of court. Neither of the sections which we have considered sustains this conclusion.

Is there any other principle connected with the practice, either old or new, which may be invoked in support of such a conclusion? The cases of Bennett v. Calhoun Association, 9 Rich. Eq., 166, and Jeannerett v. Radford, Rich. Eq. Cas., 470, are referred to by counsel on both sides. At the time these cases were heard, certain acts were of force intended to dispatch business in the Court of Chancery, viz., the acts of 1784, 1789, and 1810. The first act provided that suits in that court should be finally decided within one year after action brought, unless upon cause shown the time should be extended. The second extended this time to three years; and by the last the court was authorized to continue causes for a longer period

In the first of these cases the court said that they were "well satisfied with the observations of Chancellor Harper [in the second case, Jeannerett v. Radford], 'that according to uniform practice of the court the cause is not regarded as ipso facto out of court, although the directions [in the acts above] may not have been strictly observed.' It is not declared by the act that if the cause be not decided within that time, it shall be ipso facto at an end and out of court. The law of 1784 directs the cause to be finally decided within one year, unless for satisfactory cause shown. Under that act, a party defendant might have had the bill dismissed for want of prosecution, unless for satisfactory cause shown to the contrary: or it would have been in the power of the court, of its own motion, and after the cause was docketed, if the parties delayed their proceeding, to strike off the cause, or make such order as would be a final decision; or it might refuse to proceed further against the defendant; or might set aside a decree improvidently entered against him. But these directions of the act should be, and have been always, construed to subserve the purposes of justice, and not to take advantage of inadvertence or misapprehension. As is remarked by Chancellor Harper, if such motion be not made by the party defendant, being in court, this may be held evidence of consent on his part; and it may be added that if no order be entered by the court, it may be inferred that the court thought that the delay was reasonable."

These remarks are applicable to this case. Under section 276, supra, if the defendant had desired to bring the case to trial and have it ended, he might have done so at any time after issue joined by giving the seven days' notice as therein provided. Or before the case was placed on the calendar by the plaintiff, or after, he might have proceeded under section 296, and moved to dismiss the complaint for unreasonable delay. He failed to adopt either of these modes; in fact, took no action until he was notified fourteen days before the court by the plaintiff that the case would be pressed for trial at the ensuing term. He thereupon gave notice that he, at the same term, would move to dismiss for unreasonable delay. The Circuit judge did not pass upon the *question of unreasonable delay as a ground for dismissal; but seems to have held that the plaintiff was out of court as matter of law. In this we think there was error; and for that reason the case must be remanded.

Whether the facts, when presented, will make out a case of unreasonable, or, on the other hand, of excusable delay, is a matter for the Circuit judge, which, under section 296, supra, he is empowered to consider. All that we decide is, that we do not regard that the plaintiff was ipso facto out of court upon the facts as they appear in the "Case" submitted to us.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded.

HUGGINS v. OLIVER.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Judgment ⇐688.]

In action by a purchaser of an intestate's lands under judgment obtained against the administrator, such judgment is conclusive upon the heirs at law, of their intestate's indebtedness, and of all issues involved in that adjudication.

[2. Judgment ⇐303.]

Under a judgment against an administrator, which technically was not in proper form, the lands of the intestate were sold, and the purchaser brought action against the heirs for a recovery of such land. A few days before the trial, the plaintiff, on ex parte application to the Circuit judge at chambers, with consent of the administrator, obtained order amending the judgment according to the right of the case. Held, that the amendment was properly allowed and related back to the sale of the land.

[3. Descent and Distribution ⇐130.]

Lands of an intestate may be sold under a judgment recovered against his administrator upon a debt of the intestate, but if the lands have passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs before the judgment was recovered, they cannot be sold under such judgment. Cases reviewed.

Partition is conclusive evidence of actual possession under a claim of exclusive right asserted by the heirs, but it is not the only evidence. Such claim may be shown by other facts and circumstances.

[5. Judgment ⇐707.]

A purchaser of the lands of an intestate under judgment against the administrator, brought action against the widow of intestate, and the vendee of such purchaser recovered the possession. Action was then brought by the widow and other heirs of intestate against *such vendee for the recovery of this land. Held, that the widow was estopped by the judgment had in the action against her, but that the others were not, they not being parties or privies.

Before Pressley, J., Marion, October, 1883.

This was an action by Mary A. Huggins and others, heirs at law of Neal C. Huggins, against William A. Oliver, commenced September 20, 1881, for the recovery of a tract of land.

The facts are all stated in the opinion. The Circuit judge charged the jury that notwithstanding the errors in the Elvington judgment and execution against the administrator, Rogers, the levy and sale under them of the lands of the intestate, Neal C. Huggins, were effectual to convey title to the purchaser against his heirs at law, the plaintiffs, and that the said judgment and execution had been properly amended; that the lands in possession of the plaintiffs as heirs at law, although claimed and used by them as their own, were subject to levy and sale under a judgment and execution against the administrator of the estate of their ancestor obtained in an action to which said heirs were not made parties, and of which they had no notice; that the plaintiffs, as heirs at law, were estopped from setting up title against the purchaser at such sale, and that no length of possession by them would enable them to hold or claim title to the said land by reason of the statute of limitations against the defendant in this case; that heirs at law can never hold adversly against creditors of ancestor until partition, and that the separate possession of a part of the land by one of the plaintiffs, N. C. Huggins, as his share of same, amounted to nothing, because the defendant was not in possession of that part of the land.

The jury under this charge found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Messrs. Blue & Walsh, for appellants.

The judgment in Elvington v. Rogers, administrator, was against Rogers individually and did not authorize an execution against the property of the intestate. 2 Strob., 3; 8 Rich., 345; 16 S. C., 64. The execution was directed against Rogers indi*vidually, and could not be levied on property of intestate. Freem. Exec., § 43, and authorities supra. The defects in this judgment were more than mere irregularities, and the order of the Circuit judge amending the same not having been made upon the motion of a party to the proceedings in which it was recovered, within a reasonable time and before it was satisfied, was without authority of law and too late to affect the title of the plaintiffs. 16 S. C., 64; 1 Mill Con. R., 133; 1 Hill, 167, 209. Heirs in possession of descended real estate for the statutory period may claim title by virtue of the statute of limitations against a purchaser at sheriff's sale under a judgment and execution against an executor or administrator. 2 Bay, 156, 339; Rice Eq., 373; Speer Eq., 250. The statute applies to an action against heirs and devisees to subject real estate in their possession to a debt of their ancestor or devisor. Bail. Eq., 437; Rice Eq. 387; 9 S. C., 430; and also to actions against legatees to subject personalty in their hands to the payment of debts. 2 Hill, 522; 2 Hill Ch., 496; Bail. Eq., 437; 9 S. C., 430. Heirs in possession are not bound by a judgment against an administrator. 2 Hill Ch., 257; Speer Eq., 250; 9 S. C., 430; 19 Id., 160. Lands in the actual and exclusive possession of heirs are not subject to levy and sale under a judgment and execution against an administrator. 2 Hill, 579; Speer Eq., 250.

Messrs. W. W. Harllee and C. A. Woods, contra.

It matters not to whom the dower was released, and the widow of N. C. Huggins has never claimed it, and there was no bar to a recovery on the note for the purchase money. The judgment was simply an adjudication of the issues and was against Rogers as administrator, as in 1 Brev., 289, which was a case like this. There was no defence to the action. See 6 S. C., 356. The fifth exception raises a point that has been settled for eighty years. 6 S. C., 356. In the cases cited contra, the actions were against the heirs, or there were other circumstances varying the case. See cases cited in 6 S. C., 356. There was no partition here to show exclusive possession. 4 McCord, 128. There was not ten years from Rogers' purchase until the plaintiffs were ousted.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The tract of land, which is the subject matter of controversy in this action, formerly belonged to Giles Elvington, who, on September 1, 1860, sold and conveyed the same to Neal C. Huggins, who immediately went into possession and held the same until August, 1864, when he died intestate, leaving as his heirs at law his widow and children, who are the plaintiffs in this action. Subsequently to Huggins' death said Elvington recovered a judgment against Robert R. Rogers, as administrator, on a note of Neal C. Huggins, payable on January 1, 1862, to said Elvington for $586, "when Ann Eliza Elvington assigns her dower, and not until then," the declaration alleging "that Ann Eliza Elvington, wife of Giles Elvington, did renounce her dower as required by the terms of said note." The judgment was signed and the execution lodged on December 10, 1869. The informalities in this judgment and execution are set out in the "Case," but need not be stated here.

Under this execution the land in dispute was levied on by the sheriff and sold in September, 1870, at which sale one Barfield Rogers became the purchaser, and after receiving titles he brought an action against the widow alone, one of the plaintiffs in this action, to recover possession, in which he recovered judgment against her and issued his writ of habere facias possessionem, but he does not seem to have taken any steps towards enforcing the same. Subsequently the land was sold by the sheriff under an execution against said Barfield Rogers and bought by one Clawson T. Page, who received titles from the sheriff and an assignment from said Barfield Rogers of the said writ of habere facias possessionem, under which the plaintiffs, who had been in possession ever since the death of Neal C. Huggins, were ejected by the sheriff on December 30, 1879. The said Page afterwards conveyed a portion of the said tract of land to the defendant, of which he is now in possession.

It also appeared in evidence on the trial that one of the plaintiffs, H. J. Huggins, "with the consent of all the others, went into possession of a portion of the land, and held and cultivated the same for more than ten years before they were all ejected by the sheriff, and that said portion of said land so held by H. J. *Huggins was regarded by them at the time as his fair share of the whole;" but the land so held by H. J. Huggins was not embraced in that portion of the tract of which the defendant is in possession. It also appeared that H. J. Huggins had, on December 24, 1879, signed a written lease, acknowledging tenancy to Clawson T. Page, and agreeing to surrender possession to said Page on or before March 20, 1880, about which time he did surrender possession to Page.

The defendant at the trial introduced an order made at chambers a few days before the trial amending the judgment in the case of Elvington v. Rogers, as administrator of Neal C. Huggins, which order was made without notice to the plaintiffs herein, but with the consent of the administrator, Rogers.

The plaintiffs proposed to offer testimony showing that the note upon which the judgment in favor of Elvington v. Rogers, administrator of Neal C. Huggins, was based, was given for the balance due on the purchase money of the land; that it was not payable until the dower was renounced, which had never been done, and that the note had in fact been paid by Neal C. Huggins. The Circuit judge rejected the proposed testimony, "holding that the Elvington judgment against the administrator of Huggins could not be thus impeached; that the sale under it was effectual to convey title to the purchaser under whom defendant claims, and that plaintiffs were estopped from setting up title in themselves against him."

Various propositions were presented by the plaintiffs as embodying the law applicable to the case, but as they were not all made the basis of exceptions to the rulings of the Circuit judge, it is not necessary to set them out here; but it will be sufficient to state the exceptions which present the only questions which are before us for decision. The exceptions are as follows:

1. "Because his honor erred in ruling that notwithstanding the fact the note on which the judgment against the administrator was obtained, was, on its face, payable only after the wife of payee should relinquish her dower, and the relinquishment was in fact made to widow of intestate, drawer of said note, the purchaser had a good title against the heirs of intestate.

2 "Because his honor erred in ruling that the judgment hav*ing been entered against the administrator as such, and not against the property of intestate, a sale under it was effectual to convey title to the purchaser, and plaintiffs were estopped thereby from setting up title in themselves.

3. "Because his honor erred in holding that the judgment was properly amended at the trial term of this action by consent of administrator, and without notice to the plaintiffs.

4. "Because his honor erred in ruling out testimony offered by plaintiffs, tending to show that the note on which the judgment was obtained had, in fact, been paid before action brought upon the same.

5. "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that lands in possession of heirs at law, claimed and used by them as their own, could legally be levied upon and sold under a judgment and execution against an administrator, they, the heirs, not being parties to nor having notice of the proceedings instituted to obtain such judgment.

6. "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that no length of possession by heirs at law would enable them to hold or claim title to lands by reason of the statute of limitations against a purchaser at sheriff's sale under a judgment and execution against an administrator, on a debt due by the ancestor and intestate."

The questions made by these exceptions may be stated as follows: 1. Was there error in excluding the testimony proposed by plaintiffs for the purpose of showing that Elvington was not entitled to recover in the action against Rogers as administrator of Neal C. Huggins, by reason of the fact that the dower of his wife had not been properly renounced, or by reason of the fact that the note had been paid by N. C. Huggins in his life-time? 2. As to the effect of the informality in the judgment and execution under which the land was sold, and the subsequent amendment thereof? 3. Was there error in the charge of the judge respecting the rights of a purchaser at sheriff's sale, under an execution against an administrator of an intestate, of lands in the possession of the heirs of such intestate as against said heirs?

We do not think that there was any error in excluding the testimony proposed to be offered by the plaintiffs for the purpose of *showing that Elvington was not entitled to recover in his action against the administrator of the intestate, Neal C. Huggins. The issues proposed to be raised by such testimony were concluded by the judgment in that action. If there was any valid defence to the note sued upon, it was the duty of the administrator to interpose such defence, and if he culpably neglected such duty, he may be liable to the parties interested, but the plaintiff in that action cannot thereby be deprived of any rights which he acquired by such judgment, one of which was the right to sell under such judgment the lands of his intestate debtor, unless they had been partitioned amongst his heirs, or had otherwise gone into their exclusive possession. To that action the heirs were neither necessary nor proper parties, and the administrator being the only necessary and proper party, all the issues which arose, or could have been presented in that action, are concluded by the judgment therein. Fraser & Dill v. City Council of Charleston, 19 S. C., 384.

It will be observed that the question presented here is not like that in Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. C., 160, where a creditor under a proceeding to marshal assets is called in to prove his demand, and presents it in the form of a judgment recovered in an action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate, to which the heirs were not, but could have been, made parties; nor is it a case in which a creditor is seeking to subject lands in the hands of the heirs to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, as in Gillilland & Howell v. Caldwell, 1 S. C., 194, in both of which cases the heirs would have the right to contest the validity of the debt upon which the judgment was recovered against the administrator. Here the question is as to the validity of a sale of the land of an intestate under a judgment recovered against his administrator in an action to which the heirs were neither necessary nor proper parties, and in such a case, following, as we are bound to do, the long line of authorities from D'Urphey v. Nelson, 1 Brev., 289, decided in 1803, down to Rogers v. Huggins, 6 S. C., 356, decided in 1874, we must hold that such a judgment is conclusive of all issues which were or might have been raised in the action in which it was recovered; and as the issues proposed to be raised by the testimony which was excluded were of that class *manifestly, it is quite clear that there was no error in excluding the proposed testimony.

Our next inquiry is as to the effect of the irregularities in the judgment and execution and of the subsequent amendment thereof. It appears from a certified copy of the judgment introduced at the argument here, by consent, that the judgment was in favor of Giles Elvington and against "R. R. Rogers, administrator of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of Neal C. Huggins, deceased, the defendant," and the ideo consideratum est is, "that the said plaintiff do recover, against the said defendant the damages so found as aforesaid, and also seventy-five dollars for his costs, &c., which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to seven hundred and eighty-five dollars and twenty-two cents, to be levied of the goods and chattels, lands, tenements, hereditaments and other real estate which were of Neal C. Huggins, deceased, in the hands, possession, and control of the defendant, R. R. Rogers, the administrator, or otherwise." And the order to amend was that the following words be inserted in the judgment, viz.: "To be levied of the goods, chattels, lands, tenements, and real estate which were of Neal C. Huggins, deceased, in the hands, possession, and control of the defendant, R. R. Rogers, his administrator, or otherwise," which words, substantially, seem already to have been embraced in the judgment.

It also appears from a certified copy of the execution, which was likewise presented by consent at the argument here, that the sheriff was therein commanded, "that of the goods, chattels, houses, and lands, and other hereditaments and real estates of Robert R. Rogers, administrator of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits which were of Neal C. Huggins, the defendant, you cause to be levied the sum of seven hundred and eighty-five dollars and twenty-two cents, * * * if he have so much of the goods and chattels, houses, lands, and other hereditaments and real estates of the said Neal C. Huggins, in his hands to be administered, or if he have not, then you cause the said debt, damages, costs, and charges to be levied of the proper goods and chattels, houses, lands, and other hereditaments of the said Robert R. Rogers."

*The plaintiffs contend that the defects in the judgment and execution amounted to more than mere irregularities and made them void, or at least that they furnished no sufficient authority for the sale of the land of the intestate; and that the order of the Circuit judge granting leave to amend, not having been made upon the motion of a party to the action in which the judgment was recovered, within a reasonable time, was without authority of law, and too late to affect the title to the land sold under such judgment. We think the following authorities show that these positions cannot be maintained: D'Urphey v. Nelson, 1 Brev., 289; Hubbell v. Fogartie, 1 Hill, 167 [26 Am. Dec. 163]; Giles v. Pratt, 1 Hill, 239 [26 Am. Dec. 170] recognized as late as 1866 in Ashmore v. Charles, 14 Rich., 65. In D'Urphey v. Nelson, an amendment similar to the one made in this case was suggested by the court itself in the opinion granting a new trial. And in Giles v. Pratt a similar amendment was allowed at the trial term of the action brought by the purchaser at sheriff's sale to recover the land twelve years after the judgment was recovered, and upwards of eleven years after the sheriff's sale, the judgment having been recovered in October, 1820, the sheriff's deed being dated April 14, 1821, and the trial having taken place at fall term, 1832. As is said in Hubbell v. Fogartie: "It is every day's practice to permit judgments and executions to be amended according to the right of the case, even after a sale under execution;" and these remarks are substantially repeated in Giles v. Pratt.

The authorities relied on by the plaintiffs do not sustain their position. Tobin v. Addison, 2 Strob., 3, was an action of trespass for seizing a bale of cotton belonging to the plaintiff under an execution issued by a magistrate to enforce a judgment rendered by him in favor of one Sauls against "Jabez G. Brown, guardian of Miss Owens," the execution commanding the levy of the goods and chattels of Miss Owens. The court held that the execution was void and altogether unauthorized by the judgment; that Miss Owens could not be made liable without the service of summons upon her, and her appearance by guardian, neither of which was done; and that the debt, though contracted for blacksmith work done on the planation, was not her debt, but the debt of her guardian, with whom the contract had been *made. It is manifest that this case, in which the court had never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the party against whom the execution was issued, differs very materially from the case under consideration.

In Beazley v. Dunn, 8 Rich., 345, the action was trover to recover damages for the conversion of a mule, the property of the plaintiff. It seems that the plaintiff, as administrator of Youngblood, had been sued before a magistrate in two cases, on debts contracted by his intestate, and judgments were recovered against him. Upon these judgments the magistrate issued executions, in which the plaintiff was styled "administrator," and under these executions the defendant, a constable, sold the mule in controversy. The court said that the only question in the case was whether the executions had been issued in conformity with the judgments; and as they were not, the court held that the executions furnished no authority for making the levy or sale. In that case no question as to the right to amend was raised, and nothing was said about it.

So, too, in Small v. Small, 16 S. C., 64, no question as to the right to amend was raised, and in that case stress was laid upon the fact that it did not appear from the proceedings that Mary Small, under whose judgment the land in question had been sold, had sought to obtain a judgment which would bind the estate of her deceased husband. In that case the language of the court is as follows: "Her complaint was against the conduct of the executors. The character of her cause of action would seem to indicate that her purpose was to obtain precisely such a judgment as was rendered against Uriah Small and John S. Small as individuals; but be that as it may, she cannot claim want of notice as an innocent purchaser. She was the plaintiff in execution, and is fairly chargeable with knowledge of the terms of her own process."

The case of Mooney v. Welsh, 1 Mill Con. R., 133, does not decide that five years would be a bar to a motion to amend. Judge Cheves, in delivering the opinion of the court, simply suggests that period, in analogy to the period then fixed by law as a statutory bar to an action to recover real estate, but expressly says that nothing is intended to be decided as to that point. *There is a case—Surtell ads. Brailsford, 2 Bay., 333—which holds that a motion to set aside a judgment, after the lapse of twelve years from its entry, will not be entertained. But setting aside a judgment is a very different thing from amending it so as to conform to the real facts as presented in the record and to effect substantial justice; and, as we have seen, in the case of Giles v. Pratt, supra, the court did grant an order to amend a judgment twelve years after it had been entered, under almost the identical circumstances presented by this case.

The only remaining inquiry is, assuming that the judgment and execution were in proper form, and that the sale was in other respects legal, did it divest the title of the heirs at law of Neal C. Huggins, who were in possession at the time the sale took place? There can be no doubt that ever since the case of D'Urphey v. Nelson, 1 Brev., 289, it has been uniformly held in this state that the lands of an intestate may be sold under a judgment recovered against the administrator, upon a debt of the intestate, although the heirs, to whom the title of the land had descended, were not parties to the action in which such judgment was recovered. In that case, however, nothing but the general proposition above stated was decided, and the facts of the case did not call for the statement of any qualification or exception to the general rule. In that case it did not appear that the heir had ever been in possession of the land, and the presumption is that he certainly was not in possession at the time of the sale under the judgment; because the action was brought by the heir to recover possession from the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, and if he had been in possession at the time of such sale, and desired to contest the right of such purchaser, the action would have been brought against, instead of being brought by, the heir. So, too, in the case of Martin v. Latta, 4 McCord, 128, it did not appear that the heirs had ever been in possession, and in fact the court, while recognizing the decision in D'Urphey v. Nelson, seemed to consider that the only question in the case was whether the fact that there was sufficient personal property to pay the debts would take the case out of the general rule.

In Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill, 579, the court was for the first time called upon to consider whether there were any qualifications *or exceptions to the general rule laid down in D'Urphey v. Nelson, and it was there held that after the lands had been partitioned, and those of the heirs to whom they had been allotted had sold them to a third person, such lands could not be sold under a judgment recovered against the executors, after such partition was made. In Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq., 250, the court went a step further, and held that where the heirs had been in the exclusive possession of the lands of an intestate, and had exercised acts of ownership over them, the same are not liable to levy and sale under an execution against the administrator, notwithstanding the fact that no regular partition had been made.

The facts of this case are important in the consideration of the question decided by it, and will therefore be briefly stated. The intestate died in 1828, and his administrator leased the land for two years, receiving the rent. In 1830 the heirs took possession, and held the same until the winter, or spring, of 1842, sometimes occupying it themselves, and at other times renting it out. In January, 1842, the widow of intestate applied to the ordinary to have partition made, and when the parties met at the ordinary's office for the purpose, the defendant, who was a joint owner of the land in question with the intestate, claimed the whole of it under the terms of some contract with intestate. This seems to have broken up the attempt then made for partition, and in April, 1842, the interest of the intestate was levied on and sold, under a judgment recovered by the defendant, on December 17, 1832, in an action against the administrator on a note of intestate, which was barred by the statute of limitations before the action was commenced. There was, however, another judgment against the intestate in favor of one Dobbin, recovered in 1828, upon which, however, there does not seem to have been any execution having active energy. At the sheriff's sale the defendant became the purchaser, and took a deed from the sheriff in April, 1842. The bill was then filed for partition, which was resisted by the defendant upon the ground that the title of complainants as heirs at law of the intestate was divested by the sheriff's sale, and that under that sale he had an absolute estate in the entire premises. Chancellor Dunkin, on Circuit, held that the exclusive possession by the heirs for such a length of time, even though *there had been no actual partition, was sufficient to defeat the right of a creditor to sell the land under the judgment against the administrator, and he therefore ordered the sheriff's sale set aside and a writ of partition to issue. On appeal, the same Chancellor delivered the opinion of the court, and after saying that the court concurred in the Circuit decree, added that the cause of action upon which the judgment was recovered being barred by the statute of limitations, it was the duty of the administrator to have pleaded the statute, and it constituted no claim against the heirs.

The last case is Rogers v. Huggins, 6 S. C., 356, in which it was held that the mere fact that the heirs of an intestate were in possession of the land would not defeat the right of a creditor to have the same sold under a judgment obtained against the administrator upon a debt of the intestate.

It seems to us that the rule to be deduced from the foregoing cases is this: that while, as a general proposition, it is true that lands of an intestate may be sold under a judgment recovered against the administrator upon a debt of the intestate, yet, if the lands have passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs before the judgment has been recovered, and before any lien has thus been fixed upon them, they can no longer be sold under such judgment, and can only be reached by the usual proceeding to subject real estate in the hands of the heir to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, to which proceeding the heir would, of course, be a necessary party. Without this qualification of the general rule stated in D'Urphey v. Nelson, it would be impossible to reconcile the various decisions to which we have referred, but with it the cases may all be harmonized. Certainly, after partition, lands of the intestate cannot be sold under a judgment against the administrator, as seems to be conceded in Rogers v. Huggins, which has gone further than any other case.

But it is manifest from the reasoning of O'Neall, J., in Jones v. Wightman, and Dunkin, Ch., in Bird v. Houze, that there is no inherent virtue or efficacy in the fact of partition, but that fact simply affords conclusive evidence of the further fact that the heirs have taken and asserted their right to the exclusive possession of the lands, without regard to the claims of creditors or any *supposed rights of the administrator to subject the lands to the payment of debts. If it were otherwise, then the case of a single heir, where partition is impossible, would be indeed an unfortunate one; but as Chancellor Dunkin well says: "Partition can give no right to several heirs which a single heir would not have without partition." The language of Judge O'Neall, that if the lands "are not in the exclusive, actual possession of the heir entitled to them, they would also be liable to execution on a judgment recovered against the executors or administrators," shows that he did not regard the fact of partition as necessary.

The real inquiry is one of fact. Does the evidence show that, before the judgment was recovered and the lien fixed upon the land, the heirs had taken actual possession under a claim of exclusive right? This may be shown not only by proof of actual partition, but also by other facts and circumstances. For example, in this very case, if the jury believed that, before the judgment was recovered, the heirs had undertaken to make a partial partition by setting off to one of them, H. J. Huggins, such a portion as was regarded his full share of the whole, this would constitute strong evidence that they then asserted an exclusive right to the land, without regard to the claims of creditors or any right of the administrator to subject it to the payment of debts. The fact that the defendant is not in possession of the particular portion allotted to H. J. Huggins, could not affect the question as to whether such partial partition furnished sufficient evidence that the heirs then asserted their exclusive right to the lands of their ancestor. We think, therefore, that the fifth ground of appeal is well taken. But if the judgment was recovered and a lien thereby fixed upon the lands, before they passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs, such lien would follow the lands when they so passed into the hands of the heirs, and could be enforced against them, unless the heirs have had possession for a sufficient length of time to protect them, under the decisions in McRaa v. Smith, 2 Bay., 339; Lamar v. Raysor, 7 Rich., 509.

The plaintiffs not having made the refusal of the Circuit judge to charge the second proposition submitted by them the basis of any of their exceptions or grounds of appeal, the question pre*sented by that proposition is not, strictly speaking, properly before us. But as the rule is that the judgment below must be affirmed if there is any ground upon which it can be sustained, and as the judgment in this case could be sustained if the Circuit judge was right in refusing to charge that proposition, it becomes necessary for us to consider it. The question presented by that proposition is whether the judgment recovered by Barfield Rogers against Mary A. Huggins (6 S. C., 356,) can affect the rights of the plaintiffs herein other than the said Mary A. Huggins. They were not parties to that case, and they are not privies of any party thereto. And hence it is perfectly clear that the judgment in that case is not binding upon them, although it is equally clear that Mary A. Huggins is bound thereby and is estopped from setting up any claim against the defendant herein, who claims under Barfield Rogers, the plaintiff in that action.

The only effect that judgment can have, so far as the other plaintiffs are concerned, is as authority for the legal proposition which it decided, and that was, as we have seen, that the mere fact that the heirs were in possession would not be sufficient to defeat the right of the judgment creditor to sell the land under the execution obtained against the administrator. But it does not decide, and could not have decided, the question raised in this case as to whether the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs in this case was sufficient to show that, before judgment was recovered against the administrator, the heirs had taken such actual and exclusive possession of the land as would exempt it from liability to levy and sale under the judgment against the administrator. In the former case no evidence whatever was adduced by the defendant, and the question came up on a motion for nonsuit, which was granted by the Circuit judge solely on the ground that, "as the heirs were in possession, the judgment and execution did not authorize the sheriff to make the levy and sale and convey the estate to the plaintiff;" and all that the Supreme Court adjudged was that the Circuit judge in that case erred in granting the non-suit. While, therefore, the judgment in the former case is conclusive against Mary A. Huggins, one of the plaintiffs herein, upon the principle of res adjudicata, it can have *no such effect so far as the other plaintiffs herein are concerned, and the jury should have been so instructed.

The sixth ground of appeal is taken under a misapprehension of the charge of the Circuit judge. He did not charge that no length of possession by the heirs would enable them to claim title under the statute of limitations against a purchaser at sheriff's sale under a judgment against the administrator; but his charge was that the heirs can never hold adversely against the creditors of their ancestor until partition. The question, therefore, intended to be raised by this ground of appeal is not properly before us; though from what we have said it follows necessarily that actual partition would not be necessary, but would only serve as conclusive evidence of the essential fact that the heirs had taken actual and exclusive possession, which, however, might be established by other evidence.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

HAND v. SAVANNAH AND CHARLESTON R. R. COMPANY.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Costs ⟸103.]

Where compensation is allowed out of a common fund belonging to others, for expenses incurred and services rendered in behalf of the common interest, it is upon the principle of representation or agency; e. g., to the plaintiff in a creditor's bill, or to a defendant made a party as a representative of a class too numerous to be served.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. South Carolina R. Co., 25 S. C. 567.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 398; Dec. Dig. ⟸103.]

[2. Work and Labor ⟸4.]

No one can legally claim compensation for voluntary services to a party, however beneficial they may be, nor for incidental benefits and advantages flowing to a party as a result of services rendered under the employment of another party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–7; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[3. Corporations ⟸566; Costs ⟸103.]

A bill against a railroad company to require the payment of certain unfunded coupons of their six per cent. bonds was filed by a holder of such coupons in behalf of himself and all others holding like coupons. Afterwards, certain holders of seven per cent. bonds of this company intervened by petition and made one S., a holder of six per cent. bonds, a party defendant in behalf of himself and all other holders of such bonds. S. employed counsel, and all creditors of the company were called in and made parties by advertisement. *The contest then arose between the sixes and sevens as to priority of lien, which was decided in favor of the sixes, and the railroad was sold for an amount insufficient to satisfy the prior lien. Held, that counsel fees out of the common fund should be allowed only to the attorney employed by S., although other counsel for other holders of sixes rendered valuable services to that class of bonds; but S. was made the representative of the successful class, and was therefore the only party authorized to charge the common fund with expenses.

[4. Receivers ⟸154.]

And upon the same principle, counsel for plaintiff should be allowed a fee out of so much of the common fund as was payable to the holders of unfunded coupons of the six per cent. bonds.

[5. Action ⟸2.]

Courts have no power to subject the property of citizens to claims, unless founded upon established legal or equitable principles making such property liable and constituting a cause of action. Courts have no power to adjust claims upon grounds of abstract moral equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 10–16; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

[6. Corporations ⟸566.]

An attorney for a stockholder successfully resisted the liability of the railroad to taxation, and by direction of the receiver resisted the claim of other parties to certain lands of the company; and another attorney appeared by direction of trustees of the seven per cent. bonds and rendered services in behalf of the property. Held, that neither was entitled to be paid out of the fund going to the successful sixes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2284; Dec. Dig. ⟸566.]

[7. Attorney and Client ⟸149; Receivers ⟸200.]

An attorney was employed by the receiver of the company to sue for a tract of land held adversely, and such attorney, by special contract, was to receive half of the recovery for his services. The land was recovered and was sold with all the other property of the company. Held, that this attorney was entitled to compensation out of the fund realized from the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 357; Dec. Dig. ⟸149; Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 397; Dec. Dig. ⟸200.]

[8. Costs ⟸32.]

Costs should be taxed in favor of the successful parties.

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, April, 1883.

The opinion substantially states this case, but an elaborate statement of all the litigation in this cause may be found in 17 S. C., 219, and in the other appeals to this court there referred to. The Circuit decree here appealed from was as follows:

The several matters which remain to be determined in this complicated litigation, which has been protracted for more than thirteen years, came on to be heard by me on Monday, April 2, 1883, and from day to day, for nine days. It would be tedious and unprofitable to relate the history of the case as it has wound its slow length along through many of the volumes of the Appeal Court Reports from the 5th S. C. to the 17th inclusive.

Those *who are most interested, as well as a majority of the Circuit judges, and all of the members of the Supreme Court, are familiar with its details, and I shall therefore, after much consideration, and with no small amount of embarrassment, growing out of the importance and very peculiar nature of the issues, proceed as briefly as I can to state my conclusions.

The matters submitted were the following:

1. The amount of compensation due to the referee (Mr. Pringle), and of the taxed costs of attorneys engaged in the cause, and of the officers of court, including the present and former clerks and masters.

2. A proper allowance to Charles T. Mitchell, the receiver, for the Bee's Ferry extension.

3. The claim of the eight per cent. bondholders, who insisted that neither the statutory lien nor any mortgage prior to theirs included the franchise, and that they were entitled to whatever of value this indispensable element had given to the corporation.

4. Which of the many attorneys engaged in the cause were entitled to fees and costs out of the common fund.

5. The amount of such fees and costs.

The question of attorneys' costs, embraced in the first proposition, was eliminated from it, and is set down in proposition five as properly to be determined after settling the question of the right of the attorneys to costs. The matter of compensation to the referee and the costs of the several officers of court were determined at the hearing, and an order made touching these matters; so also as to the allowance to the receiver for the Bee's Ferry extension, and the question involving the franchise.

In the orderly progress of the inquiry this brings us to the fourth proposition: Who are entitled to fees and costs out of the common fund? The Supreme Court say, at page 278 of 17 S. C.: "It is always embarrassing for this court to attempt to adjust costs and counsel fees, which more appropriately belongs to the Circuit Court. It seems to us, however, that in this case there should be some system upon the subject, and that the costs and fees of all the attorneys properly chargeable for successful service should be paid out of the common fund, so as to make the successful litigants pay their proper proportion."

*It was suggested at the hearing that this expression of the court is obiter dictum, but it will hardly be denied that as a legal proposition it is indisputably true. Indeed, the practice in this state, as settled by numerous decisions, and in strict conformity with the rule laid down by the elementary writers, is to allow counsel fees out of a fund to those who have recovered, or assisted in recovering, the same. Some of the writers use the term created. In the familiar case of a creditor's bill, where a fund is preserved or realized for the benefit of a class by the efforts of one or more of such class, the counsel representing those who have acted in behalf of the whole class are allowed their proper fees out of the fund. So where a trustee, as such, is involved in litigation, he is entitled to be reimbursed for counsel fees out of the fund; but the fund must be, or it must have been during the progress of the litigation, within his fiduciary control. In all other cases, each party must bear his own charges out of his own funds.

It is needless to cite authority in support of these propositions. The difficulty, however, arises in applying these familiar rules to the case in hand; and I find, moreover, in the condition of the seven per cent. bondholders, a manifest and very great hardship in the legislative delusion by which they have been victimized. The court, however, can furnish no remedy for this. At the close of the late war the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, from its exposed position and early capture by the Federal armies, was practically destroyed, and its stockholders and bondholders, as such, were financially in like condition. The sevens, relying upon the validity of the act of assembly in 1869, postponing the statutory lien held by the state as an indemnity for its guaranty, furnished the necessary money to rebuild the road. This has proved to be a delusion and a snare, and their money, advanced in good faith, by means of which the road was rebuilt, and increased value given to the sixes, has gone beyond the reach at least of the judicial department of the government.

On April 12, 1870, the plaintiff, Hand, holding a large amount of past due detached coupons of the sixes, filed his complaint in "behalf of himself and all other creditors of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, standing in the same right, plight, and condition as himself," &c. This proceeding soon involved *the sixes and sevens in a contention for priority of lien, the value of the road being supposed to be inadequate for the satisfaction of both classes of creditors. It was a hard and uncompromising fight; the stakes were large, and very conspicuous ability has marked the progress of the cause from the beginning to the close.

The road was finally sold, and the sum of $300,000 realized, which is the fund now in the custody of the court for distribution. This has been decided by the Supreme Court to belong to certain of the sixes, who are not estopped, as are others of the same class, from claiming a pro rata thereof. All other claimants are denied the right to participate in the distribution of this fund. It is contended, however, by the attorneys of many of these defeated claimants, that they ought to have their costs and counsel fees out of what they call "the common fund."

At different times during the progress of the struggle between the sixes and the sevens there appeared upon the field other formidable contestants than those who were originally and mainly engaged: 1. The attorney general, in favor of the state, for taxes amounting to about $120,000. 2. The comptroller general, demanding the possession of the road itself, as forfeited to the state under act of 1869 for non-payment of interest on the bonds guaranteed by the state. 3. Material men (so called) and others, claiming damages for injury to persons and property. All of these were regarded by the main contestants as the common enemies of both, and upon their appearance the bugles rang loud; and contingents were detailed from the ranks of each, whose common efforts were directed against their common enemies. When these were discomfited, or driven off, the main fight was renewed, and the sixes were finally victorious.

It cannot be denied that valuable services were rendered by the contingents, but in my judgment such were only incidental and inspired by the hope that in the defeat of a common enemy the fund in controversy would be preserved, not as a common fund for distribution with their foes, but exclusively for themselves. It seems to me that the true character of the fund in controversy settles the question conclusively. The term "common fund" is relative in its true and proper sense. The *sixes having succeeded in establishing their right to it under the decision of the court of last resort, it is as to them and for them a common fund—itself insufficient for the satisfaction of their claims, and as none of the sevens can participate in its distribution, it follows, ex necessitate rei, that their attorneys, who can claim only through them, are in like manner excluded. The stream cannot rise above its source.

Having thus disposed of the claims of those representing the sevens, the material men, and all other claimants, excepting the sucessful sixes, it remains to determine which of these are entitled to have their fees and costs out of the common fund. The term successful sixes is used because the judgment of the Supreme Court clearly excludes certain of the sixes who had funded their coupons upon the principle of estoppel, amounting in all to about $60,000; and these being thus in no better condition than the sevens, their counsel are not entitled to have fees and costs, or either, out of the common fund.

It is worthy of observation that none of the counsel for the sevens make any objection to the allowance of fees and costs to the counsel of the sixes. Their clients having no interest in the common fund, these have simply claimed compensation for themselves for valuable services rendered in the course of the litigation, and are indifferent to the manner of distributing the residue.

It may be further observed that after the order for the sale of the road was made by Judge Aldrich, the priority of liens having been determined, a majority of the sixes combined together, forming a syndicate (or pool, in modern parlance), for the purpose of purchasing the road.

Some of the sixes declined to enter into this combination, and it is from these that the objection to the allowance of fees and costs comes. Mr. A. D. Cohen is the champion of this class, and with admirable temper has delivered an ingenious and forcible argument, insisting that each of the representatives of the successful sixes should be required to look to his own clients for compensation. The learned counsel, however, was too generous to be satisfied with his own conclusions, when he remembered that Mr. Hanckel, who, according to the famous judgment of the wise *Athenian, displayed in selecting the candidate best qualified for office, was the most deserving (perhaps) of the counsel of the sixes, and represented, at the close, only two or three bonds out of which, upon the principle contended for, he could be paid.

It appears that when Cutting's executors, holding a large amount of the sevens, intervened, and the lists were being set, it was necessary to select some one to represent the sixes. Mr. William B. Smith, holding the greatest number of these, was selected, and Mr. Hanckel filed an answer for him. During the progress of the litigation Mr. Smith sold out his bonds, but there is no evidence that the purchasers repudiate the engagement with the counsel already employed or at any time ordered him to desist. If it were necessary to do so, I would hold, in this regard, that these bonds, having been purchased when the litigation was flagrant, that the purchasers of such were affected with knowledge of the fact, and by not repudiating the engagement, assented to and are bound by it.

The fruits of this engagement with Mr. Hanckel, with efficient aid rendered at different stages of the controversy by Messrs. Buist, Brawley, and Lord (and others to be referred to hereafter), together with the valuable aid of the contingents, which must go without further requital than that already received by them, are as follows:

First and foremost, the establishment of the priority of the lien of the sixes.
Second. The defeat of the claim for taxes	$120,000
Third. The defeat of the material men	25,000
Fourth. The defeat of receiver's certificates	75,380
Fifth. Bee's Ferry Extension, reduced from $59,474 to $17,000	42,474
Sixth. The estoppel of six per cents. and claim by an equivalent of seven per cents. to substitution	60,000 to say nothing of the Trenholm & Potter claims greatly reduced and a host of other floating debts under the administration of the receiver awaiting anxiously the result of the suits *already brought. These great advantages have been gained for the sixes by deeds not done in a corner, but by strong and skilful contention over and over again in this forum, and in a higher one, upon both of which beats the fierce light of public observation.
	$322,854

Nor did these results fall out by chance, and whilst I do not feel authorized in entering upon the inquiry whether the contingents, whose aid was so potent, have been sufficiently compensated by the large sums already paid to them from time to time from the earnings of the road, it would seem to me to be an act of injustice, and in conflict with the principles announced in Nimmons v. Stewart, 13 S. C., 445, and Brooks v. Brooks, 16 Id., 621, to permit the supine sixes, who stood aloof and watched the progress of the fight, to come in now and share the fruits of victory without rendering a money equivalent for services which they lacked either faith or courage to contribute. I have no hesitation in saying that Messrs. Hanckel, Buist, Brawley, and Lord are entitled to be paid the amount of the claim presented by them jointly, say ten thousand dollars, to be apportioned amongst themselves, as they may think proper, and also their costs, to be taxed as hereinafter provided.

There are other counsel engaged in the case, who also represent successful sixes. I find myself unable, without the aid of additional testimony, to pass upon their claims. No specified sums are claimed, and the nature of the services rendered are not in all of these very clearly made out. I would prefer, therefore, lest an act of injustice might be done to some deserving of compensation, that all others representing successful sixes, and who have in any wise contributed to the results attained, file, forthwith, in the office of Master Sass, who, as the successor of Master Porter, has custody of the fund, specific statements of their claims for services rendered in the cause, with leave to offer proof to support the same. I regret the delay caused by this course in settling these minor issues, but it is better to go slow than to go wrong, even in a cause that has already been more than a decade in court.

The master (Clancy) has made report upon the claim of James W. Moore, Esq., for professional services to the road in recover*ing from a purchaser a large tract of land belonging to the railroad company, which had been sold for taxes in Beaufort county. The testimony taken by the master and sent up by him sustains fully his report, and the same is in all respects hereby affirmed.

Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

1. That all claims for counsel fees and costs exhibited against the funds in question on the part of those representing the seven per cent. bondholders and the other claimants, excepting the counsel representing the successful sixes, be, and the same are hereby, denied.

2. That the master, in whose hands the funds in question are, do pay over to Messrs. Hanckel, Buist, Brawley, and Lord, upon their joint receipt, the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000), as a fee for professional services rendered by them in the above entitled causes; and that he do also pay over to James W. Moore, Esq., the sum of six hundred dollars ($600) together with the proper costs to the parties entitled to the same in the proceedings by which said last mentioned fee was established.

3. That the several counsel representing others of the successful sixes have leave to file their claims in the office of G. Herbert Sass, Esq., master, &c., if they choose to do so, stating specifically the sums claimed by them for professional services rendered in this behalf, exhibiting before the said master such proof as they may deem proper to sustain the same.

4. It is further ordered, that the clerk of this court do tax the costs due to the counsel above named, to whom fees are allowed by this decree.

Messrs. Asher D. Cohen and Mitchell & Smith, for bondholders.

Messrs. B. H. Rutledge and H. A. M. Smith, for H. E. Young.

Messrs. B. J. Whaley and A. G. Magrath, for J. B. Campbell.

Mr. Joseph W. Barnwell, for Buist & Buist, T. M. Hanckel, Samuel Lord, and W. H. Brawley.

Mr. James Simons, for J. W. Moore.

*April 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The case of Hand v. Savannah and Charleston R. R. Co. et al. has been before the courts for a number of years. The road has been sold, the proceeds of sale collected, and the rights of the parties determined. In fact, all of the questions involved, as between the litigants, have been adjudged. The only matter remaining is as to the fees of counsel, which is now before us under this appeal.

In the consideration of this matter, it will not be necessary to review the whole case, or to state fully its entire history. Only so much is needed as may be required to make the questions involved intelligible, and therefore only so much will be given. The case in its progress has been most earnestly and ably fought, and numerous counsel have been engaged. It has appeared in different forms, and every inch of ground has been vigorously contested. Its history may be divided into three stages: First. The institution of the original action by Daniel Hand; second, the intervention of the comptroller and the attorney general of the state; and, third, the proceedings in re the executors of Cutting. It will be necessary to state some of the facts connected with these three different stages, and to consider the case somewhat from the standpoint of each.

In 1853 the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company was incorporated. In 1856 the state by act agreed to indorse, upon certain conditions, and guarantee six per cent. bonds of this company, not to exceed $5,000 per mile, with statutory lien on the road. Coupon bonds to the amount of $505,000, payable in 1877, were issued by the company under this act, and were indorsed by the State. This amount did not prove sufficient to complete the road, and in 1858, with the view to raise an additional sum, the company conveyed the road to certain trustees, and issued additional bonds to the amount of $1,000,000, which completed the road. After the war, the road was found greatly damaged, in fact in ruins; and for the purpose of rebuilding, the trustees above referred to proceeded to foreclose their mortgage, and in December, 1866, the road was sold, subject to the lien of the state under the act of 1856 above. At this sale Geo. W. Williams and others purchased at the price of $30,000. These parties pro*ceeded to organize a new company by virtue of an act passed to that end in 1866, the style of this company being the "Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company."

This company being without means to rebuild, and not being able to issue marketable bonds with mortgage on the road so long as the lien of the state under the act of 1856 stood in the way, made application to the legislature to stand aside its lien. This was assented to by the legislature, and accordingly in 1869 an act was passed, authorizing the company to issue seven per cent. bonds to the amount of $500,000, for the purpose of reconstruction; upon which issue, it was enacted, the lien of the state should be postponed and become a second lien. These bonds were then issued, and the road was thereby rebuilt and put into operation. By the third section of the act of 1869 the company was authorized and requested to fund and redeem the coupons for interest of the six per cent. bonds issued by the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company then past due, or that might fall due, by the first of September, 1869, by issuing an equal amount of their bonds with coupons attached at the rate of seven per cent., payable semi-annually; these bonds to be guaranteed by the state.

Under these circumstances, in 1870 there were outstanding as claims against the company the six per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1856, and unfunded coupons upon these bonds; bonds substituted for the funded six per cent. coupons under the act of 1869; the seven per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1869; and certain eight per cent. bonds. In 1870 Daniel Hand, holding unfunded coupons of the six per cent. bonds, to the amount of $27,705, besides interest thereon, instituted his action, in his own behalf "and in behalf of all other creditors of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, standing in the same right, plight, and condition as himself, who shall in due time come in and contribute to the expenses of the action," demanding judgment: that an account be taken of the amount due to him upon the bonds and coupons held by him, and secured by the statutory mortgage to the state; that the same might be paid with the interest thereon by a certain day; and in default that the road be sold in satisfaction of his claim and of the claims of all standing *in the same right, plight, and condition with himself; that said creditors be called in; that injunction, restraining the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company from appropriating and wasting the funds of the company, be granted; and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the road until said claims were satisfied or the road sold, &c., &c. This action was commenced by Messrs. Buist & Buist, as plaintiff's attorneys. To this action the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company and certain parties, trustees or mortgagees to secure the $500,000 seven per cent. bonds, were summoned as defendants, and also the state, through the attorney general, appeared as defendant. The company and the trustees appeared by Messrs. Campbell & Seabrook, attorneys.

This case being heard upon the Circuit in October, 1873, the Circuit judge decreed that the plaintiff and other holders of coupons of the six per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1856, were entitled to be paid, with the interest thereon, and he ordered that the case be referred to a referee, with instructions to call by advertisement upon all persons holding past due coupons of said bonds to present and prove their claims on or before a certain day, and to the end that such further order as might be necessary should be passed, that the referee file his report immediately after the day fixed for the proof of claims. From this decree, the defendant, the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, appealed through James B. Campbell, attorney. This appeal was dismissed for irregularity without prejudice.

On the return of the case to the Circuit Court, a consent order was passed, by which the road was put into the hands of a receiver, with an advisory board of nine, to be operated, with quarterly reports to the court; the net profits to be applied quarterly to the six per cent. "coupons reported by the referee as proved under the previous order. 2. To all outstanding, unpaid, or unsatisfied coupons for interest then due and payable, or to fall due, in the order of their rank and right of payment, the right of payment or priority of lien to be referred to and determined by the court whenever they may arise after full hearing." 3. If any surplus of net profits should remain, the same to be applied to any other liens, if any, and then ratably to the unsecured debts of said company, the costs and disbursements of the cause to be *taxed and paid by the receiver, also proper counsel fees to both plaintiff and defendants, to be ascertained by a referee as thereafter to be ordered.

Charles T. Mitchell was appointed receiver under this order, with salary to be fixed by the advisory board, and to hold his office until the maturity of the six per cent. bonds, unless sooner removed upon the recommendation of the advisory board, and not otherwise, with leave to the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, at any time pending the case, upon showing that all interest coupons in arrear were paid, and all other unsecured debts arranged, to have the said railroad and property restored to them, with leave also to the receiver to hold the said road open to private sale upon terms to be reported to the court, at the same time enjoining all creditors who failed to come in under this proceeding from interfering in any way, by suit or otherwise, with said management. While this action was in progress, the comptroller general undertook to take possession of the road under the act of 1869, § 5, 14 Stat., 202, and afterwards the attorney general instituted proceedings to foreclose the statutory lien to the state.

In 1875, the executors of Cutting, holding seven per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1869, supra, filed a petition, in re Daniel Hand, claiming that they were secured by the first and prior mortgage on the road, and prayed a foreclosure thereof. To this petition the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, Andrew Simonds, H. H. De Leon, and Edwin Bates, trustees under the second mortgage to secure eight per cent. bondholders, Henry Gourdin, trustee, and Robert Adger, holders of said bonds, William B. Smith and James Conner, holders of the six per cent. bonds, and other creditors of the said company, were made parties defendant. Messrs. Memminger & Jervey filed this proceeding as attorneys for the executors of Cutting. Mr. Campbell answered for the receiver, Hon. A. G. Magrath for Simonds and other trustees, and Mr. Thomas M. Hanckel for William B. Smith. No other answers were filed. In this petition, after stating that the petitioner was the holder of a large amount of the seven per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1869, and secured by mortgage to William Aiken and others, *and also other indebtedness in New York, further stated, in paragraph 4, that besides these bonds and mortgages there is also the issue of $505,000 in bonds on the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, at an interest of six per cent., which is secured by the statutory lien of the act of 1856, as amended by the act of March 2, 1869, and of which the bonds and coupons held by Daniel Hand, are part and parcel, and that certain other bonds are in the hands of W. B. Smith and James Conner, and of certain other persons too numerous to be made parties, &c., &c., and the petitioner prayed that process might issue against all parties having interests in the premises who have not already become parties to the suit, to wit, certain persons naming them, among them W. B. Smith and James Conner, styled holders of some of the six per cent. bonds. As has been stated, Mr. Hanckel appeared and answered for W. B. Smith.

The case remained in this condition for a year or more, with negotiations for sale and compromise pending, but without any decisive action; when in 1877 an order referring the matter to Hon. W. Alston Pringle was made with instructions to call in all creditors both of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company and the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company having claims secured by mortgage or other liens upon the property belonging to the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company to prove their claims, &c. The reference under this order was extended several times, and after all claimants had presented and proved their different demands, the real contest began between the sixes and sevens as to the effect of the act of 1869 postponing in favor of the sevens the statutory lien created by the act of 1856, which had secured the sixes. In this conflict, it is conceded on all hands that Mr. Hanckel was at least the leader on the question presented in behalf of the sixes, with a most formidable array against him on the other side. He was the first in the field, by virtue of the fact that his client, W. B. Smith, was the only one of the sixes summoned who answered; James Conner, for satisfactory reasons to himself, finding that he could not ally himself with the sixes, and the other sixes, on account of their number, not having been specially summoned. They *were, however, called in, and were represented by their respective attorneys afterwards.

The referee finally reported in favor of the sixes. This report, after a most serious, earnest, and able contest, both in the Circuit and Supreme Court, was sustained, and the fruits thereof were awarded to the sixes by the court of last resort. Mr. Hanckel's appearance in the case was by authority of Mr. Smith, who had been selected by the petitioners, executors of Cutting, as a defendant representing the class of sixes to which he belonged; and having thus become a leader in the beginning, he so continued to the end, and his voice was the first and the last heard in behalf of the common right of the sixes. It is stated that he was greatly aided by Messrs. Buist & Buist, Mr. Brawley, and Mr. Lord, and by the respective attorneys of the different holders of the sixes, other than W. B. Smith, after their bonds had been proved; or at least that all of these attorneys rendered valuable services in support of the position taken by the sixes, that the act of 1869 postponing the statutory lien was unconstitutional. But Mr. Hanckel's client was the only one of the sixes who had been made a representative defendant, or, to use the language of the counsel, a "head creditor." He had been especially summoned by process; the others had been called in by advertisement, and made themselves parties by responding to the call, except Daniel Hand and those already in court in his action, upon which the executors of Cutting had engrafted their proceeding which precipitated the conflict between the sixes and sevens, and out of which this appeal now comes.

In the meantime, while the case of Daniel Hand was pending, and before the executors of Cutting intervened, and in fact before the appointment of the receiver above, a question arose as to the liability of the road for taxes, and a proceeding was instituted in the United States Court by Mr. H. E. Young, attorney, at the instance of Mr. Miller, "a large stockholder," it is said, to restrain the collection of these taxes, the amount involved being very large. An injunction was obtained on the Circuit; but after reaching the Supreme Court of the United States, the case was abandoned. The question again arose in the state courts, but finally the road was declared exempt. Several matters of litiga*tion growing out of claims of certain parties, Potter & Trenholm, and others, to land affecting the road-bed and right of way, also came up, in which it seems that Mr. Young represented the company, or the receiver. For services in these respects up to October, 1874, it seems that Mr. Young was allowed and paid out of the income of the road the sum of $3,850, under an order of Judge Reed dated April 16, 1875, directing the receiver to pay the same, and other expenses and counsel fees embraced in a report made by Wilmot G. DeSaussure on these matters. This amount, in the claim now made by Young, has been credited on his account for services rendered on the question of taxes, and his present claim consists in additional services as to that question and the other matter above referred to.

Some time in 1876, one Richardson, having purchased at a tax sale a large tract of land, consisting of some 2,000 acres, located in Beaufort county, belonging to the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, and this fact being reported by the superintendent to Mr. H. E. Young, as one of the solicitors of the road, Mr. J. W. Moore, attorney at Hampton, was employed by Mr. Young, representing the company, to bring action for the recovery of this land, the terms being that the receiver would pay actual outlay and one-half of the recovery, land and damages. This land was ultimately recovered, and has been sold as a portion of the property of the company, the proceeds being incorporated in the general fund held for distribution among the sixes. Mr. Moore has presented a claim of fee of $600, which upon the testimony has been allowed in the decree of Judge Cothran.

The above presents the facts of the case now before us, upon which the questions of law as to the fees of the different attorneys arise. Judge Cothran ordered the master "to pay out of the common fund in his hands to Messrs. Hanckel, Buist, Brawley, and Lord, upon their joint receipt, the sum of $10,000 as a fee for professional services rendered by them in the above entitled cause," and to Mr. Moore the sum of $600, "and that the several counsel representing other successful sixes have leave to file their claims in the office of the master, stating specifically, &c., the sums claimed by them for their services, and exhibiting such proof as they may deem proper to sustain them." He also *ordered "costs to be taxed for the counsel above named, to whom fees are allowed by the decree."

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, Hayne & Ficken, and Asher D. Cohen, representing successful sixes, appealed upon exceptions. These exceptions raise three questions: 1. That the common fund in court ought only to be charged with the payment of the fees of such counsel as had authority to represent the successful sixes as a class. 2. That the judgment of the Supreme Court, April 12, 1879 (12 S. C., 314), severed the rights of the several sixes, and that the only issue thereafter was an individual contest, and that the "common fund was not thereafter chargeable with fees for services rendered by the counsel of the individual bond holders;" and 3. That his honor erred in decreeing that costs should be taxed in favor of Messrs. Hanckel, Buist, Brawley, and Lord, instead of to the counsel representing the successful sixes.

Mr. Asher D. Cohen, in addition to the above, filed other exceptions as attorney for the executor of Townsend. These exceptions, however, are in substance the same as the above, and embracing an exception to the fee of Mr. Moore out of the common fund. Messrs. Mitchell & Smith excepted upon several grounds, all turning, however, upon the point that the common fund should not have been charged with the fees allowed, as these attorneys were not authorized representatives of the sixes; and Messrs. Whaley and Magrath excepted for William Aiken et al., trustees, and for James B. Campbell, on the ground mainly, that their clients being trustees in possession, and necessary parties, it was their duty to resist the efforts of the comptroller general to seize the property in dispute, which successful resistance enured to the benefit of the sixes, and the expenses, counsel fees, &c., should be chargeable on the common fund, decreed to the sixes.

The underlying principle in all these cases, where one has been allowed compensation out of a common fund belonging to others, for expenses incurred and services rendered in behalf of the common interest, is the principle of representation or agency. Where such compensation has been allowed, the party claiming has been in some way the recognized and authoritative representative of the *whole and therefore authorized to contract for the whole. Thus, executors, administrators, and other trustees, being the legal representative of the parties interested in the trust fund or property, have been usually allowed credit for all necessary and reasonable charges incurred by them in the proper management and protection of the trust fund.

So, too, where the parties having a common interest, or are very numerous, and one of the class institutes proceedings for himself and all others belonging to that class, these latter afterwards coming in and claiming to share in the successful result, the law, regarding the first party as the representative of the latter, has recognized his right to charge to the common fund or property such reasonable and proper expenses, including counsel fees, as he may incur for the common and general interest.

This principle has been frequently enforced in behalf of a plaintiff in creditors' bills, and it also applies where the common interest belongs to the defendants, who being so numerous that one is selected and brought in by regular process as a representative of the class, while the others are called in by advertisement, who may come in or not as they choose; but if they do come in, must do so under the principle that the common fund shall be taxed with the reasonable expenses incurred by the representative. Thus it will be seen that such charges are allowed not simply and alone because services have been rendered which have been beneficial to the common interest, but upon the ground that they were rendered by the authority of those having the common interest exercised by the representative, the compensation for which was to be chargeable to the fund protected or recovered.

No one can legally claim compensation for voluntary services to another, however beneficial they may be, nor for incidental benefits and advantages to one, flowing to him on account of services rendered to another, by whom he may have been employed. Before legal charge can be sustained, there must be a contract of employment either expressly made or superinduced by the law upon the facts. And thus it is, as we have said above, that in the case of executors, administrators, and other trustees, and in creditors' bills, and suits of that nature, where the representative of a class *is the principal and first actor, either as plaintiff or defendant, the class being so numerous as not to be conveniently made parties individually, the law superinduces a contract on the part of all having a common interest, that the common property shall be chargeable with the reasonable contracts as to fees, expenses, &c., of the representative. Section 140 of the code provides, that "when the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons, or when the parties are numerous, and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole." See Mr. Pomeroy's discussion of this section, and the former equity practice. Pom. Rem., § 389 et seq. This is the principle, as we understand it, upon which the questions involved here must be determined.

The class which has been successful at the end of this protracted and vigorously conducted contest, is the class known throughout the case under the name and style of the sixes. They had a common interest in the struggle, and the property has been sold and the proceeds adjudicated to them. They were not all summoned into the court by individual process; on the contrary, the most of them came in under the call by advertisement—all except Daniel Hand and those who stood with him, having unfunded coupons of the six per cents., they being already in court, and W. B. Smith and James Conner, the two last being especially summoned as holders of sixes.

Now, who of these parties was the representative of the sixes? No one but Smith, James Conner having declined to appear for them. Daniel Hand and those who stood with him in possession of unfunded coupons of the sixes, it is true, were interested in the question upon which the case ultimately turned, but Daniel Hand's proceeding was expressly for himself and "those who stood in the same right and plight with himself." He did not in any way claim to act for the benefit of the sixes generally, nor did he ask that they should be made parties either by process or by call, and but for the interposition of the executors of Cutting, Daniel Hand's case might have terminated without the sixes appearing. We do not see in the "Case" that the sixes as a class had any standing in court until the sevens raised the main question involved between themselves and the sixes and summoned *W. B. Smith as one of the holders of the sixes, omitting to serve the others because too numerous. Under these circumstances we must regard Smith as the representative of the sixes, and their only representative as a class, and consequently the only party authorized to charge the common fund with expenses.

Mr. Hanckel seems to have been the attorney employed by Smith. He answered for Smith, and it appears from several indorsements on the papers connected with the different references that he signed his name as the attorney of the sixes. Upon these facts we think that Mr. Hanckel is entitled to a proper fee out of the common fund in court other than that portion going to Daniel Hand and those who stood with him with unfunded coupons of the six per cent. bonds. No doubt it is true, that after the conflict commenced between the sixes and sevens, that Messrs. Buist & Buist and Brawley, who were representing unfunded coupons of the sixes, and Mr. Lord, did valuable and able services on the question of the unconstitutionality of the act of 1869, postponing the statutory lien of the state in favor of the sevens, but at whose instance, and by whose authority was this done? Was it done by the authority of the sixes or their representative, W. B. Smith? Can these parties come in under the principle we have laid down above? Do not they rather occupy the position of rendering an incidental service, to parties not represented by them, but derived to them because their rights were involved in the same question, as to which they had been engaged for others?

It may be that, inasmuch as Daniel Hand's suit was in the nature of a creditor's bill for those holding unfunded coupons, his attorneys, Messrs. Buist & Buist and Brawley (if the latter was engaged by Daniel Hand), would be entitled, under the above principle, to proper fees out of so much of the common fund as the holders of such coupons may be entitled to. Mr. Lord, it appears, represented those of the sixes who at one time had been represented by Mr. Brawley, and who had been turned over to Mr. Lord by Mr. Brawley, when he came to the conclusion that they were in conflict with the unfunded coupons standing with Daniel Hand.

Mr. Lord, it is admitted, rendered most effective and valuable *assistance in the interest of the sixes, but the question again recurs, upon whose authority? Was it by contract, either express or implied, made by one who could bind the common fund of the sixes? We do not find any allegation or statement of that kind in the case, and we do not see, therefore, how the claim, however meritorious in other respects, can be sustained against the protests of the sixes. This court has no power to subject the property of citizens to claims, except such as may be founded upon legal or established equitable principles making such property liable. It has no power to adjust claims upon grounds of abstract moral equity. On the contrary, a claim to be sustained by the courts must amount to a cause of action under some settled legal or equitable principle. Where are the facts in this case which would constitute a cause of action by these attorneys against the sixes?

The same principle which excludes Messrs. Buist & Buist, Brawley, and Lord will also exclude Mr. Young. His services in protecting the road from taxation and other claims may have enured to the ultimate advantage of the sixes. Yet it was one of those incidental advantages sometimes following acts which go beyond the object of the immediate employment and redound to the benefit of others besides the party authorizing it and for whom the act was performed. The same may be said as to the claim of William Aiken and Geo. W. Williams, and their attorney, Mr. Campbell. For such benefits the law has given no pecuniary compensation.

The claim of Mr. Moore, we think, occupies a different position from those we have been discussing. He was employed by the receiver or the solicitors of the company to sue for a tract of land, claimed by the company, then in the possession of another. He undertook the service under a special contract, to wit, one-half of the recovery, land and damages. He succeeded in recovering the land, which has been incorporated into the general property, his half as well as the other. The land has been sold and the proceeds are now in the common fund. After the recovery of the land, his special contract was subject to specific performance, and he might no doubt have claimed a partition. This was not done, however. On the contrary, as we have said, the *land has been sold and the proceeds are in court. We think he may pursue these proceeds and establish his claim against the fund instead of the land, which has been done substantially; and therefore there was no error in allowing his claim.

Such costs as the statute prescribes should be taxed in favor of the successful parties.

We repeat that it is not hereby intended to intimate that any of the gentlemen engaged in this case did not render valuable services for which as between attorney and client they should be paid, but simply to announce who are entitled by law to have a judgment of the court for fees out of the common fund.

It is the judgment of this court that the decree of the Circuit Court be modified as herein stated, and that the case be remanded to be carried out in accordance herewith.

21 S. C. 183

KERNGOOD v. DAVIS.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Judgment ⊂⊃778.]

A testator, C., left property in trust for his daughter for life, with remainder to the heirs of her body, share and share alike. H., a son of this daughter, received from his father and mother, after his marriage, a large estate in lands and negroes (the latter being part of the C. estate), for the value of which he promised to account on the death of his parents, or either of them, if necessary, for purposes of equalization with his brothers and sisters. H. died, and then his mother, and judgments were obtained against the executrix of H. By a consent decree in a cause to which H.'s widow and children, his brothers and sisters, and these judgment creditors were parties, a plantation of H. was vested in his children, in satisfaction of their interest in the C. estate, and discharged from the lien of the judgments, and the said brothers and sisters were ordered to pay these judgments, which were thereupon marked satisfied as against H.'s estate. But this decree was not enrolled, nor was execution sent to the county in which was a plantation of the C. estate until many years afterwards, and meantime these brothers and sisters had mortgaged their interest in such plantation. Held, that this decree did not create a lien upon the interests of the brothers and sisters in the C. lands, until lodged in the county where the lands were, and this lien was therefore postponed to the lien of the intermediate mortgages.

[2. Judgment ⊂⊃772.]

* But the evident scheme of the decree being an arrangement by which these parties took the interest of their brother's children in the C. lands and were to pay the judgments, the judgments not being paid were entitled to hold a lien upon such children's interest in said lands from the date of the decree.

[3. Mortgages ⊂⊃169.]

The mortgagees were chargeable with notice that the interest of these infant co-tenants was not expressly transferred to the others, and that these others, the mortgagors, were directed to pay said judgments.

[4. Judgment ⊂⊃651.]

These children were entitled to share per capita with their uncles and aunts in the C. lands, but their interest having been treated in the consent decree as a share per stirpes, all parties are now bound to so accept it.

[6. Mortgages ⊂⊃459.]

A complaint for foreclosure alleged that a judgment of record had been paid. Held, that the court, under such allegation and the facts proved, and in order to settle the priorities of lien, might raise an estoppel against the assertion of such judgment.

[7. Estoppel ⊂⊃23.]

A party holding a judgment lien on the interest of a co-tenant in a tract of land, joined with all the co-tenants in mortgaging this land, with covenants of general warranty. Held, that he was estopped from asserting his judgment lien as against this mortgage, but not as against intermediate mortgages.

Before Cothran, J., Sumter, October, 1883.

The facts of this case are stated in the opinion of this court. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This cause was noted in the calendar as heard at the October term of the Court of Common Pleas for Sumter county, and by agreement the argument was heard afterwards in Columbia, on November 14, 1883. The land described in the pleadings is under order of sale by a previous decree in the cause, and is advertised to be sold by the master of Sumter county on sales-day in December next, now nearly at hand. It was deemed expedient by the parties in interest to settle the conflicting claims for priority of liens with a view to promote a more favorable sale of the premises, and to facilitate this purpose the extraordinary hearing was had.

The case has been argued upon all sides with great zeal and ability, but the time is so short and the necessity of a speedy *decree is so much greater than for an elaborate one, that I shall undertake to do little more than give a brief history of the case and state the conclusions obtained, leaving it, in case the cause should go further, to the counsel in whose favor I have decreed to sustain my conclusions by the very able argument delivered at the hearing. The facts of the case extending over a period of seventy years (the testator R. L. Champion, under whose will the controversy arises, having died in 1813), would of themselves make a volume. It is enough barely to mention a few of the complications: litigation for nearly one-third of that time, death of parties, substitution of others, debtors insolvent, contention among creditors, a family settlement, a sale of the premises as forfeited to the state for taxes unpaid—all go to show the difficulty of unravelling, and perhaps the necessity of cutting, this Gordian knot.

The first question in the case involved the validity of a patent issued by the executive of the state to Mrs. Sarah E. DeSaussure for the land in controversy, known as the Champion place, in Sumter county, containing some 2,400 acres, and said to be very valuable. The land was first exposed to sale December 31, 1877, for taxes due for the year 1876, and for the want of a bid for the same, was not sold. There was no redemption of the premises, and finally, on the first Monday of September, 1879, the said land was offered for sale as land forfeited to the state and was bought for Mrs. Sarah E. DeSaussure by her attorney, the arrearages of taxes amounting to $545.18 paid, and a patent issued her by the governor of the state for the whole tract.

It was urged in behalf of the patentee that the exhibitions of the patent was proof of good and sufficient title, but unsuccessfully, and the patent was fiercely assailed by all the other parties in interest as the common enemy of all. After much contention it was suggested that if the holder of the patent would consent to assume the position of a trustee for the lien creditors, in the purchase made, and not insist upon the validity of her title, but agree to cancel the same, that the amount of money paid by her for the land at the tax sale, with interest, would be refunded to her. To this all parties agreed, and this matter is happily eliminated from the case.

*The next question is, as to the priority of liens. The following is a list of those:

1. The Ellen Stewart claim. This was a sealed note of Eliza C. DeSaussure, A. B. DeSaussure, and J. M. Davis, for $500, dated July 13, 1874, payable January 1, thereafter, with interest from date, and after maturity at the rate of one per cent. per month. Mrs. Eliza C. DeSaussure gave to the payee a mortgage of her interest in the land in controversy, to secure payment of said note.

2. The Clyburn claim. A bond of M. L. Davis, S. A. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., E. C. DeSaussure, and L. C. DeSaussure, to W. D. McDowell, receiver of the estate of Workman, dated January 28, 1875, conditioned for the payment of $3,500 on January 1, 1876, with interest from date at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, payable annually until the whole be paid; indorsed (in the handwriting of J. M. Davis, and admitted by Mr. Hay to be correct) "$600 of this bond bears interest from the date of the bond, the balance $2,900 having been only paid over today, will bear interest from this date, March 16, 1875." A mortgage of the interest of all the obligors in the land in question was executed and delivered on the same day to secure the payment of said bond.

3. The Simonds claim. A bond of J. M. Davis, L. D. Davis, L. C. DeSaussure, Eliza C. DeSaussure, and A. B. DeSaussure, to Louis D. DeSaussure, dated April 25, 1876, conditioned for the payment of $2,086.24, with interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, from January 1, 1875, payable annually until the whole amount of principal and interest is paid—the principal to be paid in two equal successive annual instalments, the first whereof is to be paid on or before January 1, 1877. Eliza C. Davis, Louisa D. Davis, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure at the same time executed and delivered to Louis D. DeSaussure a mortgage of all their interest in the said lands to secure the payment of said bond. This bond has been duly assigned and transferred to Andrew Simonds.

4. The Kerngood claim. A bond of John M. DeSaussure, sr., Louisa D. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Sallie D. Davis, Eliza C. DeSaussure, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure, dated

May 27, *1877, conditioned for the payment to George Alden, on or before January 1, 1878, of the sum of $1,516.65, with interest from January 1, 1877, at seven per cent. per annum. All the obligors at the same time executed and delivered to the obligee a mortgage of their interest in the land in question to secure the payment of said bond. This bond was afterwards duly assigned and transferred to the plaintiff, Tobias Kerngood.

5. The claims of Witte Bros. These consist of sundry judgments obtained by James D. Matheson, James D. Kirkpatrick, administrator, Priscilla B. Perkins, executrix, and Mary E. Shaw, administratrix, against the estate of Henry W. DeSaussure, deceased. These by assignment all became the property of one Sanders, who in turn pledged them as security to Witte Bros., who present them here. As the main contention in the matter of priorities arises in regard to these claims, it is proper to define just here their true nature. Henry W. DeSaussure was the eldest son of the late John M. DeSaussure, who had intermarried many years ago with Eliza Hester Champion, daughter of Richard L. Champion, the devisor of the lands here in question. Henry W. DeSaussure was killed in one of the battles around Richmond, in June, 1862; at his death he left a widow and four children surviving.

After the close of the war, amid the wrecks of a large fortune, an effort was made to adjust his affairs. To this end, his widow and executrix, in behalf of herself and her infant children, filed a bill in equity on December 21, 1869, entitled for "injunction, dower, partition, to marshal assets, and for relief." Most of the parties to the proceedings now before the court were made defendants in that bill; amongst others the assignors, then the holders and owners, of the claims presented here by Witte Bros. The injunction sought by that proceeding was to stay the hands of these assignors then holding judgment against the executrix of the will of the said Henry W. DeSaussure. It was an omnibus bill, as its title imports, but in the latitude which is allowed in the matter of family settlements (for this was obviously such), no plea for multifariousness was interposed, and on November 14, 1870, Hon. S. W. Melton, then the presiding judge of the fifth

*Circuit, made a decree in the cause, which was assented to by all parties to the suit.

By the fourth clause of the will of Richard L. Champion, who departed this life in the year 1813, he devised the land in question here to his daughter Eliza Hester, afterwards the wife of John M. DeSaussure, sr. (the mother of the said Henry W.) for life, with remainder to the heirs of her body living at the time of her death. She died in 1864, being predeceased by her son, Henry W. It was conceded in the consent decree of Judge Melton that the children of Henry W. were entitled to a share of the Champion land at the falling in of the life estate of their grandmother. The estate of Henry W. being insolvent, James M. Davis was appointed receiver of the same.

Besides the interest which Henry W.'s children had in the Champion lands as tenants in common with their uncles and aunts, their father was seized at the time of his death of other valuable lands in Kershaw county and of a house and lot in the town of Camden. It was manifestly the purpose of the family settlement already referred to, to save a home and farm for the widow and children of Henry W. DeSaussure. This appears from the terms of the decree of Judge Melton, and without encumbering this decree with the contents of that, I shall only cite the sixth paragraph:

"It is further ordered that the said James M. Davis, receiver as aforesaid, after applying the assets remaining in his hands necessary to make the payments of the said Mary R. DeSaussure, hereinbefore directed, to pay therefrom the costs of this suit (the same to be apportioned and charged to the parties liable therefor, as ascertained by the further orders of this court), and to apply the balance of said assets, when collected, to the payment of the demands of the other creditors of the estate of said Henry W. DeSaussure, deceased, pro rata, to wit, the said James D. Matheson, James D. Kirkpatrick, Priscilla B. Perkins, and Mary E. Shaw, and that the judgments at law upon the said claims be satisfied before the judgment creditors thereof receive any benefit from this decree. It is further ordered that the defendants, Mary Louisa Davis, Eliza C. DeSaussure, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Sarah Amelia Davis, and Lloyd C. DeSaus*sure, do pay the said creditors, respectively, whatever may remain due to them on their said claims after the application thereto of the proceeds of the said assets in the hands of the said James M. Davis, receiver aforesaid, as hereinbefore directed."

Paragraph 7 in terms authorizes the remaindermen under the will of Richard L. Champion, who are adults, and John M. DeSaussure, sr., the father of the infant, Lloyd C., whenever they may deem it advisable, to sell the land and personalty to pass under the said will, &c. These claimants, or their assignees, were parties to that proceeding, and assented to it. The right to sell absolutely certainly includes the right to make a conditional sale; the greater including the less.

The decree filed in November, 1870, was never enrolled. It is worthy of remark also that it was made after the adoption of the code of procedure, and if it had been enrolled, would not ipso facto have become a lien upon land. In the meantime, the several mortgages exhibited here were executed by the defendants of their interests in the Champion lands, all of which were upon record before any steps were taken by the judgment creditors herein to file transcripts of their judgments in Sumter county, where the land in controversy lies. It cannot, therefore, be contended that the Witte claims, as judgments, can have priority to the recorded mortgages.

It is argued, however, with great ingenuity and force, by the counsel for Witte Bros., that by virtue of the operation of the act of 1791, then of force, a statutory lien was acquired by these creditors of Henry W. DeSaussure, the balance of whose claims, after applying whatever was available in the hands of the receiver, J. M. Davis, were to be paid by these tenants in common, defendants here, under the terms of Judge Melton's decree, and out of their interest in the Champion lands in Sumter county. There is no doubt but that in cases of partition by means of sale, as perhaps where contribution in money to make equality was decreed, that this insidious security prevailed, and without attempting to follow or to answer the learned argument of Mr. Haynsworth, it is enough perhaps to say that it has not convinced me. I cannot admit the premises upon which the argu*ment was based, to wit: that this was ever a case of partition at all. There was no land sought to be made the subject of partition in Kershaw county. There was a scheme for the exchange of the interest of Henry W.'s children in the Sumter lands for what was thought to be a shelter and a farm for them in Kershaw, and this upon certain conditions, it is true in part not complied with, but to which the creditors assented.

Besides, I think the search would not be rewarded with success, however diligently made, for a case where proceedings could be instituted and sustained in one county for partition of lands in another, unless there should at the same time be partitionable lands in the county where the proceedings were instituted, by laying hold of which the court alone could acquire jurisdiction of the lands in another county. This disposes of the main question in the case, to wit, that of the priority of the several claimants, and in the order in which they have been stated herein.

There are, however, some minor questions which have been brought to my attention, and which I will now attempt to dispose of. The first of these is as to the effect of John M. DeSaussure, sr., joining in the Kerngood mortgage. It appears that he was the assignee of the Villipigue judgment by reason of having paid off the same. It further appears that that judgment is the oldest lien upon the property of John M. DeSaussure, jr. Should the land in question sell for its real value, it is hardly possible that this question can be of any practical application in the case, for the plaintiff's debt will probably, in any event, be paid, having priority of the claims of Witte Bros. But in case it becomes important in distributing the proceeds of sale, I hold that John M. DeSaussure, by giving the mortgage to Kerngood, with a covenant of warranty, is estopped from claiming any right to have his judgment against John M., jr., paid to the prejudice of the plaintiff, Kerngood, his mortgagee.

The next question arising is as to the manner of computing the interest upon the Clyburn and Simonds bonds. The terms of the bonds severally relating to the matter of interest are almost identical, and involves the consideration of the distinction between the computation of annual interest and compound interest. The difference, except where the amount is large and the length of *time great, is hardly appreciable; still there is a difference, and the parties raising the question are entitled to have it considered and settled. There is nothing in the terms used to justify or allow the compounding of interest upon either of these bonds—that is to say, there are no stated times up to the time of making the final calculations when interest is to be added to principal, and the sum so found made a new principal. Hence it follows that the computation should be made upon the rule of annual, and not of compound, interest. The terms "until the whole be paid" in the Clyburn bond, and those of like import in the Simonds bond, clearly support the right to the rate of interest stipulated in the bonds respectively until they are paid and satisfied.

There were some other questions raised in argument at the hearing, but not appearing in the pleadings, nor in the shape of exceptions, and I do not know that I apprehend them very clearly. One as to contribution to John M. DeSaussure, sr., by his co-obligors on the Kerngood bond, in the event that he is estopped from claiming upon the Villipigue judgment as against Kerngood's mortgage. The other as to the rights of the several cotenants (so-called) to homestead exemptions. As to the latter, it is difficult to see under the decisions how as mortgagors they can set up their claims to homestead as against their mortgagees. If such exists, as against the judgments of Witte Brothers, as to whom alone they would be available, their rights must be asserted in the manner prescribed by the act of assembly. They cannot be considered here. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

1. That from the proceeds of sale of the land described in the complaint the master do pay, as heretofore ordered, the taxed cost of this case, and also state and county taxes if any be due, and a fee of one hundred dollars to the referee, W. D. Trantham, esq.

2. That he pay to Mrs. Sarah C. DeSaussure, or her attorney, the sum paid by her as trustee for the lien creditors herein at the forfeiture sale of the said lands, together with lawful interest thereon to the day of payment to her, and that she deliver up her patent to be cancelled by the clerk of this court.

3. That from the balance of purchase money in his hands he *pay to the several lien creditors, in the order set down herein, the several debts due to them, with interest calculated thereon in the manner herein determined, having due regard in such payments to the interests and liabilities of the several obligors.

4. That the surplus (if any be), after paying the claims of Witte Brothers, be held subject to the further order of the court.

5. That in the matter of contribution to the defendant, John M. DeSaussure, sr. (if he have any such right), as well as touching the adjustment of the rights of the co-tenants (so-called) inter sese, the parties being all before the court, leave is hereby given to them to apply at the foot of this decree for such orders as they may be advised are necessary and proper.

Witte Bros. appealed upon grounds which were substantially as follows:

1. That his honor erred in not holding that Witte Bros., as assignees of the judgments, were entitled to the payment of their claims to the extent of 4–10 parts, and also 4–28 of one other tenth part of the net proceeds of the sale of the lands ordered to be sold in this case, after the payment of the costs and taxes and referee's fee, and of the amount decreed to be paid to Mrs. S. C. DeSaussure.

2. That his honor erred in not holding that by the decree of Judge Melton the said shares of the said children of H. W. DeSaussure in the said lands were to be transferred to and vest in the other tenants in common, or remaindermen, under the will of Champion only upon the payment by them to the said judgments of the balances which should remain due, after the application thereto of the proceeds of the assets directed in said decree of Judge Melton, to be applied thereto, until which payment they were to have only an inchoate right therein, not to become complete and perfect until the payment by them of the said balances; and that said balances not having been paid, the legal estates and interests of the said children have never been transferred to, or vested in, the other tenants in common, or any of them, and that they derived or acquired under said decree only the equitable right to have title to the said shares of the said children of Henry, upon the payment of the said balances and interest thereon; that *the payment of the said balances was to be the consideration of the transfer or vesting of said shares; and that by the provisions of said decree the right to receive payment of the said consideration was assigned and transferred to the said judgment creditors. And that these appellants, as assignees of the said balances, are entitled to the application to their said claims of the said 4–10 parts and 4–28 of one other tenth part of the net proceeds of the sale of the said lands.

3. That his honor erred in matter of fact in this, that he states that there were no lands in Kershaw county to which the children of Henry W. DeSaussure and the other co-tenants under the will of Champion were entitled, which were sought to be made the subject of partition in the proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas for Kershaw county, referred to in the decree; which statement was erroneous.

4. That his honor erred in not holding that the Court of Common Pleas for Kershaw county had jurisdiction for the partition of the said lands, and that the proceedings in the said cause in Kershaw county were, among other things, for the partition of the said lands among the parties entitled thereto both as remaindermen under the will of Champion and as distributees of Caroline DeSaussure, deceased. And that under the provisions of the act of 1791, the shares of the said children of Henry in the said lands were to vest in the other tenants in common, upon the payment by them of the said balances, which they were ordered in and by the said decree to pay.

5. That his honor erred in his construction of paragraph 7 of Judge Melton's decree, and erred in not holding that said paragraph 7 authorized the execution of a deed of conveyance only of the interest of the then minor, Lloyd C. DeSaussure, in the said lands and personal property and the receipt by his father of such portion of the purchase money as may belong to the said Lloyd; and did not determine or adjudge the interest of the said minor to be one-fifth of the whole of said lands and personalty, nor authorize the sale or conveyance of the shares therein of the children of Henry W. DeSaussure, nor adjudge that those shares had vested in and then belonged to the other co-tenants, but that it only authorized the sale of the interest of the said minor, Lloyd, and that *that interest, as to the shares of said children of Henry, was the right to have title made to them when they should be paid for; and that said paragraph 7 was only a provision for advancing the interests of the minor, Lloyd, without in any way having any reference to or affecting the rights of the children of Henry, or of the said judgment creditors.

W. D. Trantham, administrator, appealed on the following grounds:

1. That his honor erred in decreeing upon the pleadings and evidence "that John M. DeSaussure, by giving the mortgage to Kerngood with a covenant of warranty, is estopped from claiming any right to have his judgment against John M. DeSaussure, jr., paid to the prejudice of the plaintiff, Kerngood, his mortgagee," because no such question was made either in the pleadings or by the evidence, or by way of exception.

2. That his honor erred as matter of law in so decreeing.

3. That his honor erred in not decreeing that Wm. D. Trantham, administrator of J. M. DeSaussure, sr., was entitled to contribution by his co-obligors on the Kerngood bond in the event that he is estopped from claiming upon the Villipigue judgment as against Kerngood's mortgage.

4. That his honor erred in adjudging and decreeing that the master, after paying costs, taxes, &c., "pay to the several lien creditors in the order set down therein the several debts due to them," while no decree is made for the payment of the Villipigue judgment, or any part thereof.

5. That Wm. D. Trantham, administrator, was not, by reason of anything contained in the mortgage of J. M. DeSaussure, sr., and others, to George Alden, estopped from claiming the right to have the judgment of Villipigue against J. M. DeSaussure, jr., paid out of the share of the latter in the lands in preference to all other claimants thereon.

April 14, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On May 27, 1877, John M. DeSaussure, sr., Louisa D. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Sallie D. Davis, Eliza C. DeSaussure, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure, in order to secure their bond for $1,516.65, besides interest, executed and delivered to one George Alden a mortgage of lands thus described: "All that piece or parcel of land situate in the county of Sumter, in said state, containing 2,351 acres, be the same more or less, bounded northwest and north by lands of James M. Davis, northeast and east by the public highway to Stateburg, south by lands of James M. Davis, west by the Wateree River, being lands devised by will of Richard L. Champion to his grandchildren, parties of the first part, and part purchased by the executors for the use of his will," &c. The bond and mortgage were assigned to Tobias Kerngood, who instituted these proceedings to foreclose the mortgage on the premises aforesaid.

It was discovered that there were other creditors of the mortgagors, devisees under the will aforesaid, who claimed to have older and superior liens upon the said lands, and such claimants were made parties defendant, as follows:

First, William D. Trantham, as administrator of John M. DeSaussure, sr., claimed a judgment, M. B. Villipigue v. John M. DeSaussure, jr., entered in Kershaw county, October 10, 1867, for $1,180, besides interest and costs, and in Sumter county, November 30, 1867, and levy made by the sheriff of Sumter on the interest of the defendant in the said premises; which judgment was assigned to John M. DeSaussure, sr., February 22, 1868.

Second, the claim of Ellen Stuart. Eliza C. DeSaussure, A. B. DeSaussure, and J. M. Davis, executed a bond to Ellen Stuart for $500, due January 1, 1875, secured by mortgage July 13, 1874, executed by Eliza C. DeSaussure, of all her interest (said to be one-fifth) in the said Champion lands.

*Third, the Clyburn claim. M. L. Davis, S. A. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., E. C. DeSaussure, and L. C. DeSaussure gave bond to M. D. McDowell, receiver of the Workman estate, June 1, 1876, for $3,500, secured by mortgage of same date, on the aforesaid premises, being the same devised to them by the will of their grandfather, Richard L. Champion.

Fourth, the Simonds claim. J. M. Davis, L. D. Davis, L. C. DeSaussure, Eliza C. DeSaussure, and A. B. DeSaussure gave bond to Louis D. DeSaussure April 25, 1876, for $2.086.24, with interest, &c., secured by mortgage of same date, executed by Eliza C. DeSaussure, Louisa D. Davis, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure, of all their interest in the said premises. This bond has been assigned to Andrew Simonds.

Fifth, the claim of Mrs. Sarah E. DeSaussure, under letters patent conveying to her as lands forfeited to the state for nonpayment of taxes, the Champion lands in Sumter county. As appears by the decree, this claim was adjusted at the hearing below, the claim being abandoned, and the amount of purchase money paid by Mrs. DeSaussure and the interest thereon to be refunded to her out of the proceeds of sale.

Sixth, the Kerngood claim. This is the claim for $1,516.65 secured by mortgage of the same premises first stated, upon which claim these proceedings were instituted. The mortgage bears date May 27, 1877, includes a warranty of the premises mortgaged, and was signed also by John M. DeSaussure, sr.

Seventh, the claim of Witte Brothers. This consists of the aggregate balances of sundry judgments originally obtained by James D. Matheson, James D. Kirkpatrick, administrator, Priscilla B. Perkins, executrix, and Mary E. Shaw, administratrix, against the executrix of Henry W. DeSaussure, deceased, who was one of the grandchildren of R. L. Champion aforesaid; which balances by assignments have become the property of Witte Bros. By a family arrangement in regard to the aforesaid Champion lands, among the devisees thereof

(which will be more particularly referred to hereafter), these judgments were cancelled as against the estate of Henry W. DeSaussure, deceased, and the payment of any balances thereon, was assumed by the five living grandchildren of the said Champion, the *obligors in the Kerngood mortgage, Louisa D. Davis, Sallie D. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Eliza C. DeSaussure, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure. This undertaking was embodied in a consent decree in Kershaw county of date November 12, 1870, but said decree for said balances could not be enrolled at the time, but lately the said balances still unpaid were ascertained and judgments rendered thereon in Kershaw county, February 15, 1882, and transcripts of said judgments entered in the office of the clerk for Sumter county, March 6, 1883; which would give Witte Bros. the last lien upon the said Champion lands.

But they claim that the original arrangement embodied in the consent decree of November 12, 1870, gave them a lien from that date on said Champion lands, at least to the extent of the interest of the children of H. W. DeSaussure, deceased, including both the share proper of their father, Henry, and their interest in the portion of their deceased aunt, Caroline DeSaussure. There is no doubt that the interest of the said devisees in the Champion lands and all other property they may have, is liable for the Witte claim as a debt assumed by them; but it is earnestly denied that they gave any lien for its payment, or that any was involved in the aforesaid transaction, even as to the share of the children of H. W. DeSaussure, which they thereby acquired, so far as the lands now in controversy are concerned.

The issue simply as to priority is the principal question in the case, and we will now proceed to consider it. The facts are somewhat complicated, and in order to make them intelligible, we will go back a little. Richard Lloyd Champion, late of Kershaw county, departed this life November 13, 1813, seized and possessed of a large estate, and leaving a will, of which Benjamin Bineham was the sole qualified executor. By the fourth clause, the testator devised and bequeathed as follows: "I will and bequeath unto my said friends, Duncan McRae, Alexander Matheson, Abraham Blanding, and Benjamin Bineham, all the rest and residue of my estate both real and personal, to them, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns forever; in trust and confidence, and subject to the uses, limitations, and restrictions hereinafter mentioned and expressed; that is to say (after the payment of my debts), that they shall stand seized and *possessed of the same to and for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of my beloved daughter, Eliza Hester Champion, for and during the term of her natural life, and no longer, without being subject to the debts, contracts, or disposal of any person with whom she may at any time intermarry; and from and immediately after the death of my said daughter, Eliza Hester Champion, that then they, the said executors, &c., shall stand seized and possessed of the same in trust to and for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the heirs of the body of my said daughter, who may be living at the time of her death, share and share alike," with some ulterior limitations, &c.

The lands referred to in this case as the "Champion lands in Sumter county," passed under and were devised by the said fourth clause of this will. The said Eliza Hester survived her father, married John M. DeSaussure, Esq., and died March 11, 1864, leaving her surviving, her said husband, and six children, viz., Mary Louisa (who married James M. Davis), John M. DeSaussure, jr., Eliza C. DeSaussure, Sarah Amelia (who married Junius Davis), Lloyd C. DeSaussure, and Caroline E. DeSaussure (who departed this life August 12, 1864, intestate and unmarried), and four grandchildren, viz., George R. DeSaussure, John M. DeSaussure, Douglass B. DeSaussure, and Champion DeSaussure, children of Henry W. DeSaussure, then deceased. The Champion lands have never been divided among the devisees, except as to the interest therein of the children of the aforesaid predeceased son, Henry W. DeSaussure, in respect to which this contention has arisen.

Henry W. DeSaussure was the eldest child of the said Eliza Hester, and having married in her life-time, he was settled off partly by his father, John M. DeSaussure, out of his own means, but for the most part out of the property of the Champion estate. The plantation hereinafter known as the "upper plantation," near Camden, in Kershaw county, was purchased and conveyed to him directly by the vendor, and was stocked by negro slaves. At the time he was thus provided for, December 30, 1856, the property which went into his possession, lands and slaves, were described and valued, and he covenanted as follows: "I agree with my father and mother and as representing my brothers and *sisters, that if it be necessary to bring the said lands and negroes into common valuation and calculation on the death of my father or mother, or either of them, in order to equalize the shares of my brothers and sisters and myself in all or either of the estates of my father or mother, or in the estates devised by my grandfather, Richard L. Champion, to the children of my mother in remainder, I will bring the value of said lands and negroes into such common valuation and calculation, and will hold the said lands and negroes as my own and will account for their value," &c.

Henry W. DeSaussure afterwards went into the Confederate army, and fell at Frazier's farm, near Malvern Hill, in Virginia, on June 30, 1862, leaving a widow, Mary R. DeSaussure, and the four children above named. He left a will, of which his widow was sole executrix, but its provisions are unimportant in this case. The said Henry W. DeSaussure left debts, and the creditors, James D. Matheson, James D. Kirkpatrick, administrator, Priscilla B. Perkins, executrix, and Mary E. Shaw, administratrix, having sued the executrix, Mary R., recovered judgments respectively, and levied the "upper plantation" and all the other property of the testator; and James P. Boswell, the sheriff of Kershaw county, was about to sell the same, when, in December, 1869, the executrix, Mary R., for herself and her aforesaid children, filed a bill in Kershaw county, entitled "Mary R. DeSaussure et al., v. James P. Boswell et al.," making the sheriff and creditors parties, as also the devisees under Champion's will, and praying for injunction, to marshal the assets of the estate, for dower, and "for partition of the estate derived by the children of the said Eliza Hester DeSaussure, under the will of the said R. L. Champion, with the accumulations thereof." &c.

In this proceeding Judge Melton, on November 12, 1870, made a consent decree, the construction and legal effect of which are involved in this case. We cannot encumber this statement, already too long, by reciting it at length. It will be enough to say that it ordered certain property of the testator to be sold, appointed a receiver, gave the widow dower, and as to the "upper plantation," provided as follows: "1. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the 'upper plantation' of the late Henry W. DeSaussure, situate * * be assigned in severalty in fee simple to *the complainants, George R. DeSaussure, Douglass B. DeSaussure, John M. DeSaussure, and R. Champion DeSaussure, as tenants in common, to them and their heirs and assigns for ever, charged, nevertheless, with the payment to the defendant, Louis D. DeSaussure, of the amount of his claim (contracted by the executrix after the death of H. W. DeSaussure) * * * and the said 'upper plantation' above described shall be taken and deemed to be in full discharge and satisfaction of the portions, shares, and interests of the said children, heirs and devisees of the said H. W. DeSaussure, deceased, in the estate of their said father, and in the estate of their grandmother, Eliza Hester DeSaussure, deceased, and in the trust estate devised to them by the will of Richard L. Champion, or conveyed in trust to Benjamin Bineham, his executor, &c. * * *

"6. It is further ordered, that the said James M. Davis, receiver, as aforesaid, after applying the assets remaining in his hands, necessary to make the payments to the said Mary R. DeSaussure, here before directed, do pay therefrom the costs of this suit, &c., and apply the balance of said assets, when collected, to the payment of the demands of the other creditors of the estate of the said Henry W. DeSaussure pro rata, to wit: the said James D. Matheson, James D. Kirkpatrick, Priscilla B. Perkins, and Mary E. Shaw, and that the judgments at law upon the said claims be satisfied before the judgment creditors thereof receive any benefit from this decree. It is further ordered, that the defendants, Mary Louisa Davis, Eliza C. DeSaussure, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Sarah Amelia Davis, and Lloyd C. DeSaussure, do pay to the said creditors respectively, whatever may remain due to them on their said claims after the application thereto of the proceeds of the said assets in the hands of the said James M. Davis, receiver as aforesaid, as hereinbefore directed, &c.

"7. It is further ordered that whenever the said Mary Louisa Davis, Eliza C. DeSaussure, Sarah Amelia Davis, and John M. DeSaussure, jr., the adult children of Eliza Hester DeSaussure, and remaindermen with Lloyd C. DeSaussure, under the will of their grandfather, the said R. L. Champion, may deem it advisable to sell the lands and personalty passing under said will, and also the lands conveyed in trust to Benjamin *Bineham, executor of the said R. L. Champion, as described in the bill, and shall enter into a contract for the sale of the same or any part thereof, that the said John M. DeSaussure, the father and guardian ad litem of the said minor defendant, Lloyd C. DeSaussure, be authorized and required to execute to the purchaser or purchasers thereof a deed of conveyance of the interest of the said Lloyd C. DeSaussure in the said lands and personal property, and that he receive and receipt for such portion of the purchase money as may belong to the said Lloyd C. DeSaussure, to wit: one-fifth portion thereof, and hold the same subject to the further orders of this court or until a general guardian for the said Lloyd C. DeSaussure shall be duly appointed," &c.

As before stated, the balances of the judgments have lately been ascertained and confirmed by the court, and the question now is, whether Witte Bros., owners of these balances, having given up their liens upon the "upper plantation" and the other property of Henry's estate and in lieu thereof taken the decree for the amount against the aforesaid living children of Eliza Hester, must be regarded as holding them as simple debtors without security, or as having a lien from the date of the decree upon their property, at least to the extent of the share of Henry's children, assigned to them by the same decree which required them to pay the debt. The Circuit judge held that the effect of the Circuit decree was to make them responsible simply as debtors for the balances which, after applying the assets of the estate, should finally be due upon the judgments; but gave no lien on the property of those adjudged to pay, not even on the share of Henry's children, assigned to them by the decree. He also held that W. D. Trantham, as administrator of the estate of John M. DeSaussure, sr., who was one of those who executed the Kerngood mortgage containing a covenant of warranty of the premises embraced, was estopped from claiming any right to have the Villipigue judgment against John M. DeSaussure, jr., paid to the prejudice of the plaintiff, Kerngood, his mortgagee; and after providing for costs, fee of the referee, and the reimbursement of Mrs. Sarah C. DeSaussure for money paid at the forfeiture sale of the lands for taxes, fixed, in effect, the priorities of the parties as follows: 1. The claim of Ellen Stuart; 2, the claim of

Clyburn, receiver; *3, the Simonds claim; 4, the Kerngood claim; 5, the Trantham claim on the Villipigue judgment; and 6, the claim of Witte Bros.

From this decree, Witte Bros. and W. D. Trantham, administrator, appeal to this court. The exceptions are long, and need not be stated here, as they are in the brief.

First, as to the claim of Witte Bros. The judgments afterwards assigned to them had liens on all the property of Henry W., which the consent decree cancelled, and adjudged that the living brothers and sisters of Henry W. should pay "whatever may remain due to them (the creditors) on their claims after the application thereto of the proceeds of the assets in the hands of the receiver," &c. Although this was a consent decree, it was a present judgment. It was not less a judgment of the court because it was in conformity to the wishes of the parties. The aggregate amount of the judgments was not stated in terms, but that was known when the judgments were marked satisfied, and it is not entirely clear that the decree could not have been enrolled at that time, subject to be credited as successive payments were made by the receiver. If that had been done and execution issued and levied as required by the code, that would have given a lien upon all the interests in the Champion lands in Sumter or elsewhere.

We incline to think that such was the intention of the parties and of Judge Melton's decree. The creditors had a lien upon the property of Henry W., which in all probability, without regard to the claim of the cotenants for advancements and a money equalization, would have produced payment, as the legal title to the "upper plantation" had been made to Henry W. in his life-time. In order, however, to facilitate a judicious family arrangement, they yielded their lien, and in lieu thereof consented to take the judgment aforesaid against the substituted parties, and it is hardly to be supposed they would have done so without taking a new lien upon the new parties. But be that as it may, there was the difficulty that the aggregate amount was not stated in the decree, and it could not be then foreseen what the exact balance would be; and on that account, probably, the judgment was not enrolled or execution issued in Sumter county until March, 1883. So that, although there was a decree against *the substituted parties, it gave no lien upon their own proper shares in the lands until that time (March, 1883). In the meantime, the co-tenants aforesaid who were adjudged to pay the judgments had encumbered their own interests in the lands by the mortgages before mentioned, and the question now is whether the provisions of the consent decree vested in them such absolute title to the interest of Henry's children as to pass it also under these intermediate incumbrances, although they had not paid the aforesaid balances, which at the time of the relinquishment of that interest they were ordered to pay.

Witte Bros. insist that the bill in the case of Mary R. DeSaussure et al. v. Boswell, Sheriff, et al., in Kershaw county, was, among other things, for partition among the tenants in common of the Champion estate; and that the interest of Henry's children in the lands, being relinquished to the other cotenants upon their paying the judgments aforesaid as the consideration of that relinquishment, the act of 1791 gave the creditors a lien on said interest so relinquished to secure said balances. To this it is objected that the bill was not for partition of intestate property, and that it was filed in Kershaw county, where there was really no property of any value belonging to the tenants in common; but it all lay in Sumter county, and that for these reasons this is not a case for the application of the act of 1791. It is true that the same decree which made the relinquishment of the interest of Henry's children also ordered those to whom the relinquishment was made to pay the judgments, in order to disencumber the "upper plantation" so as to allow it to be taken by Henry's children in exchange for their interest in the other lands, and to that extent the proceeding was substantially a partition of the Champion property; at least to the extent of eliminating therefrom the interest of Henry's children. It is also true that the act of 1791 gave a lien for the purchase money of an intestate's land sold for partition, and by fair construction also upon lands assigned for sums of money necessary to produce equality of partition. See McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq., 158; Burris v. Gooch, 5 Rich., 1. But we do not consider it necessary to decide whether the bill was for the partition of such property as was contemplated by the act, or whether lands in *Sumter county could be legally partitioned by this proceeding in Kershaw county, or whether the technical statutory lien under the act arose out of the proceedings, in favor of the creditors thereby adjudged to be paid.

A consent decree is in effect the agreement of the parties concerned, and we think the rights of the parties must be determined, not by reference to the statute of 1791, but by the construction of Judge Melton's decree. What was the object and intention of that decree? Taking all of its parts together and considering it as a whole, we cannot resist the conclusion that it was intended to embody and carry into effect a tripartite agreement as follows: First, the children of Henry were willing to take the "upper plantation" in full of their share of the Champion estate, if it could be disencumbered. Second, the other cotenants, in order to accomplish this to the relief of the other lands, agreed to disencumber it by paying the judgments. And third, the creditors consented to lift their liens from the "upper plantation" upon the other co-tenants agreeing to pay the balance of their judgments.

The children of Eliza Hester had no connection with the proceedings to settle the affairs of Henry's estate, except in so far as they touched the Champion property. The title to the "upper plantation" had been made to Henry W. and his heirs, and therefore, as property, it was no part of the Champion estate, although the estate of Henry might be liable to account for its value; and it seems to us that the logical and inevitable conclusion must be that the undertaking to disencumber the "upper plantation" (by paying the judgments) was really the consideration of the relinquishment by Henry's children of their share in the Sumter lands. Lifting the judgments was in fact the basis of the whole arrangement, without which nothing could have been done, as appears from the fact that the creditors could derive no benefit from the decree until their judgments were marked satisfied. The agreement to pay the judgments was the very thing that enabled the children of Henry to take the "upper plantation" in exchange for their interest in the Sumter lands.

It is true that the decree does not expressly declare that one was the consideration of the other, but the transaction shows it. *If the payment of the judgments was not expressly stated to be a condition precedent to the vesting absolutely of the interest of Henry's children, both were connected with the same subject-matter, were counterparts of the same scheme, declared by the same consent decree or mutual covenant, and, in our judgment, must be considered as mutual and dependent provisions. Therefore only an equity to the interest of Henry's children passed to the other co-tenants, which they could only mortgage subject to the payment of the judgments to the creditors, who had relieved the "upper plantation" for Henry's children, and thereby become entitled to all their rights.

It is well settled that a vendor of lands, or his assignee, where he has not executed title to the purchaser, but the contract is still executory, has a lien upon the lands sold for the purchase money and may have specific performance of the contract, and the land sold in discharge of it, precisely as if he had executed titles and taken back a purchase money mortgage. Gregorie v. Bulow, Rich. Eq. Cas., 244; Buckner v. Railroad Company, 7 S. C., 328; Walker & Trenholm, v. Kee, 14 Id., 142; Herbemont v. Sharp, 2 McC., 264. In the last case cited, it is said that "in no sense can a sale of lands be regarded as complete until the purchaser has paid his money and the seller has conveyed the land."

We do not think there is anything in the last paragraph of the consent decree which conflicts with this view. One of the cotenants, Lloyd C. DeSaussure, was a minor, and in order to enable the parties to meet promptly any advantageous offer that might be made to purchase the Champion property, John M. DeSaussure, sr., the father of the said minor, was authorized to act for him and to receive his part of the purchase money, until he had a regular guardian appointed. This was in no way inconsistent with the general scheme of the decree by which the co-tenants were to pay the judgments. That was a present obligation, and any rights conferred upon the said minor must be assumed to have been given subject to that obligation, and not in such way as to defeat the whole scheme before arranged. Besides, it is clear that the privilege conferred upon the said minor had no special reference to the interest of Henry's children, but reached to the minor's interest in the whole of the Champion lands.

*Nor do we think that this secret lien, as it is styled, could work a hardship upon others without notice. No one dealing with one tenant in common had the right to suppose that he could encumber the share of another tenant in common; and if he desired information on the subject, he could find it nowhere but in the decree, which would have disclosed the fact that the "upper plantation" had been assigned to the children of Henry in full discharge and satisfaction of their shares in the trust estate devised to them, but at the same time it would have disclosed the other facts, that the living cotenants were directed to pay certain balances of judgments, and that there was no change of title expressly made as to the interest of Henry's children in the Sumter lands. We are constrained to hold that there is a lien upon the share of Henry's children in the Sumter lands, to secure the balance of the judgments aforesaid, commencing November 12, 1870, and upon the interest proper of all the other tenants in common from March, 1883, when the judgments were renewed and lodged in Sumter county.

What, then, is the amount of that share, so far as the creditors are concerned? If this were an original question, there could be little doubt about it. The lands were a part of the estate of Champion, and fell under the fourth clause of his will, which devised them to trustees for the sole and separate use of his daughter, Eliza Hester, during her life, and "from and immediately after her death, that then the said trustees shall stand seized and possessed of the same in trust to and for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the heirs of the body of my said daughter who may be living at the time of her death, share and share alike." Eliza Hester died March 11, 1864, leaving alive six children, viz.: Mrs. Mary L. Davis, John M. DeSaussure, jr., Eliza C. DeSaussure, Mrs. Sarah A. Davis, Lloyd C. DeSaussure, and Caroline DeSaussure (who afterwards died August 12, 1864, unmarried and intestate), and four grandchildren, viz.: George R., Douglass, Blanding, and Champion DeSaussure, children of a predeceased son, Henry W. DeSaussure.

Assuming that the grandchildren as well as the children were "heirs of her body then living," the question is made whether they took per stirpes through their father who was not living at *the time of the death of the life tenant, or per capita "share and share alike" with the children, making ten instead of seven original shares. Although described as "heirs," the remaindermen did not take as "heirs" by descent, but as purchasers under the will. In such cases, after much discussion and some difference of opinion, it seems to have been settled as a rule of construction, that "wherever, by the terms of description, in a devise or grant, resort must be had to the statute of distributions for the purpose of ascertaining the objects of the gift, resort must also be had to the statute to ascertain the proportions in which the donees shall take, unless the instrument making the gift indicates the intention of the donor that a different rule of distribution shall be pursued," &c. Campbell v. Wiggins, Rice Ch., 10; Lemacks v. Glover, 1 Rich. Eq., 141; Rochell v. Tompkins, 1 Strob. Eq., 114; Collier v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq., 555 [55 Am. Dec. 653].

The terms of the devise here being "to heirs of the body," imposed the necessity of referring to the statute to ascertain who were such "heirs," and if the devise had stopped there, the children of Henry W. would undoubtedly have taken in the manner prescribed by the statute. That is to say, they would have represented their father and taken together per stirpes his share —one-seventh part of the estate, besides their distributive portion of the share of their deceased aunt, Caroline. But the superadded words, "share and share alike," imply equality of division, and we think made the exceptional case "when the instrument creating the gift indicates the intention of the donor." Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq., 543 [55 Am. Dec. 646]; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C., 531 [36 Am. Rep. 716]. This latter case well expresses it: "Thus where, as in Freeman v. Knight, 2 Ired. Eq., 72, the testator directed that certain personal property 'should be sold and the proceeds equally divided between my legal heirs,' it was held that though a resort to the statute was necessary, in order to ascertain who were the persons embraced in the class to whom the bequest was made, there was no such necessity to refer to the statute to ascertain the mode of distribution because the testator had himself determined that, by directing an equal division, and hence the proceeds of sale should be distributed amongst the widow and children and the children of pre*deceased children per capita and not per stirpes." We think that the same must be said here of the words "share and share alike."

But it is urged that the question as between these parties is res adjudicata; that it was adjudged in the Kershaw case of Mary R. DeSaussure and her children against Boswell, sheriff, and others, before referred to, that the children of Henry W. represented their father and took among them only one-seventh part of the estate, and their distributive part of their aunt Caroline's share; and that those creditors who were parties to that proceeding and agreed to take that interest, cannot go back to the will, and under a strict construction thereof now claim more. It seems to us that there is force in this view. It is true that the precise point was not formally decided by the consent decree; but at that time such was manifestly the understanding of all the parties, including the counsel engaged as well as the judge who pronounced the decree. The bill filed in behalf of the children of Henry W. in setting out the parties entitled to the Champion property, stated their claims as follows: "Your infant orators who are entitled to take among them the one-sixth part of said estate, and the other parties in interest each one-sixth."

This statement did not discriminate nicely as to their interest in the estate of their deceased aunt, Caroline; but regarding her separate share as simply absorbed in the general estate, did distinctly claim per stirpes through their deceased father. And the consent decree itself, which only put in force the covenants of the parties, recognized the same construction. In assigning the "upper plantation" to the children of Henry, "to be taken and deemed to be in full discharge and satisfaction of the portion, share, and interest of the said children in the Champion estate," the decree incidentally refers to what was the share of one of the remaindermen, viz., the minor, Lloyd C. DeSaussure, after the interest of Henry's children had been eliminated, and declares it to be "one-fifth portion thereof."

In considering the rights of the creditors, we have construed that consent decree according to what we conceived to be its object and intent taken as a whole; and we are of opinion that in reference to the rights of the remaindermen it should be construed in the same manner, and that the creditors, who were par*ties and consented to the arrangement on that basis, should be held to stand by it, even if there was an honest mistake of law involved in it. Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq., 354; Reese v. Holmes, 5 Rich. Eq., 531; Cuningham v. Cuningham, 20 S. C., 317. "One who accepts the terms of a contract must accept the contract as a whole. He cannot accept part and reject the rest." Big. Est., 511. Thus, considering the creditors estopped from changing the elements of the arrangement as understood and acted on by all parties at the time, the aggregate share of Henry's children must be taken to be as follows: as remaindermen under the will representing their father, and taking one-seventh of the whole estate; and as distributees of their aunt Caroline (counting her father as distributee), one-seventh of another original seventh.

This brings us to the question of estoppel as to the Villipigue judgment, which is not free from difficulty. John M. DeSaussure, sr., became the owner by assignment of the Villipigue judgment against John M. DeSaussure, jr., which, as appeared before, is the oldest lien on the undivided interest of the said John M., jr. Afterwards, John M., the father, joined in the bond and mortgage to Alden, assigned to Kerngood. This mortgage was also executed by John M., jr., along with his brothers and sisters. That mortgage contained a warranty in these words: "And the parties do hereby bind themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said George Alden, heirs, and assigns, for and against his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, lawfully claiming, or to claim, the same or any part thereof." And it is now claimed that it was error on the part of the Circuit judge to hold that W. D. Trantham, as administrator of John M. DeSaussure, sr., is estopped from setting up the judgment to the prejudice of the rights of Kerngood.

Several preliminary objections are made to the alleged warranty in the Kerngood mortgage. It is said that the words used did not clearly express a general warranty of the premises. There seems to have been some transposition of its different parts, as if a mistake had been made in filling blanks; but there can be no serious doubt that the parties intended to execute a *general warranty in the usual form. It is also suggested that the question of estoppel was not made "either in the pleadings or by the evidence or by way of exception." The complaint did allege that the judgment had been "paid," and the peculiar defence of estoppel was one of law, and arose out of the facts proved. In settling the priorities, it was necessary to decide it.

Then what was the effect of the warranty in the Kerngood mortgage? If it had been an absolute conveyance of the premises to Alden, with a general warranty, which has been held to include several covenants, and among them one of quiet enjoyment, and that of free from all encumbrances, it is plain the warranty would have been broken by the existence of an outstanding judgment having a lien upon the premises, and the covenantee might have recovered against his covenantors, or their respective representatives, the amount of damages caused to him by said encumbrance. Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich., 380, and authorities. We do not see why the same consequence should not follow from a warranty in the mortgage, when it is proposed to foreclose it and claim the land to pay the debt for which it was a security. This consequence results simply from the existence of the encumbrance, without regard to who may be the owner of it.

In such case if the incumbrance is owned and enforced by a stranger the only remedy for the mortgagee would be an action at law for damages upon the broken covenant of warranty. But when it happens that such incumbrance is owned by the warrantor himself or his representative a court of equity seizes hold of that coincidence, and, in order to prevent circuity of action declares an estoppel. "Covenants for quiet enjoyment in themselves are said to be as effectual by way of estoppel as words of conveyance. The doctrine seems to rest upon the same grounds as that concerning the estoppel of a grantor in fee with warranty to set up an outstanding title against his grantee, namely, that of prevention of circuity of actions. Should the grantor, having acquired a paramount title, attempt to disturb and regain the possession of his grantee, the latter would be entitled to set up the covenant for quiet possession by way of rebutter; and this, it would seem, would as effectually operate against the grantor as if he had made a direct conveyance of the land." Big. Est., 304. *A mortgagor by a mortgage containing the usual covenants of seizin and warranty is estopped to deny the title of the mortgagee. Jones Mort., § 662.

We do not think it was error to hold that Trantham, the administrator of John M. DeSaussure, sr., is estopped from claiming any right to have the Villipigue judgment paid to the prejudice of the plaintiff Kerngood, his mortgagee. But it seems to us that it was error to remove that judgment from its place in the line of priorities and place it behind Kerngood, thus pushing up into its place the next succeeding liens in their order. We cannot see that the estoppel as to Kerngood should be made to enure to the benefit of the intermediate mortgagees, who took their liens subject to that of the judgment and prior mortgages duly recorded, and cannot in any way be injured by the covenant of warranty executed subsequently. In order that the intermediate mortgagees may simply hold their places unaffected by the warranty in the Kerngood mortgage, it seems to us that the Villipigue judgment should keep its place at the head of the line of priorities; but that the estoppel should be affected by regarding as assigned to Kerngood so much of the Villipigue judgment as may be necessary to reimburse him for the damage he may sustain by the enforcement of the judgment. If Kerngood should be paid by the sale of the property, then he has suffered no damage, and the administrator, Trantham, will be entitled to the proceeds of the judgment. If he is not paid, Kerngood will be entitled to the proceeds of the judgment, or so much thereof as may be necessary to indemnify him for damage caused thereby.

We conclude, that after paying the expenses and Mrs. Sarah E. DeSaussure, as provided by the Circuit decree, the priorities in respect to date will stand as follows: I. The Villipigue judgment, with the rights of Kerngood in regard thereto, as herein stated. II. The claim of Witte Bros., as to the share of Henry's children in the Sumter lands, as herein explained and limited. III. The Ellen Stuart claim, as set down in the decree. IV. The Clyburn claim as stated. V. The Simonds claim as stated. VI. The Kerngood claim, with rights in the Villipigue judgment, as herein stated. VII. The remainder of the claim of Witte Bros.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit *Court be modified in conformity with the conclusions herein announced, and in all other respects be affirmed.

HERRING & CO. v. CANNON.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Chattel Mortgages ⇐6, 85, 194.]

A merchant purchased and received possession of an iron safe with his name painted thereon by the vendor, and for the purchase money gave to the vendor two notes, to each of which was added the stipulation that "in accordance with the terms of an agreement for the purchase of the safe, said vendors do not part with any title thereto until the purchase money has been fully paid." Held, that this was "an instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage," which, under the second section of the act of 1843, required recording to be valid against subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. Cases reviewed and Talmadge v. Oliver, 14 S. C., 522, explained.

[2. Sales ⇐473.]

The act of 1843 was intended to embrace such conditional sales, and to render all secret liens, whether verbal or written, invalid as against the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice.

Such safe having been attached and sold as the property of the vendee, at the suit of subsequent creditors without notice, the purchaser at such sale has good title to the safe, although having notice of the vendor's claim. The opinion states the case.

April 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for the recovery *of possession, and for damages for the detention, of one patent Champion Iron Safe, claimed by the plaintiffs, valued at $105.69, and alleged to be illegally detained by the defendant, Peter G. Cannon. It appeared that in August, 1880, the plaintiffs sold the safe to one E. S. Griffin for $105.63, payable January 1 and April 1, 1881. The plaintiffs delivered the safe to the purchaser, with the name "E. S. Griffin" conspicuously painted on it. Notes were given for the purchase money, with a condition embodied in these words: "This note having been given to said Herring & Co. in part payment for a safe, and in accordance with the terms of an agreement for the purchase thereof, said Herring & Co. do not part with any title thereto until the purchase money has been fully paid."

Some time after the purchase of the safe, and while it was in his possession, the said Griffin contracted debts with Steffens & Werner and P. H. Hanes & Co., who had no notice whatever of the claim of Herring & Co. to the safe. These creditors sued Griffin, and recovered judgment against him, having in the meantime attached the safe, which was sold by the sheriff under an order of court in said process. At the time of the sale, the sheriff had been notified of plaintiffs' claim, but no public notice was given of it on the day of sale. James F. Izlar, Esq., who had also heard of the claim of plaintiffs, became the purchaser at the price of $55, which was paid upon the judgments of said creditors. Izlar afterwards sold and delivered the safe to the defendant, who was sued for the same.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that the condition on the note being in writing was effective "not only between the parties, but as to all other persons whatsoever; that at the time this contract was made, the law did not require that it should be recorded, or that notice should be given of its existence." Under this charge, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because it being in evidence that one E. S. Griffin purchased the safe from the plaintiffs, and gave for the purchase money thereof two notes, to each of which was added the condition [as before stated], and thereupon the safe was delivered to him, with his name, E. S. Griffin, conspicuously painted thereon *and remained in the possession of the said Griffin until seized under an attachment at the suit of subsequent creditors of the said Griffin, his honor, the presiding judge, erred in instructing the jury that 'at the time this contract was made, the law did not require that it should be recorded, or that notice should be given of its existence.'

2. "Because his honor erred in instructing the jury that such a contract, at the time above mentioned, was valid against subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without being recorded or actual notice.

3. "Because his honor erred in instructing the jury that the decision in Talmadge v. Oliver must necessarily conclude this case."

Conditional sales of personal property delivered, annexing a secret condition to a visible transaction appearing to the world unconditional, gave rise, for many years, to much discussion and some difference of opinion in our courts. It may be safely stated that there was a general concurrence that such contracts might be enforced between the parties who made them; but as possession is prima facie evidence of title in relation to personal property, there were obvious difficulties as soon as they touched the rights of subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers, who dealt with the apparent owner on the faith of title, springing from his unexplained possession. Such conditions in sales, whether verbal or in writing, were held valid as to the parties themselves and their subsisting creditors down to 1839. See Dupree v. Harrington, Harp., 391; Reeves v. Harris, and Bailey v. Jennings, 1 Bail. 563. But in that year was decided by a divided court the case of Bennett v. Sims, Rice, 426, which may be regarded as the leading case in sustaining such secret conditions, as it went so far as to hold that there was really no difference between a verbal and written condition, and in that case sustained one that was merely verbal.

That case, however, expressly excepted and reserved the question as to subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers. In delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Errors, Judge Earle said: "It is a remarkable coincidence in all the cases, beginning with Dupree v. Harrington, supra, down to the *case under consideration, that neither the rights of subsequent creditors nor the rights of subsequent purchasers without notice are at all involved. * * * In regard to subsequent creditors, it will be time enough to provide for them when they complain. Whenever the vendor's right shall come in conflict with the claims of those who become creditors after the transfer of possession, then the court will endeavor so to modify the rule, or restrict its operation, as to protect the rights of bona fide creditors who may have trusted the supposed purchaser on the faith of the property in his possession."

In 1839 the law was thus announced, with a doubtful judicial saving as to the rights of subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers, and immediately thereafter the legislature (possibly moved thereto by the decision in Bennett v. Sims) interposed, and passed the act of 1843, "To amend the law in relation to recording mortgages and to regulate the lien thereof" (11 Stat., 256), afterwards substantially embraced in the general registry act of 1876, and re-enacted as section 2346 of the general statutes. This act has three sections. The first provides that "no mortgage or other instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage of real estate shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers, &c., unless the same shall be recorded," &c. The second provides that "no mortgage or instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage of personal property, shall be valid so as to affect the rights of subsequent creditors or purchasers, &c., unless the same shall be recorded," &c. And the third declares "that every verbal agreement between the vendor and the vendee of personal property, whereby the vendor, who has parted with the possession thereof to the vendee, shall reserve to himself any interest in the same, shall be null and void as to subsequent creditors or purchasers for valuable consideration without notice."

It is insisted for the defendant that the paper in contention here is an "instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage," which by the act was required to be recorded, and, not having been, is null and void as to the subsequent creditors of Griffin, the vendee. By the contract the vendors, who parted with the possession of the safe to Griffin, undertook to reserve to themselves an interest in the same, and therefore it is precisely such a *contract as is denounced by the third section of the act, and if it were merely verbal would certainly be void. But as it is in writing the question is, whether it is such an "instrument in the nature of a mortgage" as is required to be recorded by the second section of the act. It is plain that the purpose of the act in all its sections was to protect the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers against secret liens, and the third section shows that such contracts as the one before us was, in the contemplation of the framers of the act. The mischief aimed at was the secret nature of the contract, not whether it was verbal or in writing, as to which distinction, Judge Earle in speaking for the Court of Errors in the case of Bennett v. Sims, declared that he "had tortured his faculties to conceive a ground of difference except only as to the facility and mode of proof."

There being, then, in this respect as to third parties no difference between a verbal agreement and one in writing, and the legislature having declared the former, incapable of registry, to be absolutely void, it would seem to be the natural and logical conclusion that as to the latter, which is capable of registry, they intended to accomplish the same result by declaring that it should be void unless recorded. We think such was the intention of the act. As was well said by Judge Cothran, in the Circuit decision of Lombard & Co. v. Black, sheriff,[1] "The plain purpose of the statute was to render secret liens upon personal property ineffectual as against subsequent creditors and purchasers bona fide; and this doctrine finds sanction in the very principles of justice itself, especially in this, that where one of two innocent persons is to suffer loss, it should fall on him by whose conduct it was caused."

[1]Decided at Walterboro, June term, 1853.

This view is not only based upon the express words of the act itself, and the principles of justice, but, as we conceive, is supported by the adjudicated cases. The first case that arose after the passage of the act was that of Cochran v. Roundtree, 3 Strob., 222. In that the condition was verbal, and although it was made before the act, it was held to be void. In delivering the unanimous judgment of the court Judge Wardlaw said: "Looking to the dangerous nature of such verbal stipulations (since that time *guarded against by the act of 1843, which amounts to a legislative declaration concerning a debated point of law), to the policy which forbids a seller from availing himself of a secret condition annexed to a visible transaction that appears to be unconditional, whereby an innocent purchaser has been deluded, and to the great advantage of having an inflexible rule of law rather than the uncertain determination of a jury, this court is unwilling to go beyond the case of Bennett v. Sims. Stopping where that stopped, we hold that, although the condition may have been binding on Williams, it did not bind a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice."

The next case in which the act was referred to was that of McCorkle v. Montgomery, 11 Rich. Eq., 132. It is true that was in reference to the somewhat analogous doctrine of the equity of the vendor as to land; but in the course of his opinion Chancellor Dunkin said: "While something is due to the vendor who parts with his property, not less certainly is due to the subsequent creditor who has trusted the ostensible as well as the legal owner of the estate, without any knowledge of a secret incumbrance. Upon this subject the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat, 46, [5 L. Ed. 393], is instructive: 'To the world,' says he, 'the vendee appears to hold the estate, divested of any trust whatever, and credit is given him, in the confidence that the property is his own in equity as well as law. A vendor, relying upon this lien, ought to reduce it to a mortgage, so as to give notice of it to the world. If he does not, he is, in some degree, accessory to the fraud committed on the public, by an act which exhibits the vendee as the complete owner of the estate on which he claims a secret lien. It would seem inconsistent with the principles of equity, and with the general spirit of our laws, that such a lien should be set up in a court of chancery to the exclusion of bona fide creditors.' It may be added that the act of 1843, requiring all mortgages of real estate, however formal and perfect, to be recorded within sixty [now forty] days, may well be regarded as a legislative declaration of the prohibitory policy of the country against any such secret liens."

The next case, in the order of time, was that of McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq., 223 [94 Am. Dec. 164]. That was as to a condition in writing *under the very section of the act involved here, in which Mr. Justice Inglis delivered an elaborate and exhaustive judgment, which is absolutely conclusive of the question here, if the paper in this case belongs to the same category as the one in that, and must, as there, be regarded as an "instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage." Upon that point we have no doubt. The paper in that case was in these words: "For the full and better securing of W. G. McKnight from all liability for which he may become indebted as my surety on any notes, &c., I have bargained, sold, and delivered unto the said W. G. McK. my two negro fellows, Bill and James, to have and to hold the same as his own right and title, until he shall become relieved from all indebtedness incurred as security as aforesaid." In this case notes were given with the condition inserted: "This note, having been given to said Herring & Co. in part payment for the purchase thereof, and in accordance with the terms of an agreement for the purchase thereof, said Herring & Co. do not part with any title thereto until the purchase money has been fully paid." Was not this in all respects as much a mortgage as the bill of sale to McKnight? Here was a sale and delivery of the property, marked with the name of the purchaser, price agreed upon, and notes taken, but with a condition purporting to retain title in the property as a security for the purchase money. It is altogether unmeaning for the parties to say that it should not amount to a sale, when the transaction exhibits every element of a sale and transfer of ownership. It seems to us that the conditional note was an "instrument of writing in the nature of a mortgage."

The next in order was the recent case of Talmadge v. Oliver, 14 S. C. 522 cited and relied on in the court below. That was a case in which the contract was sued upon within the time for recording, and therefore the ruling did not touch the question as to the necessity of recording. So far as reference was made to the character of the paper, it was not at all in conflict with the view here presented, but on the contrary precisely in accord with the cases above cited. The chief justice, in delivering the judgment of the court, distinctly declared the conditional contract to be in the nature of a mortgage. He said: "But at all events, as to this case the agreement held by the appellant may be re*garded as an equitable mortgage. It has all the elements of a mortgage. It was to secure a contract. The property was designated and the title reserved to insure the performance of the contract, and it is prior in date to respondent's mortgage. True, it was not recorded, and being without a witness, there might have been some difficulty in having it recorded; but the action was commenced within the time allowed for recording, so that respondent had actual notice within the time. This was sufficient and supplied the place of recording," &c. The last paragraph shows conclusively that the question of recording was not in the case, and the adjudication rests on that fact.

Upon the whole, considering the time and occasion of the passage of the act of 1843, the state of the law then recently announced in the case of Bennett v. Sims, and the policy of our law as to registry, as well as its express terms and the adjudications under it, we must conclude that it was intended to embrace such conditional sales as the one in this case, and in that way to cut up, root and branch, all secret liens, whether written or verbal, in respect to the rights of subsequent creditors and purchasers for valuable consideration without notice.

The plaintiffs' "contract in the nature of a mortgage" was not recorded as required, and the only remaining question is whether the defendant, Cannon, is entitled to the protection given to subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers within the meaning of the act of 1843. It will be observed that the act embraces two distinct classes of persons, viz., subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers, which have no necessary connection with each other; and in order to claim the protection afforded, it is not necessary that a party should unite in himself the character of both; but it is enough if he can show that he is entitled to the rights of either a subsequent creditor or a bona fide purchaser without notice. It is conceded in the case that the safe was seized and sold under legal process issued by subsequent creditors without notice, and therefore it is unnecessary to inquire whether Izlar, the first purchaser, or Cannon, to whom he sold, had actual notice of plaintiffs' claim at the time of their respective purchases. The purchase at the sheriff's sale for the benefit of suing creditors, admitted to be subsequent creditors without notice, gave *to the purchaser that protection which is extended to the class to which the creditor in execution belonged, whether he, the purchaser, had actual notice or not. As was said by Mr. Associate Justice Inglis, in the case of McKnight v. Gordon, supra: "To guarantee to one a right to sell, and deny to all others a right to buy, would be solecism in law. It would be imputing folly as well as mischief to the law under such circumstances to say that it either permitted the (subsequent) creditor alone to buy or precluded him also as a purchaser with, though a creditor without, notice."

But without now going into the learning upon the subject of notice to different successive purchasers of the same property, we deem it sufficient to refer to the aforesaid case of McKnight v. Gordon for the argument and authorities upon the subject. That case is so full and clear and so exactly in point that it must be conclusive of this. It was there held that "the act of 1843 protects from an unrecorded mortgage two distinct classes of purchasers at sheriff's sales: (1) those who purchase without notice, even where the debt was contracted before the mortgage was executed; and (2) those who purchase for satisfaction of debts contracted with a subsequent creditor without notice; and here it is immaterial whether the purchaser had notice or not." We think the defendant is entitled to the protection extended to those who fall under the second class above stated, whether he or his vendor, Izlar, had notice or not.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. I concur in this opinion on the ground that the paper in question must be regarded as a writing in the nature of a mortgage of personal property, and therefore covered by the second section of the act of 1843, incorporated into the general statutes.

Judgment reversed.

*WHALEY v. STEVENS.

[1. Easements ⟸3.]

The distinction between a right of way in gross, and one appurtenant, is marked and important, the former being a personal privilege which dies with the possessor, while in the latter it inheres in the land to which it is appurtenant, is essentially necessary to its enjoyment, and passes with it; and a right of way appurtenant must have a terminus on the land to which appurtenant.

[2. Easements ⟸3.]

Plaintiff alleged a right of way from a public road bounding his plantation across defendant's lands to a boat landing, and that the right of way was for the use of plaintiff's plantation and those connected with it. Held, that this was an allegation of a right of way in gross.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. ⟸3.]

[3. Pleading ⟸248.]

An amendment to the complaint by inserting an allegation that the right of way begins on plaintiff's land, would substitute a claim of a right of way appurtenant for that of a right of way in gross, and so substantially change the claim. Such amendment, therefore, cannot be allowed.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker for appellant.

Mr. Charles Inglesby contra.

April 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff seeks, by this action, to recover damages for the obstruction of a private way which he claims to be entitled to over the land of the defendant, and also to obtain an order restraining the defendant from continuing such obstruction. It will be difficult, if not impossible, to make an intelligible statement of the facts of the case, without reference to the diagram incorporated in the record, which cannot be introduced here, but which should be embraced in the report of the case. But from the view which we take, it will not be necessary to go fully into the facts of the case.

The plaintiff is the owner of a plantation of John's Island known as "Caneslatch," which was devised to him by his father, Wm. S. Whaley, who died in July, 1872, and the defendant is *the owner of another plantation on said Island known as "Seven Oaks," which he acquired by purchase from John H. Screven and wife in 1853. Caneslatch plantation originally lay to the west of the public road to John's Island Ferry, and separated from said road by a portion of Seven Oaks plantation, which lay mainly to the east of said road, between it and Stono River, but extended across said road and joined Caneslatch. Soon after the defendant bought Seven Oaks, and in the same year, he conveyed 300 acres of it lying west of the public road to the plaintiff's father, thus leaving all of the Seven Oaks plantation retained by him lying east of the public road, except the portion designated on the diagram "pine land," on the west side of the road.

The plaintiff, in his complaint, after alleging that he was the owner of Caneslatch plantation, "containing about 600 acres of land, bounding on the east on a public road on said Island," proceeds to allege "that the said plaintiff had a right of way, by means of a road leading from the said public road over the adjoining land of the said defendant, known as the Seven Oaks plantation, to a creek leading into the said Stono River, with horses, carts, carriages, and other vehicles; and further had the right to keep at the landing on said creek such boat or boats as he might desire, and that the right of way was for the use of the said Caneslatch plantation and those connected with it." The defendant in his answer admits that plaintiff is the reputed owner of Caneslatch plantation, "but he denies that he had a right of way by means of a road leading from the public road which bounds the said plantation, over the adjoining land of the defendant, known as the Seven Oaks plantation, to a creek leading into Stono River, * * and he denies that the plaintiff had the right to keep at the landing on said creek such boat or boats as he might desire, and he denies that the right of way, or any right of way, was for use of the said Caneslatch plantation and those connected with it," &c.

The issue thus distinctly presented by the pleadings was whether the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way leading from the public road which constitutes the eastern boundary of Caneslatch plantation to the creek which empties into Stono River.

*A right of way may be in gross, or it may be appendant or appurtenant to land, and the distinctions between the two kinds of rights are very marked and important. In the former, it is a mere personal privilege, which dies with the person who may have acquired it; while in the latter it inheres in the land it. An essential feature of a right of way to which it is appurtenant, is essentially necessary to its enjoyment, and passes with appurtenant is that it must have one of its termini on the land to which it is claimed to be appurtenant.

In view of these undisputed and indisputable legal propositions, what was really the issue presented by the pleadings in this case? Was it anything more than an issue whether plaintiff was entitled to a right of way in gross over the land of the defendant? Can it, by the most liberal construction of the pleadings, be regarded as an issue whether the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way appendant or appurtenant to his Caneslatch plantation? There is no such allegation in the complaint, for certainly the allegation that the right of way claimed "was for the use of the said Caneslatch plantation and those connected with it" cannot be regarded as sufficient, for such an allegation would be equally appropriate to claim of a right of way in gross as to a right of way appurtenant. There is no allegation that the way was necessary for the enjoyment of the land known as Caneslatch, or that it was in any way appendant or appurtenant thereto.

But a more fatal objection is that, in describing the right of way in question, it is not alleged that it begins on the Caneslatch plantation, or that it even leads from said plantation. Indeed, from the description of the way as given in the complaint, it does not appear that it touches Caneslatch plantation at any point or reaches to it. The allegation is, "leading from the public road," &c. Now, even adopting the theory that the public road being the boundary of Caneslatch plantation on the east, the plaintiff owns to the middle of the road, still the complaint cannot be construed as alleging that the way in question has one of its termini on the Caneslatch plantation; for as the creek, which is one of the termini named, lies east of the public road, and as the defendant owns the land adjoining the road on the east, and consequently the eastern half of said road, the western as well as *the eastern terminus of the way, as described in the complaint, would be on the land of the defendant, and not on the land of the plaintiff. In Northeastern Railroad Company v. Payne, 8 Rich., 177, a point which seems to be identical with this was decided. The charter of the company authorized the construction of a railroad from Charleston, and it was held that from was a word of exclusion, and could not be construed to mean from within, and therefore the charter of the company did not allow it to cross the boundary line of the city. It seems to us, therefore, that the only issue presented by the pleadings was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the right of way as an easement in gross, and when he failed, as it is manifest he did, to establish any such right of way, the complaint should have been dismissed or the jury directed to find a verdict for the defendant.

It is claimed, however, by the respondent that if we should take this view of the case, then he should be allowed to amend his complaint by inserting an allegation that the right of way begins on the Caneslatch plantation. It is very true that the provisions of the code in respect to amendments are very liberal, but there is one qualification in this respect, and that is that the amendment asked for "does not change substantially the claim or defence." Code of 1882, § 194. So that the inquiry is, does the proposed amendment change substantially the claim of the plaintiff? It appears to us that it does. As we have seen, the claim set up in the complaint is a claim to a right of way in gross, and the amendment asked for is to change that claim into a claim to a right of way appurtenant to the land of the plaintiff. These two rights differ substantially, not in form merely, but in their nature and results. The violation of these rights present different and distinct causes of action, which would have to be asserted and established by different and distinct allegations and proofs, and hence we think the proposed amendment would change substantially the claim set up in the complaint, and cannot be allowed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

*Mr. Justice McGOWAN dissenting. I cannot concur in the judgment pronounced by my brethren in this case. It seems to me that the statements of the complaint that the land of plaintiff bounded on the public road, and that he had a right of way leading from the same public road over the adjoining land of the defendant, amounted substantially to an allegation of right of way connecting with his lands. But if held strictly and literally not to be such allegation because of the public road running on the line and interposing an imaginary obstacle, the plaintiff should have leave to amend his complaint. That would not, in my judgment, violate the rule that an amendment should not "change substantially the claim or defence." The plaintiff manifestly intended to claim a right of way appurtenant to his plantation as stated "for the use of the said Caneslatch plantation and those connected with it," and therefore an amendment would not change the nature of the claim, but simply enable him to make perfect his imperfect allegations, which is the very object of amendment.

Judgment reversed.

KENNERTY v. ETIWAN PHOSPHATE COMPANY.

(November Term, 1883.)

[1. Reformation of Instruments ⟸25.]

A complaint alleged that plaintiff had executed to defendant a paper under seal containing a release and covenant not to sue for future damages, without reading the paper so executed and not knowing at the time that such release and covenant were therein inserted, but supposing that this paper, which was sent to him by his attorney, was a copy of another paper previously executed by plaintiff, in which there was no such release or covenant. The complaint contained no allegations of mutual error, nor of fraud, concealment, or imposition by defendant, but only showed a mistake by plaintiff, occurring through no fault of defendant; and judgment was prayed for a reformation of the instrument, and an injunction to restrain defendant from using it in bar of an action by plaintiff for damages. Held, on demurrer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[2. Cancellation of Instruments ⟸24.]

If, under the prayer for general relief, a cancellation could be decreed, still the facts stated made no cause of action, especially as no offer was made to repay the money received by plaintiff from defendant under the terms of the said instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 33–38; Dec. Dig. ⟸24.]

[3. Equity ⟸273.]

*The complaint should have been dismissed, and the Circuit judge erred in granting leave to plaintiff to amend, as no ground appeared for any of the amendments authorized by section 194 of the code of procedure; and the plaintiff cannot, by way of amendment, make a new cause of action, e. g., cancellation of instrument, instead of reformation.

[5. Reformation of Instruments ⟸16.]

An allegation that defendant had violated the agreement furnishes no ground for a reformation of the agreement.

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, April, 1883.

The order of the Circuit judge in this case was as follows:

This matter came on to be heard by the court on a motion to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The question presented is purely one of pleading, in the consideration of which it must be borne in mind that the code of procedure has completely reversed the ancient rule of the common law, which allowed nothing by way of intendment, and required all construction to be made most strongly against the pleadings. In this matter the rule has been substituted in most, if not in all, of the cases, and certainly in ours, that "in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice between the parties." See Code, § 180. "When the allegations of a pleading are indefinite and uncertain, so that the precise nature of the charge or defence is not apparent, the court may require the pleading to be made definite and certain by amendment." This ought not to be, as it is too often, confounded with the remedy by oral demurrer, such as has been interposed here; the provision for amendments is very ample. See chap. VI., title VI., passim.

The complaint should contain a plain, concise, and intelligible statement of the material facts which constitute the ground of relief as they actually exist, and not the legal effect, or as part of those facts, and nothing of the mere evidence or probative matter by which their existence is established. It may as well be conceded, once for all, that the code of procedure is now the only source of authority from which the rules of pleading may be drawn; that its methods have completely supplanted those which *preceded it, and that the latter (which we have abandoned with such evident reluctance) can no longer be appealed to as possessing of themselves any force and authority. Pom. Rem., § 515. The object of the pleading is still, as it has always been, to arrive at a special issue upon a given and material fact; the primary requirement is, that the complaint shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action, not according to their legal effect, as such may appear to the mind of the pleader, but as they actually existed, and must be set forth in ordinary language. Presumptions of law must not be stated.

A demurrer upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, does not necessarily deny the existence of the right or cause of action, but its effect is to raise the issue whether or not the complaint has alleged facts sufficient to put the defendant to his answer. Mr. Pomeroy (§ 519) has ventured to define the term, "cause of action," as follows: "(1) The plaintiff's primary right, and the defendant's corresponding primary duty, whatever be the subject to which these relate, whether of person, character, property, or contract; and (2) The delict or wrongful act or omission of the defendant, by which the primary right or duty have been violated." This seems to be philosophical and sound. The first inquiry then is, obviously, does a cause of action exist here? and, secondly, does the plaintiff's complaint state facts sufficient to put the defendants to their defence by way of answer?

It may be observed that the defendants have not thought it proper or necessary, up to this time, to answer the complaint. Had they done so, it would in no wise have affected the result of this motion. The complaint only is before me, and for the purpose of this motion, every allegation contained in it, which has been properly averred, must be taken to be true. Whether the defendants have the right thus to attack the complaint before an issue is made up by answer, demurrer, or notice of appearance (which would have taken the case to a docket), for other reason than to require the plaintiff to make the allegations thereof "more definite and certain," has not been questioned by him, and may therefore be considered as having been waived.

The plaintiff and defendant are contiguous land owners on *Charleston Neck, the one a truck farmer, the other engaged in the manufacture of commercial fertilizers. The occupation of his premises by the former is prior, in point of time, to the possession of theirs by the latter. Several years ago, the plaintiff, being aggrieved and injured in his property by the action of the defendants in the legitimate business in which they were engaged, brought suit in this court and recovered a verdict for $2,000 damages against the defendants. That proceeding not being for a public nuisance, but for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, the damages given by the jury could in no event be estimated beyond the period at which the verdict was rendered.

It would seem that, as a right of action existed in favor of the plaintiff then, as was shown by the result of the suit, the same cause, if continued, would produce like results, with like remedy to the plaintiff for future damages; and suits toties quoties might have been instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants; and thus an abatement of the nuisance would have been accomplished by means of the increased severity of the verdicts of successive juries in punishment of the contumacy or obstinacy of the defendants. If, therefore, the plaintiff has not deprived himself of this continuing right by the terms of the so-called agreement (a fact to be determined, according to my view of the matter, at a future stage of this suit, and upon an issue differently made up to this), and if he has sustained damages at the hands of the defendants, as he alleges in his complaint, and as must be conceded under the rule of law applicable to the defence by way of demurrer, then is the conclusion irresistible that a cause of action exists against the defendants in this behalf.

Secondly. Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? The principle of law under which this proposition will be considered, and which commands the support of an array of authorities almost interminable, is well stated in the case of Morse v. Gilman, 16 Iowa, 504, citing a line of New York cases to be found in 4 Duer, 610, 5 Id., 697, and E. D. Smith, 554. It is as follows: "A complaint to be overthrown by demurrer must be wholly insufficient. If the complaint to any extent, or any portion of it, presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if a good cause of action can be gathered from it, it will *stand. Contrary to the common law rule, every reasonable intendment and presumption is to be made in favor of the pleading, and it will not be set aside on demurrer unless it be so fatally defective that, taking all the facts to be admitted, the Court can say they furnish no cause of action whatever."

The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he signed a certain paper which contains a stipulation on his part not to claim future damages from the defendants, and a covenant not to sue therefor; but he most positively denies that he was advised of, or in any way had knowledge of, such stipulation and covenant. That the said paper was procured from his attorney at law, the late M. P. O'Connor, Esq., "by overtures made by, or in behalf of, the said defendant corporation." That, admitting the efficacy and binding effect otherwise of such stipulation and covenant, the defendants themselves have violated the terms of said agreement by enlarging the capacity of their works, by reason whereof he claims to have been released from the terms of the said agreement. In paragraph 1 he alleges that "irreparable damage" will be done to him by the operation of the defendants' works. The effect of the demurrer is to admit the truth of these allegations.

Mistake, overreaching, breach of agreement, are all grounds of equitable jurisdiction and relief. These are all alleged in the complaint, and admitted by the demurrer. It is true that the complaint does not, in terms, allege that improper means (necessarily) were used in procuring the so-called release; in other words, fraud eo nomine is not charged; but he does allege that, "by overtures made by, or in behalf of, the said defendant corporation," this arrangement was effected with his attorney, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, without his assent or intelligent approval. Fraud is a mixed question of law and fact; so also, for example, is the term "indebted"; and I am not sure that each of these used in a complaint as the statement of a legal conclusion would not, under the code, be obnoxious to the rules of correct pleading. The correct rule seems to require the statement of facts, the proof of which establishes the fraud or debt, as the case may be.

It is easy to conceive of a case wherein a demurrer sustained would be an act of mercy to him against whom it operates, in *relieving him of the agony of protracted suffering and of inevitable death; but it is a blessing in such complete disguise as rarely to be recognized or appreciated; and it is so harsh, that, under the liberal practice of the code as to amendments, it should not be resorted to, unless the case is manifestly immedicable. If I were even more doubtful as to the correctness of the conclusions attained, I should hesitate to sustain the demurrer interposed here. Thus to deny the right of a hearing to the plaintiff upon the merits of his case (if it have any), would be to cut him off from all hope of redress; and if "irreparable damage" has been done to him, as admitted by the demurrer, the court itself would perpetuate the wrong. No such result can occur to the defendant. The costs and annoyance of litigation are by no means inconsiderable, but they are, in comparison with even possible "irreparable damage," but as the small dust of the balance. Nor can the statutes of limitations avail the defendants upon this motion, as contended for in argument. Section 94 of the code limits this form of defence to the answer. Jones v. Massey, 9 S. C., 376.

The defendants have supported their motion with very elaborate arguments, with the enumeration of many indisputable propositions of law, and with much authority. Such may be of great service in a future stage of this proceding, when the merits of the case come on to be considered, provided such a state of facts shall then be made to appear as will justify their application. A consideration of these at this time, in the view of the case taken by me, would be premature and unnecessary.

Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged: 1. That the motion to dismiss the complaint be, and the same is hereby, refused. 2. That the defendants have leave to answer the complaint within twenty days after they shall have had notice hereof; and that the plaintiff have leave to amend his complaint if advised that it is necessary to do so. 3. Let the costs of this motion abide the final result of the cause.

The defendant appealed upon numerous and lengthy exceptions, which raised the precise points considered and determined by this court.

Messrs. B. J. Whaley and A. T. Smythe, for appellant.

*Messrs. Robert Chisolm and A. G. Magrath, contra.

April 26, 1884. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. John Kennerty, plaintiff, respondent, owns a farm on Charleston Neck, on which he has for years been engaged in raising vegetables, strawberries, and other crops for the markets of Charleston, New York, and other places. Since he has been engaged in this business, the Etiwan Phosphate Company, defendant, appellant, has erected upon an adjoining plantation large works for manufacture of commercial fertilizers, in the preparation of which quantities of sulphuric acid are used, producing certain gases, fumes, and vapors, very injurious to both vegetable and animal life, and from which great injury resulted to the respondent; on account of which he brought action against the respondent and recovered a verdict for the sum of $2,000 and costs of suit.

From this verdict the defendant gave notice of appeal, pending which negotiations commenced between the attorneys of the respective parties for a settlement of the controversy. In the meantime, additional injury had resulted to the respondent. During these negotiations, an agreement was prepared by respondent's attorney, M. P. O'Connor, Esq., which respondent signed, in which, in consideration of the amount of the verdict and an additional sum of $250 to be paid him, with the costs of suit and the raising by appellants of their chimneys through which the gases and vapors escaped, twenty-five feet higher than formerly, he accepted the same as satisfaction of all damages up to that time, and agreed to discontinue the action then pending. It does not appear whether this paper ever went into the possession of the appellants, or that they knew of its execution. It is stated that they never assented to it.

After this, the negotiations between the attorneys continued, of which respondent alleges, however, that he had no knowledge, and subsequently as alleged, respondent's attorney sent him a second paper by his (respondent's) son, who received it directly from his attorney, Mr. O'Connor, with the request that he would take it and have it signed. That the respondent supposing, as he alleges, that it was not different from the previous paper, *signed and returned it to his attorney. This paper, in addition to the stipulations in the first, contained a release and waiver from all future damages resulting from the same cause of which respondent had previously complained, and a covenant under seal that he would not thereafter sue the appellant company for such damages as might, or would, be suffered by him in the future. This second paper was signed by the respondent, in the presence of T. Massalon and T. J. Kennerty, June 10, 1876, and at the bottom is endorsed a statement, signed by Mr. O'Connor, that said deed of release was read over again to John Kennerty, and acknowledged as his deed, in his presence, and dated June 17, 1876.

Notwithstanding these facts, the respondent avers in his complaint that he supposed the second paper was the same as the first; that he was never consulted by his attorney as to any change; that he had no knowledge as to the additional stipulations; that had he been informed thereof, he would have unhesitatingly refused to execute any such release or covenant; that he never authorized or empowered his said attorney to enter into any negotiation, or to make any settlement embracing such stipulations. He denies, too, that the release and covenant were ever read over to him, or that he ever knew they were contained in the paper until subsequently, when he directed his present attorney, Mr. Chisolm, to bring action for damages still resulting to his crops, he was informed by his said attorney that defendants had such a paper. Under these circumstances, the present action was commenced, in which, upon allegations as above stated, he prays judgment that the said paper in the possession of, and held by, the defendant corporation shall be brought into court, and the release and covenant be erased therefrom, and the same be decreed to have been inserted without the authority of the respondent, and that the defendant be enjoined and prohibited from using the same to prevent the plaintiff from protecting his property from damage, &c., and for such further relief as may be proper, &c., &c.

At the February term of the court for Charleston county, upon previous notice, a motion was made to dismiss the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a *cause of action. This motion was overruled, and defendant was granted leave to answer the complaint within twenty days. Leave was also given the plaintiff to amend his complaint. By appeal from this order, the case is now before us.

The main question presented in the appeal is: admitting the allegations to be true, are they sufficient as facts to constitute a cause of action? A cause of action, defined in a few words, is a primary right of one, either legal or equitable, invaded by another. Do the facts alleged in this case show such a right, either legal or equitable, in the plaintiff, and that it has been invaded by the defendant? The right which the plaintiff claims, and for the violation of which he seeks redress, is to have a certain paper, which he acknowledges he executed, reformed by striking therefrom certain stipulations therein which he alleges he did not know the paper contained when he signed it, and also to enjoin the defendant from using it against him in its present form as a defence to such action as he may institute for the protection of his property. His purpose is to strike from this paper above referred to the release and the covenant not to sue for future damages.

To simplify the matter, it is an action to reform a written instrument executed by the plaintiff to the defendant. It may be well to state here that this paper seems to have been executed in 1876; was soon thereafter placed upon record by the defendant; that the stipulations as to the payment of the money required from the defendant, and raising the chimneys of the works twenty-five feet higher than formerly, have been complied with; and no offer or tender by the plaintiff of the money back has been made. It is alleged, however, that the defendants have materially enlarged their works, and in that respect have violated the agreement. It may be further stated that some time before the present action the plaintiff brought suit to enjoin the defendant from operating their works. In this suit, the paper now in question was brought into court by the plaintiff as the basis upon which he asked the equitable relief of a perpetual injunction, this paper, as he supposed, having precluded him from an action on the law side of the court for damages. In this suit, his complaint was dismissed upon two grounds: (1) that the action could *not be maintained until the legal right upon which the relief depended was established on the law side of the court; and (2) even with such right established, or not denied, there was nothing in the case to entitle the plaintiff to be released from his covenant not to sue contained in the said paper. See 17 S. C., 411 [43 Am. Rep. 607].

With these statements, we will recur to the question, do the facts alleged entitle the plaintiff to have the relief demanded, or any relief? Do they show a right on his part to have the instrument in question reformed, or to prevent the defendants from using it as a defence to any future action for damages growing out of their phosphate works, as they stood when the instrument was executed, leaving the paper as a settlement of the previous case?

The cases in which the question of relief in equity may arise in connection with an instrument in writing executed by the parties may be divided into several classes: 1. Where there is a mutual mistake as to the facts upon which it is based, or as to the terms and stipulations embraced therein. 2. Where one of the parties only is under such mistake, either of the facts or the stipulations, and such mistake has been occasioned by the fraud, deceit, or imposition in any form of the other. 3. Where one of the parties only is under such mistake, and this has occurred from no fault of the other, but solely by the negligence or inattention of the first party.

In the first two classes, where the mistake is made to appear by clear and competent testimony, equity will unhesitatingly afford the necessary relief, either by reforming the paper or cancelling it as the case may require. In the third, equity will refuse its aid, except under very strong and extraordinary circumstances, showing imbecility or something which would make it a great wrong to enforce the agreement, and this must be made to appear by competent testimony of the clearest kind; the general, and we might say the almost universal, rule being, as was expressed by Chancellor Dargan, in Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strob. Eq., 148 [49 Am. Dec. 664], "that a party fully competent to protect himself, under no disability, advised as to all the circumstances by which he may be saved in his rights, or in a situation where he might by due diligence be so advised, not overreached by fraud, concealment, or misapprehension, nor the victim of a mistake against *which prudence might have guarded, has no right to call upon the courts to protect him." Without encumbering this opinion with extracts and quotations, we think the above principles will be found laid down by the standard authors, and in leading cases on this subject. See Story Eq. Jur., §§ 110, 127, 146, 151; Adams Eq., 171; Andrews & Shepherd v. Essex Fire Ins. Co., 3 Mason, 10; Nevius v. Dunlap, 33 N. Y., 676; Lyman v. United Ins. Co., 17 Johns., 373; Sawyer et al.

v. Hovey, 3 Allen, 331; Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strob. Eq., 148 [49 Am. Dec. 664]; McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C., 108.

To constitute a cause of action in this case, under either the first or second class, it should appear in the complaint either that there was a mutual mistake as to the contents of the paper in question, to wit, some stipulation omitted, or inserted, without the knowledge and against the understanding of both, or that the plaintiff was so mistaken, or uninformed, resulting from the fraud, concealment, overreaching, or imposition in some way, in whole or in part, or at least in some degree, by the defendant. Now, admitting the allegations stated in the complaint to be true, and giving to them the most liberal intendment allowed by the spirit of the reformed procedure, do they bring the case under either of the above classes? We think not. There is certainly no allegation of a mutual misunderstanding of what the paper contained. On the contrary, it fully appears in the complaint itself that the release of and the covenant not to sue for future damages were the very matters which the defendants desired and were negotiating to have inserted. They declined the first paper because it did not contain these stipulations.

Secondly. Do the facts stated show that the plaintiff was mistaken as to these stipulations being inserted, and that he was misled in reference thereto by the fraud, imposition, or improper conduct of the defendant in any way? There is certainly no distinct charge of that kind made, nor, after most careful examination of the complaint, do we find a single fact stated from which it may be inferred that such a charge was intended to be made. The nearest approach to such an allegation is found in the twelfth paragraph of the complaint, where it is stated that pending the appeal in the previous case, some overtures were made by the *defendant to plaintiff's attorney, M. P. O'Connor, &c. The meaning of the term overture is a proposition, an offer. Now, there is nothing essentially corrupt or fraudulent in all propositions, or offers, so that every one must necessarily have such a feature. This will depend upon the nature and character of the proposition or offer. Here the proposition was for a settlement of the controversy. That parties should desire to settle a litigation is not a fraudulent desire. Nor, in endeavoring to bring it about, is the fact that it was made to the attorneys of the party a fraudulent act. On the contrary, such mode is in the highest degree proper; and it would be better in all cases that such mode should be observed than that the parties themselves, over the heads of their attorneys and without their knowledge, should undertake it.

It is true the complaint alleges that the plaintiff was entirely ignorant of the insertion of these stipulations, although he had the paper in his possession, and signed it in the presence of witnesses. He also alleges that had he known of their insertion, he could not have been prevailed upon under any circumstances to sign the paper. He also alleges that having signed a previous paper with no such stipulations inserted, and containing only such terms as he was willing to make, and this second one being sent to him by his attorney to be signed, he supposed it was as the first and signed it without observing any change. All this may be true, but it in no way connects the defendants with the mistake. The defendants knew of and desired the insertions, and made no effort, nor resorted to any contrivance, to conceal this fact from the plaintiff. On the contrary, the stipulations were plainly expressed in the paper which was delivered to the defendants, signed and executed by the plaintiff in the presence of witnesses, one of them the son of the plaintiff. The defendants were not present even, and there is no allegation, not the most remote, that defendants had any agency whatever in obtaining plaintiff's signature.

We have seen that the case does not fall under the head of mutual error. It is equally apparent, from what we have said above, that it does not fall under the head of a mistake occasioned by fraud, imposition, misplaced confidence, or overreach*ing by one party as against the other. But taking the case as stated, and giving the facts their fullest force and effect, it is one where the instrument expresses exactly what was intended by the one side, but contains important insertions that the other (that other being the party who executed it) did not know were embraced; of which want of knowledge the first party had no information or suspicion, nor had any agency in producing; on the contrary, had every reason to believe that the paper as executed was precisely in accordance with the understanding of both parties, and so believing, has since carried it out by paying the money called for, and otherwise conforming thereto.

This brings the case under the third class. Does the general rule of that class apply? Or do the facts stated rank it with the exceptions? Was the plaintiff an imbecile? Was he incompetent to protect himself? Was he laboring under any disability of mind or body? Was he unable to read? Was he in a situation where he could not have been fully advised by due diligence as to the contents of the paper? Was there any concealment, or circumstances of surprise? Could not reasonable and proper prudence have guarded him against the mistake? Do the facts stated in the complaint taken as true entitle him to invoke the benefit of any or all of these pleas? If not, in the language of Chancellor Dargan, supra, "he has no right to call upon the courts to protect him," because, upon his own showing, he has no cause of action for reformation. We do not find any fact stated in the complaint from which it may be inferred that he was excusably mistaken as to the contents of the paper which he so solemnly executed under seal and in the presence of two witnesses, and upon which the court, in the exercise of equity jurisdiction, can seize and afford him relief. If the plaintiff was really ignorant of the contents of the paper, it was an ignorance under circumstances which even the most careless might have avoided. He had nothing to do but simply to read it. This he had full opportunity to do, and if he failed to embrace said opportunity, he has no one to blame but himself.

The case presents itself in this attitude: the plaintiff has signed a paper in which he has for a consideration released certain rights and made a certain covenant. The paper has all the *incidents of a solemn and deliberate execution. It is under seal and was executed in the presence of two witnesses, who attested the same. He now comes into court and says that he was ignorant of the fact that the release and the covenant were embraced, and the only reason he gives for this ignorance is that he had some time before this execution signed a previous paper as to the same matter in which the release and covenant were not embraced, and he supposed therefore that this second paper was the same as the first. If he thought the second was the same as the first, where was the necessity of the second paper? We have no reason to doubt but that the plaintiff is truthful in his statements. In fact, the effect of the demurrer is to admit them, and the case in that aspect may be a hard one. But we cannot adjust matters according to the hardships arising in individual cases. An attempt to administer law or equity by such a principle would produce infinite confusion, uncertainty, and injustice, far beyond any compensation that might result from the relief afforded in a special case. The law is built up upon general principles, and the wisdom of the past has determined that it is much the safest to adhere to them as producing the greatest good to the greatest number, rather than undertake to relieve a present hardship in special cases. If this plaintiff is entitled to relief under the circumstances claimed, we do not see why any contract should ever be regarded as absolutely binding.

It should be observed further that the plaintiff does not ask that the paper should be entirely cancelled and the original status restored. He has received the consideration and has enjoyed it for years, but he makes no offer to return it. His purpose is to strike from the paper the part to which he objects and then allow it to remain as a settlement of the previous suit. The right of action which he claims is not cancellation, with restoration of original status, but reformation and the establishment of a different contract from that which appears in the paper. Here are two distinct causes of action presented, and requiring a different state of facts. A paper may be reformed when the mutual understanding of the parties requires it, without entire cancellation and without restoration of the original status, but an entire cancellation only takes place when no valid contract has been made, *and the parties are to be put back as they stood at the beginning. These are different rights, and their invasion gives rise to different causes of action, requiring in the complaint a statement of facts suited to each.

The plaintiff here does not demand a cancellation in express terms; whether he intended to do so, under the general prayer for such further and other relief as may be proper, we do not know. If he did, however, then we say, that the facts stated in the complaint do not constitute a cause of action in that respect, especially as he makes no offer or tender to restore the original status.
